Introduction

Edward Hitchcock (1793-1864) is best known as a geologist and paleontologist who taught at Amherst College from 1826 to 1863 and served as the third president of the college from 1845 to 1854. But Hitchcock was also a minister who preached in churches throughout New England for over thirty-five years. Although his scientific works have enjoyed considerable attention from historians, his sermons have been largely forgotten.

Hitchcock's life embodied many contradictions. He was a Calvinist who believed that the Holy Scriptures were the word of God, yet he pursued scientific truth wherever it led. He implored his parishioners to devote their lives to God and to eschew the riches, honors, and pleasures of the world, yet he found himself constantly in the thrall of those very temptations. In an age when many preachers refused to apply their faith to the great moral issues of their day, Hitchcock spoke out against intemperance, war, slavery, and the mistreatment of the American Indian.

In 2017 I began studying the life and works of Edward Hitchcock with the goal of writing a biography. One of my first efforts was to read his sermons. Thanks to the Amherst College Archives and Special Collections, I was able to access the nearly 200 sermons in their collection remotely. Over a period of many months I transcribed them all. I used voice-to-text software to dictate each sermon into a document file, then reread the sermon, comparing the transcription to images of the originals.

This digital document contains my transcriptions of all the sermons of Edward Hitchcock in the Amherst College Archives as well as thirteen published sermons. It does not include the thirty-nine sermons in the collections of the Pocumtuck Valley Memorial Association, Deerfield, Massachusetts, nor does it include any of the many sermon fragments and notes in the Amherst College Archives.

Most of Hitchcock's hand-written sermons have a title and a sermon number written in Hitchcock's hand on the cover page. But a number of his sermons are un-numbered and/or untitled. For those sermons I have assigned a number (starting with 500) and have chosen an appropriate title. Where sermon numbers or titles are not Hitchcock's own, I have placed them in brackets. Just below the sermon number and title of each sermon I have inserted the location information including box number and folder number as they appear in the finding aids of the Archives. This will help the reader who wishes to locate the original in the Archives. To locate the digital images for a sermon, it is only necessary to go to acdc.amherst.edu and enter either the sermon number (e.g., "Sermon 38"), the title (e.g., "Submission to God"), or the scriptural reference (e.g., "Job 27") in the search box. The numbers and titles I have assigned will not work as search terms; for those sermons you will need to use some other search term.

Besides the nearly 200 hand-written sermons from the Archives, I have also included thirteen of Hitchcock's published sermons. For most of these I have provided a link to the digitized version available from Google Books. Two of Hitchcock's published sermons, "Weep Not for Me" (Sermon 536) and "The Fully Ripe Grain Gathered In" (Sermon 548), have not to my knowledge been digitized. The transcriptions of those were made directly from print copies.

Most of Hitchcock's sermons begin with a verse of scripture that he selected for the sermon and inserted on the cover page below the title. Hitchcock used the King James Version exclusively. If a scriptural reference was incomplete or difficult to read, I inserted the King James version of the verse. The same is true of the many scriptural passages that appear in the text of nearly every sermon.

Throughout the transcriptions, I show quoted material in italics. For poetry or other extended quotations, I have indicated the source in brackets whenever possible.

Also appearing on the cover page of most of Hitchcock's sermons is a list of the churches where he delivered the sermon and the date of each delivery. As these were added long after the sermon was written, they are often scrawled in the margins or between lines of text. I have transcribed this information on the last page of each sermon. Hitchcock was pastor of only one community church, the Congregational church in Conway, Massachusetts, from 1821-1825. But he was called on regularly to provide "pulpit supply" for churches up and down the Connecticut Valley and sometimes beyond. He also served for a time as pastor of the chapel at Amherst College. He often reused his old sermons, but it is clear from the manuscripts that he did a good deal of revision. Sometimes he rearranged the original, added or deleted sections.

Also on the cover page of many sermons is a list of hymns and readings selected by Hitchcock for that service. These were often made in pencil; some are barely legible. For that reason I have not attempted to transcribe them.

Although Hitchcock's handwriting is generally legible, there are many instances in which I was unable to read a word or phrase. There are also occasional instances in which a tear or ink smear obscures the text. In those cases I have inserted four question marks in brackets [????] in place of the unreadable text.

Many variations in spelling have been preserved in the transcription. Some of these may have been Hitchcock's own, others were customary for his time. Examples include eccentrick, independant, volcanoe, risque, and favour. Hitchcock was frugal in all things, including the use of punctuation. I have sometimes added commas or replaced colons with semicolons or periods to make the meaning clearer.

Many of the sermons include pages inserted after the original was complete; some have alternate endings; several have multiple versions of the entire sermon. Whenever possible I have pointed out these variations or provided special instructions in brackets for the reader.

I have tried my best to make this transcription as accurate as possible. I apologize in advance for any errors and welcome corrections from readers. In time I may append an errata sheet or produce a revised version of the entire document.

At the beginning of many of the transcriptions I have added a few comments on the content or the context of the sermon. I have placed these inside brackets so the reader will know that they are the transcriber's comments.

The 200 sermons contain some 845,000 words. Reading and transcribing them has been an interesting and very rewarding process. At times the work was slow and frustrating, particularly when the voice-to-text software was glitchy, or the quality of the original was less than perfect. At those times I had only to imagine Reverend Hitchcock laboring away two centuries ago, quill pen in hand, suffering from poor eyesight, and with only a flickering candle to light the page, composing, writing, revising, and copying all those sermons. My labors by comparison seem small.

I am indebted to Amherst College and the Archives, and particularly to Margaret Dakin and Michael Kelly of the Archives, for preserving the sermons of Edward Hitchcock and making them accessible to all. If you make use of this transcription, please be sure to cite your source including, of course, the Amherst College Archives and Special Collections.

Readers wanting to learn more about Edward Hitchcock sermons may wish to read my biography, All the Light Here Comes from Above: the Life and Legacy of Edward Hitchcock, or my article, "Lord Is It I? The Sermons of Edward Hitchcock," Historical Journal of Massachusetts 48 (Summer, 2020): 94-123. Perhaps the book, article, and this transcription will inspire others to get to know the man behind that quill pen.

Sincerely,

Sermon 4 Death

[Sermon No. 4, "Death," Ecclesiastes 8:8, 1820 Feb,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 1]

Ecclesiastes 8:8

There is no discharge in that war.

[Four or five additional paragraphs are included that may have been written on the occasion of the deaths of parishioners. Also an obituary written by Hitchcock for his sister, Emelia Billings.]

The soldier who has long been engaged in the service of his country looks forward with a joyful hope to the hour when he shall be released from the dangerous toils and return once more to repose in the arms of peace and friendship. And to such an one, this hour, so sweet and delightful, has sometimes arrived. He has escaped unhurt from the perils of war and is permitted to spend the residue of his days without any to molest or make him afraid. But there is a war, in which every child of Adam is engaged, from which there is no discharge. It is the war with death; and no effort of human power - no skill in deception, has ever secured the breast of an individual from the arrows of this Thing of Terrors. This march is confirmed to no country and to no generation - and of all our fallen race, only two, favored of heaven, have escaped the fury of his vindictive arm.

The great truth that all must die is, however, denied by no man. The universal testimony of all ages and countries leaves no room for the faintest doubt in the most skeptical mind. And the object in choosing this text, is not to give a logical proof of the certainty of death, but to bring the subject to bear upon our hearts. For stranger as it might seem to an angel, it is a melancholy fact, that though death is before our eyes almost daily, and though eternal consequences are suspended upon the little uncertain period that remains to us, we live as if we were immortal, and feeble, very feeble, to the influence of this great truth upon our lives. Permit me then to hold up to your view a few of the most striking instances of the triumphs of death: 1. One as exhibited in the history of mankind, and 2. As made known to us by our own experience.

1. As exhibited in the history of mankind

The Instances of mortality in our species are most numerous in infancy. More than one half of mankind are cut down before they attained to the age of twelve. Yet this so rapid havoc of life, does not affect us so deeply as the rarer cases where man is taken in the vigor of youth, or in manhood. For these little ones have not yet unfolded their peculiar excellences of character, nor have they become united to so many hearts by the ties of affection and esteem. They are yet only unfolding their blossoms - and though we may be pleased with the beauty of these flowers, yet their loss is not so sensibly felt as if they had begun to cast fruit around them. Still, however, let it not be thought that there are none who feel, deeply feel, that stroke which removes their little ones from the land of the living. Look at those parents who have been called to witness the last struggles of a beloved infant. They saw this child a few days before in all the sportive loveliness of innocence – yet exhibiting no marks of a corrupted nature, and yet untarnished by an evil world. That smile of peace, of innocence and happiness, is now exchanged for the paleness of death; and the fond parent sees so rich and so dear a treasure, torn from him forever.

But though the victims of death be most numerous in infancy, his ravages are by no means small among those of maturer years. Witness that youth, just ready to take his place as an active member of society, with a mind well disciplined and stored with knowledge - the idol, expectation and the only child of his parents, and to whom many eyes are turned, as to one bidding fair for usefulness and eminence. Today you see him surrounded by friends and affluence, full of literary hope, and flushed with the ardor of youth and of health - tomorrow he is stretched nerveless and pale upon the bed of sickness, and the third day, he is numbered with the dead. I have said that this youth was the idol of his parents – Yes, and they were Christians, therefore they might worship God only: this then must be taken away, or they would never return from their wanderings. And God, to save the parents, took the son.

Take now another instance not infrequently to be met with in the world. This man seems to be devoted from his birth ~~as a victim~~ to the severest miseries of life and the protracted pains of death. Born in obscurity and with a feeble constitution, he is forced to contend with poverty, disease, and an unfeeling world, as long as he lives. He cannot resist this united torrent, but every day is to him a day of pain and adversity. From months and years he perceives the slow but certain approach of the Thing of Terrors, menacing him with the uplifted arm. He struggles, indeed to be discharged from this contest with him who is always conquer - but prayers and tears and the physicians aid are of no avail. Yet he struggles thus, from the weakness of nature, and not because he is unwilling to submit to the will of God. For his long series of afflictions have led him to resort to the great Physician of souls who has freed him from the malady of sin - and he feels a strong hope that though death may gain a momentary conquer conquest over his body he shall ultimately be more than conqueror.

Yes, this man dies a Christian and will hereafter have occasion to rejoice and bless God, for all his pains and sorrows in the flesh: for these have wrought out for him a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. But not so with the next picture I would exhibit. This man has been nourished in affluence and blessed with health and prosperity. But pride, fulness of bread and abundance of wellness, the sins and the ruin of Sodom, were his destruction. In an unexpected hour he is called to prepare to meet his God. But who can hope to perform this great work amid the anxiety, distress and deliverance of a raging and rapid disease? Yet this man must die - for death, un pitying remorseless death, will not grant him even one short day for making his peace with God. One sudden stroke of disease has swept away all his brilliant hopes of earthly pleasures, and disclosed to his view an opening grave once a cheerless world beyond it. He must die – in the morning of life, he must die – with no Saviour to conduct him through the dark valley, and with no God, whom in the spirit of faith, he can call Abba, Father.

Take another instance of the unsparing and undistinguishing nature of death, in the fate of the tender and delicate woman - which would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness and tenderness. Elated by the intentions and flatteries that wait on female beauty she had never humbled her thoughts to contemplate that house appointed for all living. To use the expressive language of the Prophet, she had said in her health, I shall be a lady forever. But the hand of death has withered in a moment all these presumptive expectations. At his appeal the expression of sentiment and feeling in the eye, has vanished- the rose of beauty withered on the cheek, and we now turn away with disgust from that countenance, once once animated with every charm. [Asterisk]

But may not the man who is in the midst of usefulness - who fulfills the high stations in the government of his country - in the courts of justice - in the seminaries of learning - or who faithfully ministers at the altar ministers at the altar, may not such an one be exempt from the capricious assaults of death, and spared a little grace to bless the community? Oh, there is no discharge in that war! The demands of death are as unchanging and impartial as that God who commissions it. And when this angel of the Divine Justice declares to an individual, time shall be no longer, whatever be the station in life, however useful, however beloved, that man has nothing to do but to prepare for death. I will take one instance out of the many that are furnished in the history of the world. This man is in a station which nothing but distinguished talents, and exalted virtue can fill. To the ignorant he is an oracle, and to the miserable a father; and he exerts a happy and a virtuous influence over thousands. He is besides in the noon of life and promises to be long a burning and a shining light in the world. But God, in whom we live and move, orders otherwise - and he is taken from all this usefulness almost without a warning.

Still more mysterious and affecting, is the case of that faithful and devoted missionary of the cross, who, after years of toil and hardship, has at length succeeded in establishing himself in some land of savage error, crime and superstition, and just begins to see his instructions taking root, yet is called from his labors by Him whose ways are not as our ways. O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments and his ways past finding out!

These, my brethren, are only a few instances of the mortality of our species. They are selected from the great congregation that yearly and daily, in this dying world, crowd the passage to the tomb, to impress us with the truth, that no age or condition can indulge a momentary hope, that they are not alike exposed every hour, to the universal lot. Still, these select cases may not sensibly affect our hearts; for though they might have reached our ears, yet perhaps we were not bound to these victims of death by ties of kindred, or affection, and therefore, feel no individual bereavement. Let us then, in the second place, endeavor to bring the subject nearer home, by addressing our own experience to the great fact contained in the text, that there is no discharge in the war of death.

And in the first place, who among us does not sometimes feel in his own infirmities the reality of that sentence, stamp with a pen of iron upon every son of Adam, dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return? When we feel the aching head, the feverish pulse, or the acute pain, how soon does our vigor languish in our spirits droop! Perhaps some of us have felt, for months and years, the secret workings of some inveterate disease, slowly but irresistibly undermining the constitution, weakening the vigor of body and mind, and gradually conducting us to the tomb! Oh, we cannot, then, but realize, that our time is short and that nature must soon yield in a conflict so unequal. Perhaps some of us in the course of life have been confined to the chamber of sickness - have been full of tossings to and fro in the night season - and of distress from morning to evening. Did we not then forcibly realize that our earthly tabernacle was dissolving, when the brain was half delirious, the pulse fluttering, the eye sunk and languid, the arm nerveless and the whole frame helpless as in infancy? At such times we can scarcely avoid the conviction that we are mortal and happy would it be for us did not returning health destroy these impressions.

But perhaps, my brethren, I can make a more powerful appeal to your experience. For who of us has not been called to follow a father, or a mother, or a wife, or a husband, or a child, or a brother, or sister, or a friend, to the grave?

Was it a father? You saw him to whom under God you were indebted for existence, who has devoted you in baptism to the Lord, instructed you in religion and human learning - daily provided for your wants, and who has morning and evening, committed you in prayer to the keeping of Almighty God - this father, so dear to you, you saw sinking under the weight of an incurable disease. You heard his dying counsel, and when nature could no longer maintain her conflict, you saw his last struggle and felt the tender ties of affection sundered forever. Oh, then how empty did the world appear to you, and how strong were the impressions of your heart that you also must die!

Was it a mother? No less trying was the struggle of feeling, and no less deep the impressions on your heart. For you then called to remembrance her numerous pains, anxieties and watchings on your account - how she nursed you in the years of infancy - how she wept in all your sorrows and rejoiced in all your joys, and how she loved you, with a mother's love, even unto death.

Was it a wife or husband? Oh I would not attempt to recall all those overwhelming emotions but then rushed on your souls. I know that when you saw the grave close over the remains of one who was bone of your bone and flesh of your flesh, and saw yourself left alone in this barren world, then you not only realized the certainty of your own dissolution, but you scarcely wished that it might be delayed.

Was it a child? As you stood over its sickbed, how frequent and how ardent were your prayers for its recovery! How unremitted were your exertions to revisit the workings of that disease, which had fastened upon its frame with a grasp you could not uncloset! How often did you even wish that you might be taken and the child spared! And when you found all the prayers and all the exertions in vain, how forcefully did you realize the impotency of human struggles in resisting the progress of death!

Was it a brother or a sister? Then, there, you felt the very nerve of affection broken. You were called to witness the last agonies of the companion of your cradle, and of your childish sports, who, a few days before, was as healthy and vigorous as yourself. All the innocent amusements of a happy childhood enjoyed with one so linked to you by nature, and all the thousand nameless expressions of affection you have ever experienced from a brother's or a sister's love, crowd upon your mind as you stand by the deathbed of that brother or that sister, and feel the sinking pulse, and see the convulsive struggle and the fixed eye - the signals of the victory of death. Do you at such a moment feel as if you were in no degree exposed to a similar end? Do you then feel a confidence to build your hopes on any earthly foundation?

And lastly was it a friend? There is a friend, says Solomon, that sticketh closer than a brother - and loveth at all times. Such an one may have been ours. In him we have found a defender and a patron. Into his bosom we have poured our griefs and found his sympathy a balm for every wound. Yet he is now taken from us - and we have seen the grave close over all that was mortal of one so dear to us. That eye, which welcomed us by its expression, will never more be unclosed - that heart which glowed with affection and virtue, is cold in the tomb, and that tongue which so often animated us in the cause of religion is dumb forever!

Thus, my brethren, do we learn from our own experience in that of others, the frailty of man and the universality of the dominion of death, over our apostate world. I trust that our hearts are now prepared for the application -

And first, this subject shows us how hateful and ruinous is Sin. For by one man sin entered into the world and death by Sin: and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned. Then we see the true source of the desolation and ruin of our species. The fountain was corrupted with the power of poison of sin. We have drunk deeply at this fountain and must therefore, die. These natures, originally from heaven and bearing the image of the Holy God, we have defaced and brutalized, and death alone can free us from these pollutions.

And has sin a power so deadly as to bring all this ruin upon one of the noble objects of creation, an immortal mind? No wonder, Joel hath said, Oh, do. (No wonder that he who is over all God blessed forever must become incarnate and die on the cross ere man could be pardoned) not this abominable thing that I hate. No wonder that the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men; and no wonder that the smoke of the torments of the finally impenitent ascendeth up forever and ever.

In the second place, do the instances of death around us and the certainty of its approach stimulate us to prepare for our own exit? We have been seeing that the world is but one broad field of battle, where nearly one-hundred-fifty generations of men have fought and fallen by the unsparing sword of the great destroyer. On this same field we now stand, and are engaged in this same war. We tread upon the graves of a world and daily behold our comrades falling on our right hand and on our left. Yet many of us close our eyes to all this danger and heedlessly riot in sin, standing as it were in the very jaws of destruction.

The man who treads carelessly on the margin of a volcano will often feel the thin and deceptive covering of ashes give way in an instant under his feet and he will sink into the fiery furnace beneath. So every sinner – every man who does not habitually keep his end in view and examine on what ground he rests, is treading over a lake of living fire and will soon be buried in it forever.

My brethren what are our reflections when we follow a friend to the tomb? I know they are full of tenderness: but unless they are also religious they amount to nothing. If such an event does not awaken us from stupidity and sin we shall not be awakened by anything.

*Smitten friends are angels sent on errands full of love -
For us they languish and for us they die.*

And what are our reflections when we visit the graves of our friends? Does that spot, made sacred by their ashes, teach us no lesson? You say that all is motionless and dead at the tomb, and that no sound is there heard, save the wind, sighing over the remains? Oh, how can you be deaf to that voice which rises from their ashes, loud as thunder and perpetually repeats the admonition, be ye also ready! Yes, there we should often resort to learn wisdom: for it is the school of wisdom. There should we often kneel alone and pray - for prayer in such a spot cannot be formal - cannot be insincere. There should we learn habitually to contemplate with an eye that will not be diverted, that grave which is already opening for ourselves. Nor should our view terminate at the tomb - we should look into the world beyond it. Oh who could resist the convictions of such a spot and such an hour!

If death were an uncommon event, if but an individual of our race were destroyed during several years, it would most forcibly arrest our attention. And then there would be no occasion for monuments and sermons to awaken remembrance and bring home a lesson to the heart. But if such an every day occurrence that we regard it with almost as much indifference as the rising and setting of the sun. Were you standing upon a field of battle and saw the sword of your enemy raise over your head and your comrades fallen by your side, would there be any need of reminding you of your danger? Yet this is indeed precisely our case my brethren. Every day thousands around us are smitten by the iron of the great destroyer. One of our comrades in the field of the world falls every second - so that while I now speaking one was fallen and now another - and now another - and now another - and now another. Oh, let us be persuaded to look up and see if the next blow is not aimed at us! At the longest it must soon fall, and it may be the sentence against us is already gone forth. Yet notwithstanding all this danger if we are not careful we shall forget it amidst the uproar of the world. Let us then resolve that before we sleep this night we will spend one quarter of an hour in reflecting upon death. Let us set before our eyes our own exit and see the circumstances attending it. The pains of this disease, weeping of friends - the final separation with those we love - the solemn procession following us to the tomb and the last look of friendship upon us as the grave closes over our remains.

And there is one question important beyond all others which we must not fail putting to ourselves most seriously during this moment of reflection. It is a question which decision may for our everlasting destiny - a question which must be decided in this world or another - a question in which are suspended the joys of heaven or the miseries of hell and which if we do not decide will be decided by God - Let us then in the stillness and solemnity of the Lord this day enquire individually - Am I prepared to die!

And there is one declaration of scripture that may prove to us a profitable text during such a season of reflection - It is a declaration which every day's experience urges upon our attention - a declaration which the late alarm providences among us should bring home to our hearts with a powerful emphasis - a declaration which if we neglect it during our lives will haunt us upon our death beds and fill us with despair at the day of judgment - O let it strike deep into every heart- prepare to meet thy God! Prepare to meet thy God!

[This appears to be the end of the original sermon. Several additional pages are included that may represent alternate endings written at later times for specific members of the congregation who passed away.]

We are summoned to attend at the close of this service the funeral of one whom all so far as I know regarded as a humble and devoted Christian whose meat and drink it was to do the will of God. I feel therefore that it may be a profitable meditation to suppose he addressing us from her dying bed in the language of the text. In trying to receive the instruction which such a scene should impart I shall attempt to describe the contrast between the dying believer and surviving friends.

We may first look at the contrast between the dying Christian and the dying incarnate sinner.

And sometimes have we seen the woman who for years has been struggling with sorrows and disease – yield at length to the united pressure and sinking beneath the sword of death. We have seen but an one in the midst of these calamities and distresses manifesting the most heroic and unwavering faith – gradually gradually refining in the furnace of affliction - blessing God that her trials were fewer than her deservings - and weaned at last from all mortal attachments - we have seen her welcome the approaching moment when her weary spirit should be freed from the shackles of mortality and ascend beyond the reach of sorrow disease and death - into the presence of the God where is fullness of joy and pleasures forevermore. And as the prophet of old gazed upon his master carried up in a fiery chariot to heaven so may we profitably watch the death bed of this Christian woman and as the mantle of Elijah fell upon Elisha so would to God her faith and submission and triumph in her redeemer might fall upon us.

[Asterisk] On the other hand we can sometimes have the gratification of beholding a female, who in the morn of her days is called into eternity, meeting the Thing of Terror with smile and committing her soul to Christ in all the triumph of an unwavering faith. Though young in years she is old in religion. While others were devoting their time to the reading of romances and visionary records, she was reading the Bible. While others were employed in adorning their persons – at the card table or in the dancing assembly or in other fashionable vanities she was praying to God. And now in this trying hour does she find him an unfailing friend. We mourn indeed that so bright an example of piety should be taken away this early from the earth where it is so much wanted but we rejoice that the soul has gone to a better world and that we are permitted to behold it as if it were translated into heaven. In this world it shone like a star struggling behind the fogs and the clouds and we saw but half its beauty and splendor: But hereafter will it move through the pure hemisphere of heaven an unclouded and everlasting sun.

[Asterisk]

There is another instance evincing the truth of our text which few of us have not observed. And it is when the grasp of death is fixed upon one who has been struggling for years to establish himself in an independent and respectable station in society and who is just on the point of attaining his object. For years has he labored with persevering industry and brought into requisition every faculty of body and mind to reach this point of fancier happiness. Already has he acquired houses and lands and friends and honors. And he now fondly imagines that he is about to rest from his cares and toils and in his future enjoyments to find ample reward for all his past labors. The whole prospect before him is bright and beautiful and cloudless as any prospect can be in this world and many an envious eye is turned secretly upon him because so much happiness is before him. But alas there is an arrow of death coming upon the gale – and it smites him as he is entering the threshold of happiness, perhaps in the midst of the marriage feast - as the house of feasting is turned into the house of mourning.[Asterisk]

[Inserted in the document is an obituary written by Edward Hitchcock for his sister Emelia, dated October 2, 1854.]

A SISTER'S DEATH-BED

I was lately summoned away to see a sister die. I reached her home among the hills at a still and early hour of a summer evening, and was told to hasten to her bed-side, if perchance she might recognize me. I perceived, indeed, that the king of terrors was sure of his victim: for the pallor and ghastliness of death was upon her features! Yet nature still struggled manfully with disease, and reason maintained her throne: nor was the power of utterance gone. Therefore I had the consolation of hearing her reply to my enquiry, whether in her extremity she could hope and trust the Saviour? "Oh, yes, I do." – What then shall I pray for? "Pray that I may know that my hope is well founded," was the reply.

At her request we then left her for a time. But at midnight we were again summoned to see death's final triumph. O how few scenes on earth are more solemn, or more truly sublime, than to witness the departure of a Christian at the dark and still hour of midnight; to see the last ebbings of the life of a beloved friend; to have the stillness broken only by the struggling and yielding breath, the sighs of surrounding friends, or the voice of prayer; and to realize that a redeemed soul is breaking loose from its earthly bonds and just ready to take its immortal crown. But how did it deepen d still more the interest of the scene in the present case, to find that even to the last, I was recognized, and to have a prompt affirmative reply to the questions, "Is Christ precious still?"

And here a little incident impressed me deeply. That sister was a mother. Two sons, her only children, had grown up to manhood and respectability, and were present. But they were out of her sight. She made an effort to speak. She asked for her sons. They came and were recognized. But she gave them no special message. It seemed to be the last earthly feeling of a mother's heart – a holy feeling and not unworthy a dying hour. She had seen her children once more, and was now ready to die. The laboring breath grew shorter, the muscles relaxed, and almost imperceptibly did the vital spark go out! As gently as the dying away of the wind on a summer's evening, she sunk

*As sweetly as a child,
Whom neither thought disturbs nor care encumbers,
Tired of long play, at close of summer's day,
Lies down and slumbers.*

Now this was not a case where any remarkable vision was indulged to the departing soul, nor any rapturous joy. But it was the quiet termination of a long, laborious, and quiet life. To one ever distrustful of herself, and always regarding herself as the least of all saints, if a christian at all; one who avoided public observation and strove only to do her duty in several relations of a daughter, a sister, a wife, and a mother, any marvelous death-bed experience would have been out of place, and I should have distrusted such an exhibition. But simple steadfast trust in Christ were appropriate, and in keeping with her life, and if I could only dare to hope that the like sweet submission and calm confidence may stay me up in a dying hour, I ask for no brighter visions. Indeed that midnight scene seemed to rob death of half its terrors, for why should I so fear to enter that dark valley, through which I had seen my own sister pass so calmly and quietly?

Nay more? why should I not feel a stronger attraction than before for the home of departed saints? For until she was taken we formed an unbroken circle of five brothers and sisters, the youngest of whom had already seen three score years. It seemed a charmed circle, which death was unwilling to break. But now the silver cord is loosed, not to be joined together again in this world. Yet there is consolation in the thought, that if our hopes do not deceive us, it will be only a few days before it will be reunited in everlasting love to God and one another.

Sermon 5 Gospel Message

[Sermon No. 5, "Gospel Message," Judges 3:20, 1820 Feb,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 1]

Judges 3:20

I have a message from God unto thee.

But my hearers I have no such message as he had who originally spoke these words. This was Ehud the Israelite when he came to bring presents to Eglon being of Moab. This prince eighteen years before had conquered the children of Israel and ruled over them during that period. But the Lord at length raised up Ehud as a deliverer. Being appointed to carry the presents of the Israelites to Eglon, after delivering them he told the king that he had a message from God unto him. And when he had risen to receive it Ehud drew forth a hidden dagger and plunged it through his body.

Such a dreadful command as this I thank God he does not require me to execute. The message that I bear is the gospel message. I could wish indeed that it might prove the dagger of conviction to every impenitent sinner: but it is no less calculated to soothe and animate the heart of the real Christian. It is the revelation of an all sufficient Savior to a lost world. It exhibits a God whose mercy has been abused, ready to pardon the chief of sinners. But it also holds forth conditions on which this pardon will be granted, and these are repentance of sin and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. To a compliance with these conditions, it annexes the promise of immortal glory but to those who turn a deaf ear to the gracious invitation it proclaims indignation and wrath, tribulations and anguish.

To this message, then, let us attend in a more particular manner, and see what it brings to each one of us, according to our respective characters.

In the first place, there is in the Gospel from God to myself. Here then, O my soul, what the Spirit saith unto those, who have taken upon them to preach the everlasting gospel.

Son of Man have made thee a watchman, unto the house of Israel (Ezekiel 3:17). Cry aloud, spare not; lift up thy voice like a trumpet and shew my people their transgressions and the house of Jacob their sins (Isaiah 58:1). When I say unto the wicked, O wicked man thou shalt surely die; if thou dost not speak to warn the wicked from his way that wicked man shall die in his iniquity: but his blood will I require at thine hand (Ezekiel 33:8). Woe be to the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves! Should not the Shepherd feed the flocks? (Ezekiel 34:2) Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord that thou fulfill it. Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth. I charge thee before God and the Lord Jesus Christ who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and kingdom; preach the word; be instant in season and out-of-season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine.

With such solemn charges directed to him, what man is there who would not feel his responsibility, and, at least make an effort to declare the whole counsel of God? Now these and many more similar exhortations are pressed upon the conscience of every man, who devotes himself to the Gospel ministry. You cannot therefore, my brethren, consider me as assuming a power to which I have no right. When I proceed in the next place to say that just to the established, persevering questions I have a message from God unto thee. And it is a consoling message. You have been wise in time. You have chosen that good part, which shall not be taken from you. The opposition of an evil heart, the influence of a sinful world, did not prevent you from boldly taking up your cross and avouching the Lord to be your God - devoting your bodies and spirit entirely and forever to his service. And now you may claim the glorious promises of the Gospel as your own. Do you Christ hath said, Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me. I will not leave you comfortless; I will come to you. Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Verily, verily I say unto you whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, He will give it to you. To you also does Paul speak when he says, There is therefore, now, no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit (Romans 8:1). Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people, that you should show forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvelous light (Peter 2:9). What shall we then say to these things? If God be for us, who shall be against us? He that spared not his own son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him freely give us all things? Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth?

Oh Christian, let not such a happy state of feeling as you enjoy while growing in grace be at any time lost. For you may lose it. You may grieve the Holy Spirit lest he strive with you no more. Let your prayers continually ascend for more faith, more love, and more devotedness to the service of your Redeemer. Then shall your heart feel the value of that promise he has made. To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God (Revelation 2:7). He that overcome, the same shall be clothed in white raiment, and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but will confess his name before my Father and before his angels. Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more.

Perhaps, however, some humble diffident soul may answer, that he can lay claim to none of these promises and consolations. For he is full of doubt, whether he be a son of God or a servant of sin. He cannot read clearly his title to eternal life. And why can you not? Have you not long since devoted yourself most sincerely to the Lord in an everlasting covenant? Have you not since that period been continually struggling with remaining sin, constant in prayer for help from God, and constant in the discharge of your duty to man? Has your zeal in the cause of Christ greatly diminished and are you sensible of any great relapse from God in your feelings or conduct? Do you begin to give up the merits of Christ as your grounds of salvation, and to trust to your own works? No: you are not sensible of any defects like these. Do not fear that you shall fail of salvation because you are not sincere - because you do not hunger and thirst after righteousness - because your repentance for sin is not deep - because you do not have humility - because you hate God, or man - because you do not examine yourself - because you do not pray fervently and constantly - or because you distrust the power or the promises of God. And because you distrust yourself, and feel that you are unworthy of salvation. And what Christian, what confirmed saint, is not unworthy? But in Christ remember, all fullness dwells; and in Him, in plenteous redemption. Remember also that there is a hope of the hypocrite which shall perish; and this distrust of yours, proves that you have not this hope, and, that whether by your religious state, you are at sincere. The doubts of yours, may be your peculiar trial and necessary to your perseverance. Look, I beseech you, to Christ, who hath said, Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out. A bruised reed shall he not break and the smoking place shall he not quench.

I should now proceed to address a message from God to another class of men; but the difficulty is that were this whole assembly composed of such probably not one would suppose himself addressed, unless some marks of his character were previously pointed out to him. In the first place, then, the person who is meant, is one who begins to neglect almost entirely secret prayer. Once he delighted to go into his closet, to hold communion with God; but now he generally forgets it, or, if he sometimes in seasons of worldly trouble resume the practice, he feels none of those deep convictions of sin he formerly did. In the second place, this person conforms more to the world than he once did, and takes more pleasure in the society and conversation of irreligious than religious men. In the third place, he begins to suspect that any peculiar attention to religion is enthusiasm. He does not like to hear much set upon the subject. He does not feel so much for the spread of religion in the world, as he once did, and at times doubts whether the merely moral man is not in as fair a way of salvation as has who hopes he has been born again of the water and the Spirit. This is the man who, professing to be a disciple of Christ, has gone back from following him - has become lukewarm and forsaken his first love. He is a backslider - and let him hear the awakening message directed to him in the word of God – Ye did men well; who did hinder you? I know the works, that thou hast a name that thou livest and art dead. Remember, therefore, from whence are thou fallen and repent, and do the first works; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place, except thou repent.

Oh my Christian brethren, does not this warning apply to very many of us? Are we not sensible of great stupidity and indifference in the cause of religion, when we realize its infinite importance. And why are we so? Has God done too little for us to engage our love, after having sent his Son to die for us, his spirit to regenerate and his word to enlighten us, and all of his free, unmerited grace? Or has our Savior suffered too little and not having where to lay his head, in being buffeted, smitten and spit upon. In his agony in the garden of Gethsemane, and in being nailed to the cross? Oh my brethren, we do indeed crucify the Lord afresh and put him to an open shame. He is wounded in the house of his friends. Every instance of indifference in his cause and every sin we commit after having proffered his name before the world, pierces with another nail those hands, already streaming with the blood of innocence - plants another crown of thorns upon that head already loaded with the sins of the world, and extorts another agonizing, bloody sweat from that body which was wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities.

I proceed, in the next place, to deliver the Gospel message to that person, who is brought to realize his danger while out of Christ, and is sincerely enquiring what he must do to be saved. But is there any such person in this assembly? What! are all who are present Christians? Then is this, indeed, a happy and favoured congregation – the like to which cannot probably be found on this side of the grave. Oh, I dare not with the utmost stretch of charity, presume that there are none here, who are not reconciled to Christ - and if there be any who are sinners, treasuring up to themselves wrath against the day of wrath, I would hope there is at least one who is alive to his danger. To such an one let it be said: the Spirit of God is now striving with you, and urging you by all the motives of the gospel, to turn unto the Lord, to repent of your sins and become a new creature. Remember the directions of Peter on the day of Pentecost – repent and be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. You may also apply to yourself the words of Paul to the trembling jailer. Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved. You may perhaps suppose that you are doing everything in your power to produce this happy change, and that you are ready and willing to follow any course in which you may become a Christian. Why, then, are you not a Christian? Is the fault chargeable upon God because his grace is not given to convert you? This you will not dare to alledge - the fault then lies with yourself. You are not yet opposed in your heart - to God and to the way of salvation which He has provided. You have not yet been brought to yield yourself entirely and unreservedly to Christ and to except of salvation. Through his atonement as a free, unmerited gift. [inserted between lines: Your pride has not yet been subdued – and although your understanding has been convinced yet your heart deceitful above all things chooses not to yield] You must give up this opposition - You must receive salvation on God's terms - You must no longer hope to be made clean by washing in Abana and Pharpar, but in Jordan, and in Jordan only. Make an entire surrender of yourself to Christ and then but not till then will you be converted. And I entreat you, do not delay this surrender. Do not suffer your religious impressions to wear off. If you neglect this opportunity, it may be your last. There is, indeed, every probability that you will never more be awakened, but be given over to a reprobate mind, a vessel of wrath, fitted for destruction. Nay, if you continue your resistance another day, you may seal up your final condemnation.

These reflections naturally bring me to address another class of persons. If there be any one in this house, who can recollect, that he was once awakened to see his danger and alarmed for his eternal safety, but suffered these impressions to wear away, and is now living without God and without hope, to him I have indeed a message from God: and it is a message of terror. You have resisted the kind warnings of the Spirit, and spurned from your heart, a bleeding and a merciful Saviour. And now, what probability is there that this Spirit and the Saviour, so slighted and so insulted, will ever return to your relief? For, says an apostle, if we sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin; but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversary: because I have called, says God, and thou hast refused - I also will laugh at your calamity - I will mock when your fear cometh - When your fear cometh as desolation and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind, when distress and anguish cometh upon you - then shalt thou call upon me, but I will not answer thou shalt seek me lastly, shall not find me. And is not your case, my friend, described by Paul, when he says It is impossible for those who have been once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gifts to and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance: seeing they crucified to themselves the Son of God afresh and put him to an open shame. Is not your case then a desperate one? Is there even a possibility to renew your you again to repentance, when you have refused to harken to the merciful warnings God has given you? He alone knoweth whether you have committed an unpardonable sin. We know he has, in a few instances, awakened the person the second time - and whether yours may not be one of those few instances, we cannot say. But if this be assured, that every day's delay renders your case more desperate and hopeless.

In the next place, I call upon an enthusiastic extensive class of men to harken to a message from God. I mean those, who are neutral - who apparently neither violently oppose nor cordially receive, the Gospel, and who are willing to let alone religion if religion will let them alone. Such a man may be strictly moral in all his extends external actions: nay, he may be constant in attending upon public worship, and even perhaps upon the special ordinances of the Gospel. But all this and even more is consistent with an entire destitution of vital holiness - may, with the habitual commission of secret, willful sins. Indeed, it is probable, that in Christian countries, this neutral, accommodating course of conduct is adopted by many, because it is the most favorable to uninterrupted and uncensored indulgence in sin; and not because such persons have any more love of religion. For the casual mind, that is, every casual mind, is enmity against God - is not subject to his law, neither indeed can be. That man is not in all cases the greatest sinner, who is apparently so. Every unregenerated person has some predominant passion; and provided he can indulge this, he finds little difficulty in restraining his other passions. If this favorite idol be ambition, or honor, or glory, or vanity, or drunkenness, or reveling - the man cannot worship it in secret, but must expose himself to the public eye. If, however, it be pride or lust or avarice or detraction, this worship may be performed in a great measure in secret. And it is for the interest of such a man, to conceal this devotion - because he may in this way escape the censure of the religious and retain a decent character in society. Hence we see the reason why many, who are respectable in the world as moral and regular men, I found at heart the most bitter opposers of true religion, remaining insensible to every promise and threatening of the Gospel - while others, who are openly corrupt, are converted and saved. Christ has forcibly illustrated this subject by a parable - A certain man had two sons and he came to the first and he said, Son, go work today in my vineyard. He answered and said I will not; but afterward repented and went. And he came to the second and said likewise and he answered and said I go, Sir, and went not. Whether of them twain did the will of his father? They say unto him the first. Jesus saith unto them verily I say unto you, that the publicans and harlots go into the kingdom of heaven before you. The nature of man has not changed since the days of Christ, and this parable is as applicable to thousands in every age as it was to the chief priests and Pharisees. We still seen many an open profligate, abandoning his sins and embracing religion; while many an apparently moral man resists every warning and every invitation and lives and dies without God and without hope. The truth is that the love of sin in such a man is often more rooted than in many of profligate because he has been longer habituated to it. I do not mean to include all unregenerate men who lead moral lives - and thus defend the dangerous error, that the most corrupt and shameless sinners are more likely to receive the grace of God than others.

But I speak here only of those whose habits of sin and irreligion have become so rooted that it seems almost as difficult to abandon them as for the Ethiopian to change his skin or the leopard his spots. And I speak only of those openly corrupt men who have been hurried away by violent temptations or evil companions for a while but whose course of profligacy has been short - And even with these limitations I would not willingly believe that such a man is oftener converted than that description of moral persons above mentioned did not stubborn and undoubted facts show this to be the case.

...can you escape the damnation of hell:

There are others of the numerous class included under the externally moral, whose thoughts and affections are so engrossed in the pursuit of riches, or honors, or glory, that they never spend time to inquire whether the Gospel be true or false; and who, therefore, manifest no opposition to it, provided it does not interfere with their darling pursuits. Were not rich men like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear, they could not be insensible to the alarming declaration of Christ - Woe unto you that are rich; for ye have received your consolation! Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you.

There are others, who are too indolent to examine or oppose religion. You cannot draw them by promises - you cannot awaken them by threatenings. In regard to such, it can only be said Sleep on now and take your rest. Fear not that you shall sleep forever. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout with the voice of the archangel and with the triumph of God.

Others again are trusting to their amiable dispositions and upright conduct for salvation. Oh that such would remember, that the man who had kept all the commandments from his youth up, and whom Christ ever love, yet lacked one thing. He had no treasure in heaven.

And lastly there are others who are endeavouring to gain both this world and the next. These seek to conduct themselves in such a manner that they shall not lose the pleasures of sin, nor the enjoyment of heaven. Their hearts are in truth fully set upon the world; and they attend to religion only during the intervals of relaxation from earthly pursuits. They join perhaps in family prayers, morning and evening, attend church on the Sabbath, and are attentive to all the external duties of religion and with this mint, anise and cumin of piety, they hope to purchase heaven. But know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity against God? Have you never read, that if any man love the world the love of the father is not in him? That you cannot serve two masters? That whosoever, therefore, will be a friend of the world, is the enemy of God?

One more class of men remains to be addressed and I have done. But would it not be in vain to call on the dead to awake and live? Not if God had commanded it: for He is able to make them hear and come forth from the grave. And so is he able to cause those to hear who are dead in trespasses and sins. Through the instrumentality of his word, which is the sword of the Spirit, even the conscience of the thief, the robber, the adulterer, the fornicator, the glutton, the drunkard, the profane, the fraudulent, the dishonest, the slanderer and the Sabbath breaker is sometimes reached, penetrated and aroused. Indeed, how can even such persons, besotted and stupefied as they are, and to every good work reprobate, how can they remain unmoved by the terrors of the Lord, thundered against them in the Bible? Be not deceived neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetors, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God. The fearful and unbelieving, and the abominable and murderers, and whoremongers and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burns with fire and brimstone - and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever.

My hearers it has been my intention in this discourse to address every individual in this assembly. I would hope, indeed, that some of the characters to whom I have spoken, are not to be found among us. Let that point, however, be settled between your own consciences and your God. To the real Christian, I have delivered a message of peace and joy - to the backsliders, a solemn and affectionate reproof - to the anxious enquirer, an earnest admonition to go on, to him once enlightened, but now stupid, a message of terror - to the neutral, externally morrow man, a warning of his danger, and to the openly corrupt the threatenings of the Almighty. And have all the messages died away on the ears of this congregation without reaching a single heart? I do not call upon you to hearken to my words, [in vain to call on the dead] or my message - but to the words of the Bible - to the message of God. If I have said any thing in my own name, you may indeed disregard it and be guiltless - but what the Bible has said in the name of God, I conjure you, disregard not as you love your immortal souls.

Sermon 9 Deceitfulness of the Heart

[Sermon No. 9, "Deceitfulness of the Heart," Jeremiah 17:9, 1820 May,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 1]

Jeremiah 17:9

The highest glory of a Christian consists in disinterested love. Indeed without some portion of this virtue no man can be a Christian. There are some however who doubt even its existence in any human heart: And when we consider how linked is selfishness with almost every creation of man we shall not be surprised at such a doubt. But does not our Saviour describe a disinterested love when he says, Love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again? And Paul also when he says – Love seeketh not her own? Besides no one will doubt that God exercises disinterested benevolence in all his dispensations of grace to our guilty world. And we are commanded to be followers of God as dear children and to be perfect even as our Father which is in heaven is perfect: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. Christ also, in his incarnation sufferings and death to redeem our fallen race, has exhibited a most sublime and unmixed example of disinterested benevolence – And an Apostle hath told us that Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps.

The existence of disinterested love then, in the heart of every man who is a real Christian, is certain. But it is one thing to prove the existence of a principle in a certain class of men and quite a different thing to ascertain whether any individual professing to belong to that class possesses it. And in regard to disinterested love the great difficulty in ascertaining whether we have it does not proceed from its being a feeble principle productive of small effects; but from its being mixed with other things. Among these the most subtle and deceitful is selfishness. Originally this possesses the undivided empire of the human heart. And when disinterested love is there implanted by the Spirit of God, selfishness is indeed dethroned, but not expelled: And were it content to remain subordinate to universal benevolence its existence would be right and lawful. But it is a principle that is never satisfied with a part. It continually cries give, give and maintains a constant warfare for regaining its lost dominion over the heart. And in order to effect this it transforms itself into almost every shape and is thus often mistaken for holiness. So closely does it link itself with disinterested love that it is often impossible and always difficult to separate them. Yet it is extremely important that this separation be made: for if a man cannot determine that he possesses disinterested love he has no rational evidence that he is a Christian. Since a religion that begins and ends with self is not the religion of the Gospel. It will then be profitable to point out some instances where this great enemy of our souls may be present – and secretly move our hearts when we suppose ourselves guided by purer motives. In other words I shall endeavor to show our danger of being deceived by our hearts in those exercises and actions which are considered the highest evidence of regeneration and sanctification. And I shall include these exercises and actions under two general classes –

First, as relating to our fellow man, and second as relating to God.

I am then first to show our danger of mistaking the motives that influence us to perform many good actions toward our fellow men. And I would premise that to be influenced in our Christian conduct by the hope of rewards in heaven – of a crown of immortal glory – is not inconsistent with disinterested love – unless this be the sole motive of our conduct: for we are no where commanded to love our neighbor better than ourselves – and by receiving our own eternal happiness we increase the sum of universal happiness – since there is joy in heaven over sinner that repenteth. But if in seeking for an eternal inheritance we prefer ourselves to all others - even to the universe and to God, we are selfish and shall perform the duties we owe our neighbors, with an entire reference to our own good – and without any real desire to help him or to make him happy. If such a motive lies at the bottom of all our religion, it will of course influence us in all our conduct towards our fellow men. It will cause us to contribute of our substance to feed the poor – yea and that secretly too. It will cause us to warn the wicked from his way of sin – to enter into our closets and pray for the conversion of our neighbor – for the conversion of the distant heathen and even for the forgiveness of our bitterest enemies: And we shall be prompted to do these things for this plain reason – that we fear if we leave them undone we shall not secure future happiness – since we are commanded by God thus to give and thus to pray. But all this time we may feel no real earnest wish to make the heathen – or the sinner – or our enemy happier by their conversion unless this will be the means of securing heaven for ourselves. In other words were we certain that we should never enter heaven we should perform no such actions nor make any such prayers.

Thus we perceive that selfishness on this kind may produce effects so similar to the fruit of disinterested benevolence that we can easily confound them, but not easily distinguish them. And it is believed that this is one of the deepest sources of deception in the human heart. A person is brought by some alarming providence to realize his danger of eternal misery while destitute of an interest in Jesus Christ. With this danger before him he exercises repentance genuine as he supposes but in reality resulting merely and solely from the fear that his sins will bring him into eternal torments. He now determines to embrace religion and sets about the performance of its various duties to himself his fellow man and is God. But all this while the fear of punishment or the hope of happiness is the sole motive that influences him. And yet he is so blinded that he supposes himself to love his neighbor as himself and his God with all his heart and mind and strength. Whereas, in truth, he feels no other complacence or benevolence toward man than what springs from instinctive piety - or compassion and his feelings towards God at the best are no more than gratitude for an expected favour - and are no different from what they would be if a cruel tyrant were at the head of the universe who should grant to him a similar hope of eternal life. Such a man at the last day will realize for the first time that heart is deceitful above all things.

This is not however the only case in which selfishness may operate in such a manner as to be mistaken for disinterested love. We will suppose a man to enter his closet where no eye but that of God seeth him and there to pray to his Father who siteth in secret. Can it be that selfishness will accompany him here - even before the immediate presence of God? Must not every illusion that blinded his eyes in the world be here destroyed? And must it not be purity for the sake of holiness and a love of communion with God that he has come thither? It is possible that this man may still have a reference to the world - He may hope that the world will some way or other learn that he is in the daily habit of secret devotion - and hence be induced to honor him as a saint. Or it may be he daily performs his duty, with a view to the approbation of some friend to whom he expects afterward to communicate the fact - or he may do it because others do - and he is unwilling to be outdone by anyone. Does he pray for the conversion of his sinful neighbor? May he not do this from a desire to see that neighbor humbled and come to him for direction - whose direction he had always despised and whose principles he had always resisted? If he pray for the conversion of the heathen and the enlargement of the Redeemer's kingdom – it may be all this is from a wish to gratify pride of opinion: For he may have asserted before some one who disbelieved and ridiculed the idea that the heathen could ever be converted, that such would be the case: And now perhaps he prays for it that may have the gratification of triumphing over this man. Perhaps he prays that his wicked enemy may be converted and perhaps too the motive that drew forth this prayer might be a wish to see this enemy humbled at his feet and imploring his forgiveness.

We will now suppose a man to perform a deed of charity in secret - so secret indeed that not even the poor man who is relieved knows who is his benefactor. Yet did it not occur to this man that in some way or other this generous deed might be known at a future day - when he should have not only the honor of performing it but the still greater honor of keeping it secret? Or did he not often feel a strong disposition to communicate the fact to some near friend that he might stand still higher in his estimation? Or did not the thought occur to him that should his character hereafter be attached, the bringing to light of this disinterested and would be a triumphant vindication? All such suggestions as these springing up in the mind of the giver indicate at least that selfishness is not entirely eradicated from the heart, and that it means to share in the profits of the deed.

But suppose a man secretly to devote a sum of money to the aid of missionary exertions among the heathen - can this be selfish? It may be this man has been charged at a former period with ostentatiously displaying his charity - and still remembering it he determines to make a secret donation that he may bring to light if necessary to refute any future charges of a similar kind. Or he may live in a part of the world where missionary exertions are unpopular and the fear of injuring his profession or his business may prevent him from acting publicly.

If then even in the most secret acts of charity there be danger that selfishness is the motive - how much greater this danger when the deed is published? Where it will be inserted in the religious publications of the day - and where he will be praised for it in the most public places? Let no man trust to such deeds for a proof of his love to God.

Another duty and excellence of the Christian humility. This is exercised towards God and towards man - I am here to put an instance of it as exercised towards the latter. You see this person apparently not thinking of himself above what he ought to think in the presence of his fellow men - and esteeming others better than himself. He is also condescending and gentle toward all men. And this is not mere appearance: but the man is sincere and really feels humble. But selfishness has a thousand artifices - and has ensnared this man where he least suspects it - He is proud of his humility. Were he removed from the public view where he could not exhibit his humility to the world he would cease to be humble. He now takes every opportunity to display his humble spirit before man - to influence them to do likewise as he flatters himself - but in truth to gain distinction.

We may also acquire the habit of humility before our fellow men and deceive ourselves with the idea that it is humility of heart. We may feel desirous of obtaining the good will of the world; and discover that nothing is so popular as a humble obliging disposition. Hence we make an effort to exercise such a disposition in all our public conduct - and soon acquired a habit of doing this - although our hearts are yet unhumiliated and selfish. We soon flatter ourselves however that our humility is genuine the fruit of holiness and this do our hearts deceive us because we do not look to God who is greater than our hearts and knoweth all things.

And is it possible that pride should be the reigning principle within us when we suppose ourselves most free from it? A proud humility! What a contradiction to exist in the same character! O, the heart is

I proceed to the second general division of this discourse where I am to show our danger of mistaking selfishness for disinterested love or holiness in our exercises and duties towards God. And here the remark that was illustrated under the first general head may be repeated – that our own final happiness may be the only motive by which we are actuated in all our religious exercises and duties not only towards man but also towards God. This motive indeed does and ought to have a powerful influence upon the real Christian: but the soul on which the lost image of God was instamped could not avoid loving this character independently of this consideration: because there is a resemblance between the nature of God and this soul and similarity of dispositions and aims is the only permanent ground of complacency or love between different beings. If we love God because we expect he will bestow upon us eternal life, this love is gratitude only. I would not indeed represent this as an unworthy affection, when joined with the love of complacency: but separate from this it is not that love which the Gospel requires - or rather the Gospel requires both. The love of gratitude alone cannot fit us to enjoy heaven: because a man may possess it while his heart is opposed to the holiness that will constitute the pleasure of heaven. When he views God as his benefactor he may feel a delight and complacency in his character, but when he views him as his righteous judge - who will render to every man according to his works and who will by no means clear the guilty when he views Him as the unbending Sovereign of the Universe, ordering all things after the council of his own will, and for his own glory - so far is he from loving such a God that he will hate him – and it was not God that he before loved - but only an attribute of God - that is mercy. Here then we see more clearly the difference between the love of gratitude and the love of complacency. The first respects only a part of God and the latter that God perfect in the possession of every every attribute. Yet the effects of both kinds of love are so similar that we are extremely liable to mistake the one for the other. Hence results are danger of being deceived.

But this is not the only form in which selfishness presents itself as the rival of God in our affections and conduct: And I shall endeavor to point out a few more instances where we are in danger from this subtle enemy.

Secret prayer long continued is generally regarded as a good evidence of regeneration. But is it not possible that a man may be influenced to the performance of this from a secret hope that it will increase his reputation in the world as a religious man? He may live among those who regard a man according to his religion and who will not tolerate a neutral Christian and rather than openly oppose such he will persevere in this duty. I do not mean that the man himself supposes he is actuated by any such motive, but may not his love of public favor or fear of public reproach operate insensibly upon him so powerfully as to produce this effect while he hopes it is the influence of the Spirit. Or this man may have some near friend who is so anxious for his salvation that he gives him no rest until he enters upon a course of Christian duty: And the man being of a yielding disposition and besides believing it well to be religious, is moved by this friendly importunity to set about securing his salvation. Now is it not possible that he may continue for a long time in the practice of secret prayer through fear of meeting the reproofs of this friend? When excited to reflection by the solicitations of this friend he made an effort to work up his feelings into a religious frame and succeeded in producing some confused emotions in his heart. These it is true did not continue long: but concluding himself converted this does not trouble him: And although he finds his closet exercises to be very formal and cold yet he imputes this to the peculiar steadiness of his disposition and not to his want of love to God. And this selfishness, transformed into an angel of light, has completely fastened him in bondage.

But what if in our secret devotions we are not mere formalists - and have our feelings excited - and mourn and weep over our sins apparently after a godly manner - can there be any deception here? It may be that the sins of which we mourn affect our worldly interest or injure our health - indeed what sin does not produce one or both of these effects. Now it may be that here is the cause of our penitential tears and not because we have offended a holy Being and broken in upon the harmony of the Universe and ruined an immortal soul.

But further what if we fervently pray for an increase of holiness in our hearts. Let the enquiry here be made are we not at the time unusually disgusted with the world in consequence of some bitter disappointment - and do we not resort to religion and feel a desire to possess more of it solely because the world has failed to satisfy us - not because we love religion? Should our earthly prospects again brighten, would not our longings after heaven pass away as the morning cloud and as the early dew?

We will now examine for a moment the case of a man who has devoted himself sincerely as he supposes to the service of the Lord in body and in spirit - and who is ardent in the cause of his Redeemer in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation. Formerly perhaps this man was diffident before men but now he is not ashamed of the gospel of Christ - and lifts up his banners in the name of God - calling upon the wicked to flee to the strong hold of safety. Now in regard to the zeal of this man we will make ~~no~~ ~~several~~ suppositions. Perhaps he is tried in vain to rise to distinction in the world by any of the ordinary paths - as by riches or learning - or eloquence. Mortified and disappointed he resorts to religion and resolve sincerely to embrace it. But he has not proceeded far in it before he perceives that even here is a chance for preeminence. His efforts are now redoubled and his zeal renewed - and all from the influence of the love of distinction but as he supposes through the influence of the Spirit. You may object to this supposition that his pride would never submit to the humbling doctrines of the Gospel unless broken by the grace of God: but my brethren do you not know that ambition will submit to anything if it can finally attain its object?

We will now suppose this man to be one who has neither those talents nor riches that are necessary to make him distinguished in the world - and who must therefore drag through life in obscurity unless he can devise some other mode of rising to eminence. He finds that his exertions in the cause of religion excite the attention of men - and his apparent devotion to the cause of Christ gains him many admirers and furnishes a passport into the best society. Is any other subject but religion introduced before him - he speaks of it with contempt and endeavors to exclude it from conversation - because as he supposes he loves religion better than everything else but in truth because he is ignorant of every other subject and is too proud to expose his ignorance. O in how many forms may sin lurk in our hearts and cheat our souls of heaven!

A love of the word of God is one of the attendants upon regeneration and ordinarily furnishes no inconsiderable evidence of this change - Yet here too our great spiritual enemy selfishness lies in wait to deceive. We may have a love for contending or arguing upon doctrinal subjects - and if such be the case we shall soon perceive the need of a thorough acquaintance with the Scriptures: And if we chance to be defeated by an adversary but once in consequence of our ignorance of the bible we shall set about reading it with unwearied eagerness - Our pride has been wounded and will give us no rest until it be avenged. This excitement grounded wholly in pride we mistake for love to the word of God - Or if we have not a disposition to engage in disputation concerning religion there will be many instances in which we should feel much mortified by an ignorance of the bible - and this consideration alone may induce us to apply ourselves to a diligent searching of the Scriptures.

In like manner we may account for a disposition to attend on all the ordinances of the Gospel where there is no love to God. These ordinances are public - and offer a fair opportunity for gratifying the lust of the eye and the pride of life. But it is so evident that we are in danger of deceiving ourselves in this respect that it is unnecessary to dwell upon the subject.

I have thus far considered our danger of being deceived by selfishness in the Christian exercises and doctrines - And this indeed is our greatest enemy: but this is not the only one. Thus, an increase of the graces of the heart and the virtues of the life is regarded as one of the best evidences of our possessing religion. But here habit may deceive us - For when we have been long habituated to anything it becomes easier and more pleasant even if it were disgusting at first. Hence when we think we derive more pleasure from secret prayer and communion with God - and feel more devoted to the Lord and more humble than we once did may not all this result from being long in the habit of such prayer - such devotion and such humility rather than from an actual increase of these graces in the heart?

We are in danger also of self - deception from our animal instinct and feelings - Thus when we read the history of the Redeemer how innocent and spotless was his life and how unjust and cruel his sufferings and death we weep over the descriptions and suppose our sorrow to rise from our love to his character. Yet should we not feel a similar sorrow were we to read the history of the sufferings of some other great and innocent man? But this subject of the influence of animal feelings upon the religion of the heart is too extensive to admit of examination at this time.

I have endeavored my Christian brethren at this time to exhibit some of those modes in which we may be deceived by selfishness in the discharge of our most solemn and sacred duties to God and man. And may I not appeal to your experience for proof that I have not been pointing out dangers that are merely imaginary? Have you not often in seasons of self-examination found difficulty in deciding whether all your exercises and actions did not result from selfish or instinctive feelings? It may perhaps be [????] that I am exciting needless fears and [????] thus drive the humble Christian to despair. Far be it from me my brethren to sound a false alarm or distress a believer without a cause. For is it not a fact that where one man is driven to despair by too rigid rules of self-examination thousands perish by listening to the cry of peace, peace when there is no peace? Can we be too particular in looking into our own hearts? Can we be too vigilant in spying out the secret lurking places of the enemies of our souls? It is not supposed however that every Christian will be able to trace his own exercises and actions all the distinctions that have been made in this discourse. And this leads me to state the important inference to be derived from this subject. We are hereby taught our own weakness and dependence on God. So long as we suppose our spiritual foes to be few and our spiritual wants small we shall rely on our own strength. But when we realize that the enemies of our salvation lie in wait for us in our most secret and solemn exercises - even in the holy of holies - and that the heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked- giving us all confidence in ourselves, we cry out with the Psalmists, who can understand his errors? Cleanse thou me from secret faults. Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me and know my thoughts; And see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting. Yes we must resort to God for light and for direction and if we put all our confidence in Him, His spirit will be a wall of fire round about us - His holy word will become a sword turning every way to defend us from evil. If any man lacks wisdom let him ask of God who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not - what shall be given him - Christ will put all enemies at his feet - keep him from the evil that is in this world and finally conduct him to immortal glory.

Sermon 10 Christians Weep Over Sinners

[Sermon No. 10, "Christians Weep Over Sinners," Luke 19:41, 1820 Feb,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 2]

Luke 19:41

And when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it.

And who is this thus giving vent to his feelings? Surely it must be some one who being forewarned of a dreadful calamity about to befall his native city is touched in his heart with the reflection that all his possessions and dearest friends may perish in the approaching ruin. In that city was he born - and educated in the midst of the ease - of learning - refinement and friendship. There he has been long respected - loved and honoured. How many tender and overwhelming emotions now crowd upon his soul as from an eminence this city with all its spires and palaces - its crowded marts and busy streets - burst upon his sight and seems to fill all the plain. Soon will this world in miniature move full of life and pleasure where they are eating and drinking marrying and giving in marriage - soon will it be burnt with fire or buried by an earthquake or blasted by a hurricane. And then what weeping and wailing - will succeed to this scene of happiness! Perhaps too he will be the first messenger to convey to the inhabitant the warning of its overthrow.

But my hearers I need not tell you that this description by no means corrects. Jerusalem was this city and he who wept over it the Redeemer of mankind - the man of sorrows who has not where to lay his head - the persecuted despised and hated Jesus? He had indeed a prophetic view of the dreadful ruin that would soon overtake the place. He saw that the days would come upon it, that its enemies should cast a trench about it and compass it round and keep it in on every side - and lay it even with the ground and the child within it - and that they should not leave in it one stone upon another - and that there should be great distress in the land and wrath upon the people - and that they should fall by the edges of the sword and be led way captive into all nations and Jerusalem be trodden down of the Gentiles until the time of the Gentiles be fulfilled. All these woes did the Redeemer foresee: but they were to come upon Jerusalem. And this was not the city of his birth - nor of his possessions - nor of his friends. It was on the other hand the city whose rulers were his most bitter enemies - whose people were plotting his destruction and whose voice he already heard with a prophetic ear, crying with savage ferocity - away with him, away with him. Crucify him - crucify him. O Jerusalem, Jerusalem those that killest the prophets art stoned them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered my children together even as a hen gathers her children under her wings and ye would not. Behold your house is left unto you desolate! Here my brethren is love stronger than death. And fulfilled so that was now what whatever was underneath that crucify him crucify him in short just be sure you in short it was a city by whose walls his omniscient already saw his own cross training with his wife. Over the city did Jesus weep. And how tender his Lamentations.

[The following paragraph was written on a small piece of paper laid over page 4; it may have been intended as an insert, or as an alternate, to the previous paragraph.]

In short it was the city by whose walls his omniscient eye already saw his own cross streaming with his blood. Yet over this city did Jesus weep. And how tender his lamentation!

But it was not for the temporal miseries of Jerusalem that the Redeemer poured forth his tears. He most of all over her moral desolations - over her people, blinded in heart - her temple polluted - the holy of holies profaned - and his long suffering God, insulted. These were the cause of all his miseries. These drew down the wrath of heaven. And not even the tears of the Son of God could save her from destruction: for her cup of iniquity was full.

The doctrine I would derive from the interesting fact here related to our Saviour, is this - It is the duty of Christians to weep over sinners.

1. Because all such are blinded [This head is crossed out.]
2. Because their destruction is impending
3. Because they are blinded.

Yet in the third place notwithstanding this overwhelming prospect before him the sinner is blinded to its terrors and sits unconcerned in the very jaws of destruction. We cannot avoid feeling of compassion for the man who is born blind - or is deprived of his vision by any accident or disease. All the rich scenes in the heavens above and on earth beneath from which we derive so much pleasure - and the face of kindred and of friends - are shut out from him - and he grope through the world in continual darkness. And if such an one persisted in going towards a precipice - which he saw not and down which he must inevitably fall - and if you could not persuade him to turn his steps how great would be your grief and anguish. But how much more pitiable is it to see an immortal soul capable of knowing, loving and enjoying its Creator forever and ever - voluntarily blinded to its true interest and danger and with a headstrong madness pressing toward the gulph of everlasting perdition! Yet such is the case with every man whose supreme affections are not fixed on another world.

In the first place he is blind to his true interest. I do not mean that he is blind to his worldly interest. For to secure this he will rise up early, and sit up late, and eat the bread of carefulness. No labours - no solicitude - no watchfulness are too arduous and distressing if they result in an increase of his possessions or his honors. But present religion to the mind of the sinner in all its winning and glorious aspects - and you seem to him as one who speaketh in parables. Perhaps he will listen to you for a moment and be pleased with something in your appearance or manner: but you cannot reach his heart. Press the doctrines of the Gospel upon him still closer - try every point of approach - appeal to his reason - to his imagination and his feelings and explore every avenue to his conscience. You will labor in vain. You cannot penetrate that thick darkness which envelopes his mind.

Now this blindness cannot proceed from a want of evidence to religion or from its being a matter of small importance. For so decisive is this evidence that few at this day think of questioning it. And as to its importance if you present the case simply unfairly to any man however abandoned he will acknowledge that it is infinitely important to tell him that his life is short, uncertain, and full of trouble and disappointment - and that its best pursuits do not afford any permanent enjoyment and he will acknowledge all this because he feels it in his own experience. Tell him further that there is a God - and that it is probable even from reason alone that the soul will exist in another state - and that therefore it is wise to prepare for that state - with all diligence and immediately since such preparation will not lessen; but increase the real enjoyments of this life - and he will assent to all this. But urge him now to act on these principles - and to submit to the Gospel - and you will find him like the deaf adder that stoppeh her ear. His heart will resist and repel every such conviction of his understanding. O Christian weep in secret places for such an one, for he has eyes to see but seeth not - he has ears to hear and heareth not. His understanding is darkened - being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in him because of the blindness of his heart.

Secondly the sinner is blind to his danger.

Were you to see a man rushing into the devouring flames – or down a precipice it would need little argument to convince you that such an one was blind. And is it not equally clear that he is blind whose every step whose every action brings him nearer the pit of everlasting destruction? You will see the sinner awake and alive to every danger that threatens his temporal comforts. Does the fire threaten to devour his dwelling - the floods to destroy his harvest - the thief to invade his possessions – the slanderer to rob him of his reputation - or the envious to cheat him of his honors? Mark how pale and emaciated that man appears in consequence of his anxieties and watchings on these accounts. How much solicitude - how many sleepless nights - how the fear of these things cost him? Nay more he not only fears when there are real temporal dangers before him - but he fancies dangers that have no existence - yet they torment him month after month and year after year. O where he as anxious - as quick cited and as faithful to discern his spiritual dangers all would be well. But the fear of dwelling in everlasting burnings with dogs and sorcerers and whoremongers and murderers and idolaters and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie - the fear of being cast into outer darkness where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched where is weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth - all these things to which he knows himself exposed do not cost him one sleepless hour and scarcely one anxious thought. You may urge him most earnestly and most affectionately to remember that he must die - but you cannot fasten his thoughts for one hour upon the grave or upon that world of torments beyond it. Is not this blindness – nay more is it not infatuation and self murder?

It has been shown in that in what respects the sinner is blind - and we will next enquire what it is that has blinded him.

And first he is blinded by the world.

The very blessings that are bestowed by a bountiful God upon man become by his abuse of them - the means of hardening his heart and blinding his eyes. He forgets whence his mercies flow and imputes them to his own prudence and management. His affections become supremely fixed upon earthly possessions and enjoyments - and he is more and more alienated from God in his feelings and conduct because, if any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him. Indeed through the whole N. Testament the love of the world and the love of God are described as directly opposite. Where the world prevails God is not in all the thoughts. Ye cannot serve God and Mammon is the testimony of Christ - his Apostles - his martyrs and all his true followers. Hence when men will persist notwithstanding this testimony to set their affections supremely on the world, they are given up to strong delusions to believe a lie. Suppose a man to be ardent in the pursuit of riches - to devote all his time and thoughts to their acquisition. How will his heart thus upon gold revolt when he hears the command of Christ - go and sell that thou hast and give to the poor and thou shalt have treasure in heaven! This work be a hard saying and he like the young man to whom it was addressed will go away sorrowful: but his sorrow will be that of the world which worketh death - and not that godly service that worketh repentance unto life.

Suppose a man to be supremely devoted to the attainment of worldly honours. How will he bear the reproof of Christ, How can ye believe which receive honor one of another and see not the honor that cometh from God only? He will not bear it but resist it and thus render his heart still blinder and harder. And need I say that the soul which is sunk in sensuality is thus blinded to the glorious light of the Gospel? Can a man thus brutalized receive pleasure from considering God as him who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity - as the holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty?

The truth is, my brethren, an inordinate love of the world spreads before the eyes of our mind such a thick darkness that we cannot penetrate the pure regions of heaven. We are what Paul calls natural men - the natural man receives not the things of the Spirit of God because they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned. Yes, here is the whole difficulty - we are blind and pleased with our blindness or rather do not know it. So that Spiritual things appear to us mere folly. We are chained down to a contracted spot of earth - and our immortal souls found to rise and expand - make no struggle to burst their vile fetters. Such and so powerful is the influence of the world over the heart of the sinner.

But there is another subtle and powerful enemy that leads him astray from holiness and this is the prince of the power of the air. Let the sinner scoff at the idea, but it is true, if the bible be true, that he is led captive by Satan at his will. This great enemy of all righteousness is permitted to have a powerful influence over his mind and to turn him still farther from God. He daily watches to ensnare him by new temptations - he inflames his passions and stirs up his hatred of God - and makes him a willing and obedient subject of his will. Perhaps I shall be charged with imputing cruelty to God by representing Satan thus active in his influence upon men: but my hearers what says the bible? Ye are of your father the Devil, says Christ to the ungodly Jews, and the lusts of your Father ye will do.

Paul speaks of the Prince of the power of the air who now worketh in the children of disobedience - and in another place, that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the Devil who are taken captive by him at his will. And again he says, Lest Satan should get an advantage of us; for we are not ignorant of his devices. Also in other places he says, Neither give place to the Devil - put on the whole armor of God, that he may be able to stand against the wiles of the Devil. Says Peter, Be sober, be vigilant, because your adversary the Devil as a roaring lion walketh about seeking whom he may devour. If these texts and many more that might be named do not represent men as being influenced by the prince of darkness, what language can do it. But as to the charge against the justice of God derived from this doctrine, there is no foundation for it. Because men are perfectly voluntary and free in permitting this great adversary to operate upon their hearts. Resist the Devil, says an apostle, and he will flee from you. By their sins against God, men alienate themselves from him - and invite the influence of the Prince of darkness. They voluntarily perform his will - whether they know it or not - they delight in his character - whether they know it or not - and the influence he is permitted to exert upon them is only to help them forward in their own chosen way. They therefore cannot complain of God for not protecting them since they have made themselves enemies to God by wicked works and ranged themselves under the banner of the great enemy of God.

O Christian does not your heart melt within you, for the unhappy sinner who is blind to his true interest and his danger and who is a willing and obedient subject to the most cruel and malicious being in the universe - led captive by him at his will chained as a bond slave to his chariot to perform the vilest offices - and trampled under his feet. And worse than all this sinner loves his vile condition and will not exchange it to be made a king and a priest unto God! All the glories and the joys of heaven are suspended over his head and within his reach, in vain. You may point him to the new Jerusalem with its walls of precious stones - its gates of pearl and its pavements of gold - where there is no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it because the glory of God enlightens it and the Lamb is the light thereof. You may there direct his eye to the pure river of the water of life clear as crystal proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb - to the tree of life and its branches which beareth all manner of fruits and yieldeth her fruits every month and standeth in the midst of the paradise of God. You may exhibit before him a merciful God exhausting the stores of his compassion to win him to that place of happiness – nay you may call upon him to look at the Son of God. Standing as a day's man between earth and heaven and reaching forth to him a crown of immortal glory. Yet by all these glories and invitations and joys you will find the sinner unmoved. So think a the film is before his eyes - so thick is the darkness that Satan and the world have cast about him that not even the light of heaven can penetrate it. Nor will it by any more availing to him to look downward into those flames that rise forever and ever from the bottomless gulph beneath his feet. You behold him suspended between heaven and hell by those cords of love which God yet fastens to our guilty race. But every day does the weight of his sins increase - and one by one are these cords broken and the sinner continually descends farther from heaven. His eyes become more blinded - the calls of mercy more faint and the warnings of the Spirit more few. Even now is the sword of God's justice raised to cut the last cord that holds him above the lake of fire. It lingers for a moment, over the blow, being held back by a pleading Saviour. But it must fall - it has fallen - it is finished. Yes it has fallen upon thousands who are now lifting up their eyes in hell being in torment. (See last page but one)

In the first place then I assert that it is the duty of the Christian to weep in view of the sinner because his destruction is impending.

Were he to continue the servant of sin and of Satan under circumstances as favourable as he enjoys in this life, his condition would not be so pitiable. There is so much in education example and the fear of worldly reproach to prevent the genuine effects of sin in this world: that it is here comparatively harmless – nay the sinner derives much transient pleasure from the practice of it - and will not believe that its nature is so ruinous and dreadful as it is described in the bible. But this scene of things will soon have a close - how soon to anyone of us God only knows. The chaff will be separated from the wheat and the wheat will be gathered into the garner - but the chaff will be burned with fire unquenchable. In describing the place of torment prepared for every sinner stronger or more alarming language cannot be used than is found in the Bible. It is called a lake which burneth with fire and brimstone - the furnace of fire - a place of utter darkness and of the blackness of darkness where is weeping and gnashing of teeth - the shadow of death - the bottomless pit – and the winepress of the wrath of God. Into such a place of torment must every sinner enter at death - and the restraint that in this world so much modify and soften the effects of sin will be taken away and the miserable beings be left to feel the fury of sinful unbridled ungratified and undying desires. There too will the sinner realize the justice of his doom and every new pang that he feels will swell the agonizing idea that he might have escaped that place of woe.

Such that will be the destruction of every sinner at death. But when will this period arrive? Perhaps not until threescore years and ten have passed. Press within one year - one month - one day - one hour - nay perhaps this moment. Do you ask proof of this? Look abroad into the world and see a thousand falling at your side and ten thousand at your right hand. Among these you will find persons of all ages and descriptions. Destruction then impends over the sinner every hour. Perhaps the next moment he may begin to feel the gnawing of the worm that never dies. He stands as it were balancing between life and death. And but a single thread move but one inch - and he is fallen. O is there no method to save them? Entreat him in the most tender manner to escape from his danger and if he will not listen to you stretch forth your hand and pluck him from the precipice. Alas he is deaf to your warnings - he resists all your kind efforts - and soon the shaft of death will smite him, when he will be beyond the regions of mercy. Weep then over the ruin of this immortal soul with the lamentation of Christ over Jerusalem, saying, if thou hast known, even thou, at least in this day the things which belong unto thy peace! But now they are hid from thine eyes.

Secondly - another argument to move the compassion of the Christian for the sinner is found in the fact that his destruction will be an everlasting destruction. However aggravated the punishment of the wicked in the world it might be tolerable were it to have an end. But when we add the word eternal to this punishment it becomes too great and terrible to comprehend much less to endure. When it is said that the sinner shall be thrust into a furnace of fire for thousand years, we can form some faint idea of his suffering. Let this thousand years be repeated a thousand times and we have some imperfect conception of the duration and magnitude of his torments. Let this number be repeated many millions of times and we do not even entirely lose the idea. But when it is said that this immense period is literally nothing in comparison with eternity - we are confounded and can pursue the plot no farther. Yet there is no doctrine of the bible - not even the being and Attributes of God more clearly revealed than is that of eternal torments. How solemn and yet how decided on this point is that description Christ has given of the day of judgment and of the fate of every sinner. The judge will first separate all mankind into two great classes - no one recollect is excepted - Then shall he say to them on the left hand depart from me ye cursed into everlasting fire prepared for the Devil and his angels - And these shall go away into everlasting punishment. But the righteous into an everlasting life. And throughout the bible the state that follows death is described as unchanging. Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, says Solomon, do it with thy might: for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave wither thou goest. And there is an inspired comment on the passage, he that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still: and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still: he that is holy, let him be holy still. O it is the word eternal that gives an overwhelming solemnity to the subject. It is this word which makes heaven supremely desirable and hell supremely horrible. When the sinner has felt for millions of ages the unceasing pang of his torments he is no nearer that point of decrease as when he can look forward to their termination. He may often break in upon the solemn silence of this prison by calling aloud for mercy and deliverance: but the only answer he will ever hear to this pleading voice will be an echo from every side of those gloomy mansions, it is eternal! (See last leaf)

Christian brethren, I know that I need not make any further appeal to those who have drunk unto the Spirit of Christ. You cannot refuse to weep over a fellow man - so blind - so secure - so exposed and so perverted. All your Christian sympathies will be awakened and you will exclaim with the Prophet - O that my head were waters and mine eyes a fountain of tears that I might weep day and night over this ruined immortal soul! And such a feeling as this will prompt you to what? - to pray for sinners - It is true that you can scarcely do anything to offend them more. Let it be known to a sinner that a Christian is going to his closet and is there supplicating God to convert and save him - and the sinner will despise him and hate him. If then you weep and pray for your sinful neighbors you may expect to feel his resentment - to have all manner of evil spoken of you falsely - and to be spitefully used. But let this only stir you up not to to revenge but to weep more bitterly and pray more fervently as did your Redeemer over that city which hated him and was ready to crucify him. And God peradventure will give him repentance to the acknowledging of the truth. He will not weep for himself - he will not pray for himself – Have mercy upon him then and weep for his tears and pray his prayers - or he is without a friend in a world of enemies. Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth, and one convert him; Let him know, that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins. And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever.

[This may be the original ending of the sermon. The following, possibly an alternate ending added later, may be the “last leaf” referred to above.]

Finally there is one consideration that appears one would think with almost irresistible power to a large proportion of the professing Christians whom I address. To some of the individuals who are in the alarming condition which I have described they are bound by the strongest natural ties. They my brethren are your own neighbours, your own brothers or sisters, your fathers or mothers, your wives or husbands, or your own children. And were your faith in as lively exercise as the Redeemer your tears could not but flow as you think upon the prospects. Amiable as they now seem to you yet having never been renewed by the Spirit of God they must feel his most terrible wrath the moment death takes them out of the world. Do you fancy that some how or other they will escape? Never; except by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost. O what a state of stupidity must you be in, not to see and feel and weep over their prospects! Your insensibility is more difficult to explain than theirs; for you profess to have some spiritual life while they are spiritually dead! Is it not probable that you are so too? How deeply are we affected when we see severe temporal sufferings imposed over nearest friends. But unspeakable and everlasting sufferings impend every hour over those who are bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. And yet we feel it not. Oh if we had the Spirit of Christ deep – intense - would be our agony - and with Paul we should cry out, I say the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost, that I have great heaviness and continual sorrow of heart. For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh. Not only should we weep bitter tears but we should pray like him in an agony: and we should labour and strive for their conversion as if everything else were of no importance. Is there a spirit among us anything like this? If not it is not strange that so many of our children and friends remain under the wrath and curse of Almighty God. And there until you and I my Christian brothers and sisters awake to their danger and our duty must they live. Nor is the period distant when to awake will be in vain. Their efforts will be forever sealed: and as they pass into eternity unconverted we shall hear them dying cry, too late - too late. Oh can you or I be happy in heaven so long as memory reminds us that our stupidity and unfaithfulness have sent a friend or even a child down to the world of despair!

Sermon 11 Character and Offices of Christ

[Sermon No. 11, "Character and Offices of Christ," Luke 24:30-31, 1820 Mar 28,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 2]

Luke 24:30,37

And it came to pass as he sat at meat with them he took bread and blessed it, and brake and gave to them, And their eyes were opened and they knew him.

At the age of the world when the profession of Christianity is attended with so little hazard of reputation or life we can form but an imperfect conception of that distressing anxiety and trial of faith experienced by the disciples of Christ during the period between his crucifixion and resurrection. In defiance of Jewish rulers and nation they had forsaken and followed him who would as they supposed restore again the kingdom of Israel. By miracles he performed they were confirmed of the opinion that he had power to effect such a political revolution and Christ did not think proper to undeceive them on this point. But they saw their master yield himself without a struggle into the hands of his enemies. They saw him led to the judgment seat of Pilate and when they expected he would call down fire from heaven to consume all his adversaries - they saw him led forth to be crucified as a lamb to the slaughter. Yet perhaps he would display his power on the cross and make the overthrow of his enemies more signal and complete. No, he bowed his head and gave up the ghost. Now had his enemies triumphed. And where should his despised and persecuted disciples hide their heads? Ought they to regard Christ as an imposter and his mighty works a deception? No - the spotless purity of life and his numberless deeds of private beneficence which they had witnessed - disproved such a supposition? Ought they to blame them? No: the proof that Christ was the promised Messiah were too numerous to be resisted by an honest mind and they felt that in all their sacrifices they were sincere. What then must they conclude? Christ had indeed given the intimations of his resurrection: but they did not understand them - They could therefore come to no conclusion - nor decide what course of conduct to pursue - They could not however give up all hope though every ground for hope seemed taken away - They met together and reviewed the astonishing events they had witnessed that now appeared to them as a dream. The second day was now finished and yet all was still at the tomb of Jesus - Yet was it sealed - closed by a great stone and encircled by a band of Roman soldiers. All hope seemed now at an end, but pious affection which outlives hope was yet active - and on the morning of the third day those women who had bathed the feet of their living Lord with tears now went to his sepulchre to embalm him dead and lo the soldiers had fled - the stone was rolled away - the body of Jesus was gone and there was a vision of angels. When all this was told by the women to the disciples they were indeed astonished but many of them could not believe that Christ was truly risen: And on the same day two of them went from Jerusalem to the village of Emmaus. The death and reported resurrection of their Lord as might be expected was the subject of their conversation by the way. And though a ray of hope had burst upon their midnight of darkness and doubt they were yet in suspense - But the hour had arrived when their joy should be full - For Jesus himself drew near and went with them - although their eyes were holden that they should not know him - They knew indeed that they were in the presence of some Superior mind for their hearts burnt within them as he opened to them the Scriptures and showed from the prophets that it was necessary Christ should thus suffer. But when he sat down with them at their table and blessed and broke bread their eyes were opened and they knew him. There was indeed something miraculous both in blinding the eyes of the disciples that they should not know Christ and in opening them to recognize him - But there was also evidently an allusion to that supper of which Jesus partook with his disciples on the evening of the passover and which he appointed to be observed in his church through all generations. This circumstance was probably the means employed to bring Christ more distinctly to their recollection: For could they ever have forgotten the looks - the attitude and the words of their Master when only the evening before his crucifixion he took the bread and blessed it and gave it to his disciples - and said, this do in remembrance of me! And so may still be incensed in a sense be said of the Lord's supper that it is the means in the hands of the Spirit to bring us more intimately acquainted with Christ - At his table does the Christian feel the blindness and darkness which the world and its concerns have brought upon his soul dissipated and he is made to know Christ as his Redeemer as his Exemplar - as his eternal Intercession and as his final judge.

1. He knows him as his Redeemer

Dost thou not feel the need of such a redeemer? Then thou hast no right to a seat at his table. For you have never realized as you ought the sinfulness of your heart and life - nor the holiness justice and excellence of the lamb of God. This last you have broken - for no man liveth and sinneth not - and in what way can you atone for your sins? All your future services are due to God as his reasonable requirement - you cannot then by your repentance and reformation make amends for that law you have broken - and without some atonement rendered by another, you must die: for it is the unvarying and unbending language of this law, the soul that sinneth it shall die. Until therefore you realize your exposure to everlasting perdition if left to yourself you cannot know Christ as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world. Your heart is in no proper state to sit down to his table.

But again - Dost thou not believe that Christ is set forth in the bible as an atoning sacrifice for the sins of all who trust in him? Then thou dost not believe the bible - I mean the bible which God has given - If you have tortured the language of Scripture till it no longer exhibits the doctrine of atonement you have indeed formed a bible of your own which you may believe but it is no longer the bible that came down from heaven: for it is, in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, and not in the words, which the Holy Ghost teacheth. It may learn you how to live but it will never teach you how to die. For other foundation can no man lay, which is Christ Jesus. Neither is their salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved. But how are we saved by Christ? will be the enquiry of him who comes to his table with proper views and feelings. And when he finds it declared in the Scriptures, that any man saying we have an advocate with the father Jesus Christ the righteous - and he is the propitiation for our Sins and not for ours only but also for the Sins of the whole world - When it is there said that Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law being made a curse for us - that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures - was delivered for our offenses and was raised again for our justification and that this man after he had offered one sacrifice for sins, forever sat down on the right hand of God - when he reads such passages - and a thousand others as plain - as undisputed and as decisive he must conclude that the atonement of Christ is the processing cause of his salvation. And in an ordinance particularly calculated to commemorate this atonement of Christ as his sacramental supper, the believer will know him as his Redeemer. But neither speculation knowledge nor even a speculative belief of this doctrine constitutes all that is meant by this phrase, to know Christ. There must also be an assent of the heart. The man feels that he is in need of such a sacrifice for his sins and truth in it for salvation - And when we partake of the body and blood of Christ and reflect on his great atonement - if we feel no emotion of heart - and examine it merely by an act of the understanding - is there not something wrong? Are our hearts right in the sight of God?

Nor should the Christian at his masters table rest in any general views concerning atonement. He should look at those sufferings one by one and that obedience which constituted it – he should endeavor to trace Christ from the period when he left the bosom of the father, and descended to the earth, through all the varied scenes of his life in the flesh till he ascended triumphant over death and the grave to the same everlasting throne of glory. And first let him look at his astonishing condescension. In examining the great mystery of godliness I know the mind is in danger of getting bewildered. For in sealing the Scriptures concerning the character of Christ previous to his appearance in the flesh we find ourselves at once directed to the attributes of Jehovah himself - We are called to contemplate that mysterious union of the Father Son and Spirit whereby they exist coequal and coeternal in an undivided substance. We are pointed to Jesus Christ, the same yesterday today and forever whose name is called Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God- the Everlasting Father the Prince of Peace - who in the beginning was with God and who was God - who is over all God blessed forever - who is the Alpha and Omega the first and the last - by whom were all things created that are in heaven and that are on earth visible and invisible whether they be thrones or dominions or principalities or powers all things were created by him and for him and he is before all things and by him all things consist. Such was the character of him who being in the form of God thought it not robbery to be equal with God: But made himself of no reputation and took upon him the form of a servant and was made in the likeness of men. And being found in fashion as a man he humbled himself and became obedient unto death even the death of the cross. And do you not realize O Christian as you surround the table spread to commemorate dying love of the Saviour, that all this condescension was for your sake? that you through his poverty might become rich? I know that we can but imperfectly comprehend this wonderful humility of Christ or realize our obligations - for how can that which is finite grasp what is infinite? But we were unpardonable to omit this view of his character when we approached the Lord's table. We were unpardonable not to gather a lesson of humility from so bright a pattern.

Such was the character of Christ until he was made a little lower than the angels and took on him the seed of Abraham. The eye of the believer will next follow him through his earthly pilgrimage. And here you have an inhabitant of heaven introduced to the inhabitants of the earth by a voice from God - this is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased. With what joy will he be received by men - who were created in the image of God and whose Spirits are formed to dwell forever in heaven. They will welcome him as one coming from their native country to visit them in a strange and distant land - bringing with him all the purity, innocence, and peace of those lovely shores. But how does this description agree with the facts? Look at his fellow citizens of Nazareth dragging him to the top of the hill whereon their city was built that they might cast him down headlong - Observe the Pharisees and Herodians plotting how they might destroy him because he had healed a man on the Sabbath day - Look at the Scribes and Pharisees charging him with casting out devils by Beersheba the princes of devils seeking how they might ensnare him in his words - and endeavoring to lay hands on him that they might destroy him. Here exclaiming, the foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head- and again to his disciples – the world cannot hate you: but me it hateth because I testify of it that the works thereof are evil. Look at Christ betrayed by one of his chosen disciples - delivered into the hands of ruffians sent by the High Priest - brought before Annas Caiaphas as Pilate – smitten spit upon reviled crowned with thorns forsaken and denied by his disciples - condemned by his judges amid the shouts of the people – crucify him crucify him hurried away to Golgotha - nailed to the cross between thieves - even then insulted and offered vinegar and myrrh mingled with gall to drink - and at length giving up his soul into the hands of his God.

Such my brother was the love of the world towards Christ - Such was the reception of that spotless and lamb-like minister of heaven among our fallen alienated race - And do you feel your resentment rising against the cruel Jews? Let him that is without sin among you cast the first stone at them. It was our sins my hearers, it was our sins that brought Christ from heaven and subjected him to all this abuse and suffering. For he might at any time have pray to his father, and received twelve legions of angels for his rescue. But how then could the Scriptures have been fulfilled - or how could our sins have been pardoned?

The bodily sufferings of Christ were not however the only distress he endured in the work of redemption. When I hear the Psalmist in the passion of Christ exclaiming, Lord why castest thou off my soul? Why hidest thou my face from me? And when Isaiah says, Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him; he hath put him to grief: when thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin he shall see his deed he shall prolong his days and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand - when I hear Jesus saying to the chief priests and captains of the temple - this is your hour and the power of darkness - when I view him in the garden of Gethsemane in the immediate view of his suffering sweating as it were great drops of blood and praying earnestly thrice that if it were possible this cup might pass from him - when I hear all this I cannot suppose that merely his bodily suffering be meant. For many a martyr since the days of Christ has viewed the approaching agonies of a more cruel death with greater fortitude and calmness. And can we suppose that he who knew no sin and who had told his disciples not to fear them who could kill the body and after that could do no more, would he show less resignation and fortitude in the view of death than in a sinful man? There must have been an agony of mind to produce all these complaints - some arrow of the Almighty piercing his soul - And when I hear Christ on the cross exclaiming - My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? I think I perceive what this agony was - God hid his face from him - He withdrew the tokens of his approbation of his character. He departed him for a reason as one who had taken upon him the sins of the world. No wonder then that, his Soul was exceeding sorrowful even unto death - that he was in agony and that he cried out My God my God why hast thou forsaken me?

Nor did the sufferings of Christ bodily and mental constitute the whole of his atonement. The Christian should also look to his active obedience as an essential part of the great works. Without such obedience he could not have secured the reward of believers. And if it was necessary on the one hand that Christ should suffer for him to exhibit to the universe God's hatred of it - so on the other hand was it necessary for him to show by his obedience that the law of God was holy just and good- that God had a complacency in it and that its requirements are not impracticable.

In the second place I remark that the disciple of Christ at his communion table will know him as his Exemplar or Pattern of imitation.

You have already seen the reception which Christ met from the world - and had he possessed the Spirit of the world you might expect to find him going about to devise plans for taking vengeance on his enemies. You might hear him in secret stirring up the resentment of his followers and making ready the implements of war. You would see him desolating Judea with fire and sword calling down fire from heaven and laying Jerusalem on heaps. But neither his Spirit nor his kingdom were of this world. This was the Spirit of heaven - his was this kingdom of heaven. And notwithstanding all the insults and cruelty of the Jews toward him, he continually went about doing good - instead of destroying his enemies who were entirely in his power he healed their sick - instead of cursing them in secret he prayed for them - instead of stirring up his disciples to revenge his wrongs he rebuked them for desiring fire from heaven in his defense. He taught them to love their enemies - and to pray for them. He wept over Jerusalem the city of his enemies. And to give a finishing to the picture of his obedience, when his enemies had nailed him to the cross and had mocked and insulted him till mere human patience must have failed - even then in that hour of agony he said, Father forgive them for they know not what they do.

This my brethren is the exemplar we are commanded to follow. Does not our heart fail us at the thought and do we not cry, who is sufficient for these things? And when we compare our lives with that of Christ as we surround his sacramental table do we not in deep abasement of soul cry out, unclean, unclean, God be merciful to me a sinner? And in particular with the example of Christ before us can we come to this table and sit down with those who have injured us without forgiving them and praying for them? O, if we go away from the table with feelings of resentment towards anyone, we have eaten and drank damnation to ourselves.

In the third place the believer will know Christ at his table as his everlasting Intercessor.

Notwithstanding all that Christ has done for sinners during his incarnation so pure are God's laws and character that even believers might look to him in vain for the pardon of their transgressions were there not an intercession before the throne to quench the kindlings of Divine Justice. In what way Christ executes this merciful office - it may be difficult to determine whether by presenting continually his human nature before God or by actually pleading with the Father on our behalf or by both. Yet the fact is certain that, he ever liveth to make intercession for us - and that we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. And therefore as the apostle justly argues, we may come boldly to the throne of grace that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need. The idea of standing naked and unshielded before the holy, holy, holy Lord God Almighty is too appalling to that man who has a just conception of his sins. We must despair of ever turning our eyes upon this God and live, unless there were a friend there to veil in a measure the glories of his character and to stand as a day's man between us. This friend having shrouded his divinity in a human form, stands in the only passage from earth to heaven and no sincere prayer or holy wish however feeble is by him unheard or disregarded; but is presented to Jehovah with all the pleading eloquence of infinite compassion.

In the last place the believer at the Lord's table knows him as his final Judge.

Hitherto you have contemplated Christ in his merciful attributes and offices. But you should also look forward to that hour when dispensations of mercy shall be closed and Justice once more ascend the tribunal of the universe. God hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he has ordained. The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. But it is the ground on which judgment will proceed - at which the believer is most concerned to look. And the bible informs us that we shall be judged according to our works - according to the deeds done in the body whether they be good or whether they be evil: And the sentence will be given accordingly - there will be no evasion - no mediator nor intercessor for the impenitent. For He is changed into our our judge - a merciful one indeed to those who have put their trust in him - but deaf to the cry of those who sought him not while the days of salvation lasted. And my brethren when we bring our conduct to the test of this rule which will regulate the decisions of the final judgment - how do we find ourselves? Do our works condemn us or acquit us? What if instead of surrounding the sacramental table before us, we should be summoned to hasten to the judgment seat of Christ! Should we be permitted to commemorate our Savior's dying love this day - such questions as these, urged upon our hearts with sincerity and solemnity, should form a part of that commemoration. And it may be if we have never known Christ before he may reveal himself to us at this time. The disciples who went to Emmaus knew him not while he went with them on the way: but in the breaking of bread was it made known unto them their Lord and their God.

I have called the head of discourse just discussed the last. But may I not add another? May I not say that when the Christian communes at the in table of his Lord he knows the Christ as his everlasting friend? In other words has he not then the faith of assurance? Were my own experience to decide this I must freely own that such kindness or such faith is not mine not - But who looks round upon this congregation and church - do catch the eye of some venerable father in Christ and is ready to say with Paul, I have fought a good fight - I have kept the faith - henceforth there is laid upon me a crown of righteousness - For me to live is Christ; to die is gain - For I know that I have passed from death unto life. If there be such an one present he must be a man who early enlisted on the Lord's side under the baptism of his salvation - and who has grown gray in fighting the battles of faith. To such an one it would be presumption in us who are young to offer advice but we would be bold to ask it. We long to know by what resolutions - by what prayers - by what trials - by what mortifications of the flesh or spirit or by what services in the cause of Christ you have reached this enviable point in the Christian race. And should we surmise, in this world we long to catch your falling mantle as you are carried up by a chariot of fire into heaven.

But if Christ made no manifestation of himself to us at his table - if we have then no realizing sense of his character either as Redeemer - or Exemplar - or Intercessor - and if this insensibility remain till many communions have gone by there is reason to fear that the light of his countenance will not be shed upon us in this world and that we are eating and drinking damnation to ourselves - There is reason to fear the first manifestation we shall have of Christ will be in the flaming fire - and the only words we shall hear from his lips will be depart ye cursed unto everlasting fire prepared for the Devil and his angels.

Sermon 13 Opposition to Religion

[Sermon No. 13, "Opposition to Religion," Acts 7:51, 1820,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 3]

Acts 7:51

Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost.

So powerful and so correct in her decisions is conscience that few persons are in danger of mistaking the true nature of sin when it presents itself in any of its grosser forms. Does a man violate the rules of morality or openly oppose religion – he knows - he feels that he is doing contrary to the will of God notwithstanding this a man may live three score years and ten in a state of rebellion against God and active warfare with heaven and be ignorant of it - nay he may suppose himself doing God's service. While he feels indignant at any palpable transgressions of morality or of decency he cannot be made to realize that his heart daily resists the influences of the Spirit of God there is a long and bitter controversy between him and heaven. Yet my hearers this is no uncommon character. It is to be found among the most learned and refined and amiable of our race. Many a man's heart is the field where a battle is fought daily between him and his Maker - and yet that man is ignorant of any such contest.

Does this appear to any an assertion paradoxical and extravagant? Difficult as may seem the task we shall attempt this day to prove it. And we are going to draw upon our own experience for this proof. In other words I propose to exhibit some of the principal modes in which opposition to God manifests itself in the man who is apparently moral and who is respectable in the eye of the world whose heart is in reality destitute of holiness, having never been regenerated and in this state which of us has been or shall be. And what I want is that you should accompany me in your own hearts and examine them soberly and keenly and should you unexpectedly find a hatred or indifference to God to lie at the bottom of your affections do not close your eyes to the evidence of its existence nor be offended should we strip off the veil that now conceals it from you. For the discovery would be the most important a man can possibly make and your worst enemy is the man who would flatter you no such hatred is rooted in your heart. If we dissemble concerning every other subject here we should be plain.

It may be profitable in the introduction of this discourse to remark that if a man perform actions ever so useful to his fellow man - ever so praiseworthy in the view of the world - if he feed the poor clothe the naked - protects the injured - advise the weaker - even give his body to be burned as a martyr in the cause of his country - if he do all this without a reference to God - without regard to his will - if he do it merely through the influence of natural compassion or a regard to man - he has no evidence in all these deeds that he possesses moral virtue or holiness. For in order to render any act morally good in the sight of God it is necessary that the desire to please him be the motive that prompts to its performance. The deeds that have been named may indeed be virtuous and right and laudable in the view of men - but they may be performed by a being totally hostile to God - because the man does not even enquire whether there be any such Being. And indeed were He not in existence these actions would remain the same in every respect. They therefore cannot prove holiness to exist in the heart.

This distinction between our actions as stated at this time because it may illustrate some of the principles of this discourse and because an ignorance of it is frequently the root of self-delusion in regard to religion. Let us now proceed to describe some of the exercises and sentiments of many a man who is yet unconverted that prove the man possessed of them to be an enemy of God – an enemy of religion and a resister of the Holy Spirit.

It is not necessary as has already been observed to exhibit those gross exercises heart and opinions of mind that mask the man to be far gone in iniquity and opposed not only to religion but to worldly morality - For no man can mistake such characters. I wish this day to point out those exercises which the man who experiences them does not regard as any evidence of his hostility to God. I mean to come up nearer the line that separates the religious from irreligious part of society and to show many who regard themselves as not far from the kingdom of heaven that they are yet in their sins - and that between them and God there is yet a great gulf. And we shall consider this exercise and sentiments.

1. As they relate to the doctrines of the Gospel and
2. As they relate to experimental religion.

It may be thought necessary in discussing the first head of this division that it should previously be proved what are the precise documents necessary to be believed by every man in order to salvation. I shall however suppose only that ~~the man whom I address~~ we all acknowledge that all scriptures both the old and new testaments is given by inspiration of God and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness. If we assent to this truth and very few will deny it and this present day we shall not object to arguments drawn from the bible. Now we will suppose we have long sat under the ministry of a man who has made great use of the phraseology of the New Testament in his public instructions. With this minister regeneration - and faith - and grace - and sanctification and adoption are familiar terms. And he talks also of being born again of water and of the Spirit - of the indwelling of the Holy Ghost of living to the glory of God – of exercising fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ of growing up unto Christ and of beholding with open face his glory so as, to be changed into the same image from glory to glory even as by the Spirit of the Lord. And what if this presenter in the very language of Scripture call upon you to, make you a new heart and a new spirit? What if he tell you that, except a man be born of water in the Spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven - that if any man be in Christ he is a new creature: old things are passed away: old all things are passed away: behold all things are become new - that the heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked – that there is none that understandeth - there is none that serveth after God - they are all gone out of the way - that in us that is in our flesh there dwelleth no good thing that the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them; because they are spiritually discerned – that every imagination of the thoughts of the heart is only evil continually.

What if he addressed Christians as those who, have been born not of blood nor of the will of the flesh nor of the will of man but of God - who are saved by grace through faith and that not of themselves - it is the gift of God who are saved not by works of righteousness which they have done but according to the mercy of God by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost – who are justified freely by grace through the redemption there is in Christ Jesus - who are chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world - God having predestined them unto the adoption of children of Jesus Christ unto himself according to the good pleasure of his will? If such be the burthen of that man's preaching we while unregenerate looks upon as an enthusiast - as a dealer in mysteries. Even while we are listening to his discourse you feel rising of heart against the doctrine. You enquire why he does not preach practical discourse and let these mysteries alone? And how is it with our feelings where we go from the house of God? Were you to resort directly to the word of God to examine whether these things were so all would be well. But you are in no mood for it. And although much of the sermon you have just heard was extracted from the bible, yet you feel that such doctrines as depravity and regeneration are too absurd to doubt a moment about them. Reason without revelation appears to you sufficient to prove them utterly false. And when you have retired to your own dwelling are generally ready to give vent to your feelings in language not very becoming on such an important subject. Perhaps you will also heap abuse upon those men who are weak enough to believe in such absurdities - although you know that many great men and many good men have manifested the firmest faith in these apparent mysteries. It is not my business indeed at this time to endeavor to give the proofs of these doctrines: but there are several facts which show that your disbelief of them does not result from a conviction of your understanding that they are false - but from a native opposition of your heart to any principles so humbling to pride.

And first - did the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel appear to your understanding so perfectly absurd as you suppose your feelings when we hear them from the pulpit or converse upon them would not be so violently agitated as they are. You would rather pity than censure those who had embraced them and you would be disposed to convince them of their error by directing them to the Scriptures. And being firmly established yourself in the true doctrines of revelation you would fear no overthrow. This violence of yours shows that your conscience is disposed to listen to these mysteries while your heart opposes them, thus producing a content in your bosom.

In the second place the same thing is evident from the fact that you do not go to the Scriptures to prove from them the absurdity of these doctrines. That man who has a just sense of his liability to err when left to himself and who believes the Scriptures to be the word of God, will at least be disposed to examine them upon every question in religion to see whether they agree with the decisions of his own reason. And therefore if a man does not take this course it must be because he has an overwhelming conceit of his own superiority or his heart is opposed to it - and fears conviction.

In the last place the same thing is evident from the fact that in forming your system of religious belief if you have ever formed one you did not read the Scriptures with prayer. When reading such passages as have been mentioned above you did not look up to God and with a sense of your own weakness and ignorance cry out with the Psalmist, Open thou mine eyes that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law. You passed by these passages, concluding if they meant any thing it was some mystery you could not - and it was of no consequence you should understand. Now you will have acknowledged that, all scripture is given by inspiration of God and is profitable for doctrine for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness and you will not dispute that there are many texts in the bible hard to be understood concerning which men of the strongest minds have disagreed. You must also acknowledge that, if any man lack wisdom he may ask it of God who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not: and it shall be given him. Why then, with all these truths before you did you not pray to God that he would enlighten your understanding to understand the difficult parts of his word? Was not this the reason - that you had formed your system of belief before you came to the bible and did not feel the need of direction from God? There then the opposition of your heart to the doctrines of the Gospel and to the strivings of the Holy Spirit was manifested through you. Suppose all this resulted from a conviction of your understanding - that those doctrines were false.

Thus it is evident without enquiry whether the doctrines of grace as they are infrequently called be true or false, that your opposition to them results from a sense of rooted opposition in your heart to all revealed religion. Whenever you shall have felt your need of divine assistance to understand the bible and having resigned all confidence in the glosses and expositions of men you shall have read the whole New Testament praying over each chapter - then, but not till then, will it be manifest that you have given up this opposition and have come to learn of Christ and that your doubts if any still remain are sincere. Do you feel opposed to such a course of proceeding? It is not because you are unwilling to read the Scriptures: but it is the word prayer that is the stumbling block. You would even consent to commit the whole New Testament to memory: but to pray over it - to pray in secret - to pray in secret daily - and that sincerity too - here is the difficulty.

But I trespass upon the second head of this discourse which is to exhibit some of the exercises and sentiments of your heart as it relates to experiment experimental religion.

There is no man who has not a strong natural inclination to adopt some system of religion. There is no one who does not at times feel the need of it - were men permitted to be religious in their own way - could they bend the will of God at their pleasure - no sacrifices would be too great for them in receiving future happiness. But when they find only one strait and narrow path to heaven - only one name under heaven given among men whereby they must be saved - only one lord one faith one baptism - when they find that God must be loved with all the heart and mind and strength that they must be crucified to the Lord and henceforth live to the to the Lord that bought them - this is a system too mortifying for human nature to adopt. Human nature therefore will endeavor to rob this system of its peculiarities and to shorten the standard God has established till it is brought down to the measure of a man. Then when the Gospel can be embraced without sacrificing the world or wounding the pride you will find men pressing into the Kingdom of heaven. But alas for deluded mortals!

God never made his works for man to amend. If he will not humble to accept of salvation on God's terms even through faith in Jesus Christ and the renewing of the Holy Spirit the law of God stands out in all its strict and unbending rigor against him and there is no arm that can avert its thunders. Now we while in a natural state are not unwilling to receive the Gospel after it has been modified so as to suit his taste. Like Naaman, if he can be made clean by washing in Abana or Pharpar he does not object but rather than wash in the contemptible Jordan in that fountain set open to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin; and for uncleanness he will retain the foul leprosy that is upon him. I have already exhibited how some marks of his opposition to genuine religion manifested in his resistance to its doctrines. Let us now look at the state of our hearts naturally in regard to the practice of piety.

And first your opposition is manifested by your feelings when hearing the preached word. If the minister of the Gospel dwell upon its doctrines you blame him for not bringing forward practical subjects. Perhaps the next Sabbath he calls upon you to repent of your sins - to break off from them - to instruct your family in religion - to pray in your family - to pray in secret - to devote all your faculties of body and mind to the service of the Lord and whether you eat or drink or whatsoever you do to do all to the glory of God. Now you know that in most or all these respects you are deficient - and how do you get rid of applying such a sermon to yourself? For you will acknowledge that such duties are required in the bible. There is perhaps in your heart feeling of resentment against the man who is thus faithful and playing in exhibiting your duty - or you could conjure up the idea that his sermon is personal although he disclaims it - or you try to persuade yourself that he is unnecessarily rigid in his requirements - or you try to turn off your thoughts to some other subject - or in short you do any thing to shield yourself from these arrows which his sermon is fixing in your conscience. The spirit is indeed striving with you not to suffer such an opportunity to pass unimproved - but you resist all his influences and cover yourself as soon as possible with the impenetrable armor of the Lord.

You may reply to all this that there are some subjects which you like to hear discussed in the pulpit. Yes and it is easy to point out what these subjects are. Let the preacher expatiate upon any of the moral duties - let him muster all his eloquence and pour forth all his zeal against stealing and lying and fraud slander and intemperance - or let him show up in glowing language the particular attributes of God or describe the sufferings of Christ or the joys of heaven as you can listen very complacently to all this because there is little in it to disturb your conscience. But here is no evidence of your love to religion. The touchstone is not applied until you are called upon to make some painful sacrifice - to cut off a right hand or pluck out a right eye.

In the second place your feelings toward devoted Christians afford evidence of hostility to religion. The apostle John makes love to the brethren one of the strongest evidences that we are Christians - We know says he that we have passed from death to life because we love the brethren. Now let me ask are your feelings towards professors of religion or if you are yourself a professor towards an eminently devoted Christian such as you should call love? Do you not on the other hand regard him as one who is over much righteous - and are not his presence and conversations an offence to you? Do you not feel something like an aversion to him and take pleasure in pointing out his failings? And do you not receive more pleasure in the society of the man who is upright in his dealings - firm in his integrity and delicate in his honor and winning in his address but who makes no pretensions to the character of a religious man?

You complain of this devoted servant of Christ that he is too apt to converse upon religion at all times - that he makes it too public and common a thing: whereas you conceive religion to be between the man and his Maker and that it is not advisable to say much concerning the practical part of it except before your particular friends. But do you introduce it frequently before your particular friends and do you make it a matter between your own soul in heaven? Does not the world occupy more of your thoughts and does not a short prayer once or twice in the day (if you pray it all) constitute all your intercourse with God? Is secret prayer a common - a daily and a pleasant service? Until you can answer these questions in the affirmative, blame not the boldness of the man who derives his courage from his secret intercourse with the Father of Spirits and who like Paul in Athens feels his spirit stirred within him when he sees the worldly wholly given to idolatry.

You complain of this man because he encourages by his commendation and example religious meetings at other times than on the Sabbath for prayer and praise and mutual improvement. And the objection you make to such meetings is that they appear ostentatious and if you wish to pray for the conversion of sinners and the enlargement of the Redeemer's kingdom we may do it in our closets and if we wish to improve in religion we can read the bible. Now is not my intention in this place to bring forward arguments for such social religious meetings - but a simple statement of facts will show that your professed objections to them are not your real ones. You say it is better to go into our closets and spend a portion of time there in reading and prayer. Why then do you not do it? When you shall set apart one or two evenings each week to be spend in this manner, you can consistently objective to public meetings - but since you adopt no such course, is it not fair to conclude that your objections lie deeper than you suppose - that they proceed from a want of relish for the subjects of religion? Compare your conduct in other respects with what is in regard to this subject. You do not object to spending even several evenings in the week paying visits or in a society of friends for acquiring human knowledge - and why? Because you have a relish for such visits in such society. If then you have a relish for religion why should you not be pleased with spending a few hours out of season in improving yourself in its doctrines and practice?

But you reply to all this by saying that such meetings tend to produce enthusiasm and of all enemies of religion this is the most deadly. Without stopping to enquire whether this charge be well-founded it will reach the bottom of the objection at once to observe that while you are in constant fear of enthusiasm you never fear coldness in religion. While you clothe the former in all its terrific dress - and put into its right hand a bloody sword and in its left a fiery faggot and surround it with a thousand furies and let it loose among God's heritage to trample it underfoot and burn his sanctuary - during all this time the thought of indifference in religion does not once enter your heart - And why? Is it not because you imagine yourself to be rich and increased with goods and have need of nothing - and knowest not that thou art wretched and miserable and poor and blind and naked? Is not the New Testament full of exhortations to grow in grace - to watch and pray? Does it not declare lukewarmness in religion to be more hateful in the sight of God than opposition? And how few denunciations does it contain against excessive zeal! I am not indeed contending that there is no such thing as enthusiasm. But these facts prove that the writers of the bible knew men to be in greater danger of becoming stupid in religion than of being overzealous. And when you find that in your mind there exists something the reverse of this does it not excite a suspicion that your heart is not right in the sight of God?

In the last place your hostility to religion is manifested by your feelings in regard to the conversion of sinners and the enlargement of the Redeemer's kingdom. When you meet with one wanted this world's most amiable characters and observe his lofty accomplishments of mind and his fine feelings of honor and integrity - you do not feel and lament that he yet lacketh one thing. He appears to you to possess everything desirable although his heart knows not God and he is every moment exposed notwithstanding all his fine qualities, to sink into everlasting perdition. And did you realize this you would pity him and pray that he might be saved from that place of torment.

In regard to missionary exertions also you consider most of them as visionary and enthusiastic. You are willing however to acknowledge such exertions are proper when directed to right objects - but you conceive it to be wrong to send missionaries to foreign countries. And why is it wrong? Because they are so much needed in our own land. Let it be remembered that I am not here endeavoring to prove the utility of foreign missions: But there is one fact that proves the argument you have advanced against foreign missions to be a mere subtlety of your heart to deceive your understanding - you acknowledge the high importance of domestic missions - indeed you profess to believe that all the efforts of the Christians should be directed to this object - and yet you do not lift a finger nor contribute a mite for this purpose! Does not this fact open your eyes to perceive that all your objections proceed from an opposing heart?

It were easy to multiply instances of our national hostility to religion but let those already exhibited suffice. And now what shall I say in conclusion on this discourse? Shall I say that I have been speaking to any person? See that I know concerning this and all is necessary for me to know, is that such feelings exist somewhere in the world in the human heart. Whether they exist in this house let every man's conscience answer: for there is no difficulty in deciding whether I have been tracing your feelings. If anyone reply in the affirmative we naturally enquire what will be the effect of this exhibition upon his heart? It may be answered that his opposition to religion is excited and is now swelling in his breast: And unless the Spirit of God be poured out upon him to subdue that opposition - this discourse has been read in vain. In vain did I say? No - feeble and imperfect as it is, it may be the last warning he shall ever hear. It may be the means of hardening his heart and rendering him a vessel of wrath fitted for destruction. It may seal up his doom to the judgment day.

Sermon 15 Religious Condition of the United States

[Sermon No. 15, "Religious Condition of the United States," II Chronicles 28:10, 1820 Apr, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 3]

II Chronicles 28:10

But are there not with you even with you, sins against the Lord your God?

[Includes a discussion of slavery and how every citizen bears some responsibility.]

Prosperity is as dangerous to the spiritual health of society and nations as to that of individuals. Strange as it may seem, it is true, that the more a man receives of the mercies of heaven the more inclined is he to forget the source whence they flow. If a society or nation be eminently prosperous, it is apt to impute its happy state to its own superior wisdom and prudence: or if it be a professedly religious state, to its greater piety, which renders it a peculiar object of the Divine beneficence. And where such an impression exists on the minds of the people we are almost sure to find but few efforts to root out remaining corruption - and vice will secretly spread through the community. For society can no more be stationary in respect of morality and religion than an individual. It is ever becoming better or worse. And when any people regard themselves as the peculiar favorites of heaven, they will relax in their virtuous exertions - until sin has completely closed their eyes to their moral danger and they are insensibly conducted to perdition. A more striking example of this moral blindness cannot be found than the Jewish nation. They boasted that they had Abraham for their father and that unto them were committed the oracles of God. They could point back to the numberless interpositions of God in behalf of their nation - as a triumphant proof of his peculiar regard. And in the time of Christ this destructive, self-appropriating spirit was at its height. The religion of the heart was almost unknown and yet the Jews regarded themselves as the only children of God on earth, looking upon all other nations with contempt. But Christ who regarded not the persons or professions of men, who looked on the heart knew what was in man, denominated the Jews at the time of his appearance, a faithless a perverse and an adulterous generation - a generation of vipers. And while they expected daily that their superior piety would call forth some signal manifestations of the Divine displeasure against their enemies, Christ forewarned them that their sins had risen to such a height of enormity that the wrath of God would soon be revealed from heaven for their destruction.

And is there no danger of falling into a regard to our spiritual state the present day? We live in what is called a Christian land and in a part of that land long celebrated for its moral and religious habits. As a nation we have been unusually prosperous and happy. And when we look about upon other countries and see a part of them sunk in the lowest ignorance brutality and iniquity - and a part yet smoking with blood spilt in the most obstinate wars that ever desolated the world do we not look upon our own land with complacency as pure and religious in comparison with others? While the iniquities of foreign lands rise up before us in such aggravated and tremendous colors and awful magnitude, do we not lose sight of those whose every day commission before our eyes has taught us to regard with comparatively little abhorrence?

It is well then my brethren that we are called upon this day by the example of our fathers and the voice of our rulers to turn our thoughts homeward - to leave other countries and look upon our own comparing our moral and religious state with the requisitions of Jehovah and enquiring whether there be not with us even lined against the Lord and God.

It is my intention at this time to set in order some of those more palpable sins which are a disgrace to any nation in which are found in the midst of us provoking the judgments of God upon the land.

In entering upon this subject, it will be proper to lay down a standard to which every action may be referred. And this standard is the law of God delivered among the thunderings and lightnings of Sinai. To the ten commandments we shall appeal as the groundwork of all our observations.

The first of these commandments lies at the foundation of the whole: Thou shalt have no other gods before me. That is as Christ explains it, thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind. Here is a law sacredly binding upon every child of Adam - a law that comes to us enforced by the researcher of reason and the sanctions of revelation - a law that extends to every thought, word and action - a law that fastens its broad requirements upon every faculty of soul and body and which no authority can annul. Now we will suppose a being who is a stranger to our species to go through this land for the sole purpose of determining how far the conduct of its inhabitants coincides with this law which is holy, just and good.

We will suppose this being first to enter those temples erected among us for the worship of God. And here will he see mighty congregations bowing in sacred silence while the voice of prayer rises from the desk in the name of a Mediator. But where are the thoughts and affections of these apparent solemn worshippers? It is a hard judgment to say that one half of them are turned entirely away from God and fixed on the pursuits or the pleasures of this world? Do you say this is a hard judgment? Let it be announced that the Lord's Supper is to be celebrated and let his disciples be invited to tarry and hold communion with God and with his son Jesus Christ. How small is the number of those who remain to pay even this small testimony to the boundless love of their Savior. And how large the multitude that goeth away and careth for none of these things.

Here then at the outset will our imaginary visitor be compelled to note in his registry this unwelcome fact - A majority of this people do not love God. Yet this exhibition was the most favorable he could have. This people have appeared to him in their best aspect. For if the love of God ever manifest itself among them must be on the Sabbath.

The Sabbath is now closed and the uproar of the world assails the ears of this stranger. He perceives that man is now engaged in pursuits that he loves and he goes forth to see whether the love of God be mingled with those pursuits and whether it be the exciting cause of all this activity.

The love of God! Let him go through our land from Dan to Beersheba and except on the Sabbath where will he find any visible manifestation of it among the inhabitants? I mean if he looks at their general sublime(?)conduct. Let him judge from such a view and he would be forced to conclude that this world in their estimation to be all in all.

The love of God? What if he look for it among those who are called men of business? Here he would see a constant bustle and effort in pursuit of some object. He would perceive much correspondences, much conversation and much earnest argument. But were he told that a man cannot serve God and Mammon could he doubt which master such man were serving?

Or let this love be sought in the ordinary dealings between men. Says the scripture, If any man say I love God and hateth his brother he is a liar. Now what stronger evidence do we wish that a man hates his brother than that he should endeavor to deceive him in a bargain – or refuse to believe him in distress – or manifest envy at his prosperity or treat his feelings and reputation with contempt or take advantage of his misfortunes to oppress him? And is it not the fact that every man must stand continuously upon his guard or he is very sure to suffer some of these evils? Does this look like a manifestation of the love of God?

Shall this stranger look for evidence of love to God in those amusements so greedily sought after by the majority? One of the most natural expressions of this love is in prayer. But does the glutton ever pray when he is most vilely wasting the bounties of heaven and stupefying his immortal soul? And is the hall of the pleasure party or the gaming party or of the dancing assembly or the theater or the field of the horse race – are these places where prayer is want to be made? So far from it that were prayer introduced all these places would soon be deserted.

Should this impartial stranger then look for evidence of love to God to any of the men or the places that have been named and he could not avoid them where he in the world! He would look in vain. He would find in them all a worshiping of the creature more than the creator. He would find an idol in the place of God. Among the avaricious this would be riches – among the ambitious it would be honor and among the sensual it would be pleasure. But whatever it might be he would uniformly find it in opposition to God and possessing the undivided empire of the heart.

The question then again recurs where in our external weekly conduct shall this stranger find evidence that we are a nation devoted to the Lord? You dare not point him to the haunts of dissipation and licensed profligacy. For on the doors thereof is marked in letters of fire – this house is the way to hell going down to the chambers of death. Yet my brethren, he would find cause for placing this inscription upon many a door in our land.

Nor would you direct him to the numberless dwellings amongst us that are never sanctified by family prayer. There might indeed be quick Christians in such dwellings, but to say the least their omission of this duty could be no proof of it.

Neither would you address as a proof of our national piety, the numerous local and general contentions among our churches. For though many of these contentions may be unavoidable yet their existence among the professors of a religion that has but one Lord, one faith, one baptism evinces that there is somewhere a deficiency of love to God.

But perhaps the funeral bell would summon you to attend the burial of the dead – and thither would you lead this stranger. And here indeed would he witness and universal solemnity – a silence of every tumultuous passion and a fine attention to the momentous lesson there to be learnt. Thus far would the judgment be favorable. But when he saw this whole assembly go away, the one to his farm and the other to his merchandise and engage in the business the pleasures and the vanities of the world with as much eagerness as much contention and as much security as ever – would he not exclaim, the heart of thy people is deceitful above all things!

It might happen also that during the week the bell for public social prayer would be sounded - and here would you direct the stranger. And whom should he find assembled? Christian charity would answer a few devoted servants of the Lord. But the great majority would say - a few deluded fanatics. Here then might something of an estimate be formed of the relish among the people for religion during the week.

The many societies in the land for extending the knowledge of the Holy Scripture at home and abroad might indeed be pointed out as some evidence of an extensive and operative love to God in our nation. But when we consider how immense is the majority and some of these even professing Christians - who have neither part nor lot in this matter, nay who oppose it ought it not rather to be said that these institutions are an evidence of individual not of national piety?

It might also occur to the observation of this stranger that there is in our land a general acknowledgment of the inspiration of the Sacred Scriptures and but few open infidels. And it might be mentioned to him in addition to this that a few years since the reverse of this was a fact. But would he not likewise observe that there is something nearly as bad in the place of infidelity - namely a form of godliness without the power? Yes, my brethren, there is an increasing tendency in our land to unite two things which God has forever disjoined - the love of the world and the love of religion. There is a disposition to lop off the peculiarities of the Christian faith, to blot out the vigorous line of distinction the Bible has drawn between the men of the world and the men of God and to lower down Christianity till it can be embraced within unhumbled and unconverted heart - till God and Mammon can both be acceptably served and till the world can be grasped with one hand and heaven with the other. Infidelity has indeed quit its hold on the understandings of men but over many a heart yet maintains its empire. In this day of light and knowledge very few are handy enough to say that the Bible is a cunningly devised fable. And yet in many instances to what does this acknowledgment of its divinity amount? It is made a standard only so far as it agrees with the previous decisions of reason - and where mystery begins its authority ends. What is this but infidelity in another form?

Let now this imaginary inspector of our conduct bring the several facts in review in order to form a judgment of our national devotion to the Lord. In the very outset of his examination he had been compelled to conclude that a majority of the people do not love God: And when afterwards he found so many palpable manifestations among us of a settled hatred to God - and to so little conformity to His will even among those who profess to be his servants and reflected also that there is much of the form of godliness without its power, what a seduction must he make in this minority! Would he not conclude it most false and absurd to call this nation a religious nation when so very few among us give evidence of their piety, while the multitude are walking each after the counsel of his own heart and in the sight of his own eyes fulfilling the lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eyes, and the pride of life? While an overwhelming majority of this people worship and serve the creature more than the Creator and only one be found here and there whose treasures it is in heaven why is not this strictly and properly a heathen land? Did it confer upon Rome and Corinth the title of religious cities because they contain within their walls a few devoted servants of the Redeemer?

It might indeed startle us to be called a heathen nation when we have been so much accustomed to look at the bright side of our public character and to flatter ourselves with our many privileges and excellences: but the question is what would be the judgment of this impartial uninterested stranger? Surely he would call things by their right names - and when he saw the great mass of our inhabitants living without God would he not call this heathenism?

There would however be other striking proofs of our alienation from God besides those already named: And these would be consistent violations of the other commandments of the decalogue. The second indeed forbidding the worship of graven images is not infringed and would I could say as much of the third – Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain! One might suppose that it were sinful enough to make no return of love or gratitude to that Being who upholds us and watches over us with so tender a care. Why must we add open insult to this neglect? using the name of this God is a bye word? Although profanity be a sin so wanton and unnecessary - so opposite not only to the Bible but to reason - and so repugnant even to decency and good manners yet it is more common among us than prayer. Men do indeed frequently restrain themselves from the utterance of oaths when in the presence of those whom they regard as Christians. But look at them when associated with those of their own stamp - when reveling at the Tavern or the dram shop, or when their anger is suddenly excited – nay, worse than all look at them in their own humility - before their household - before their children - and you will find the tongue of blasphemy unloosed. Yes and are not the ears of the traveler as he passes our streets greeted with oaths poured forth by children of a span long? O it is with us as it once was in Judea - because of swearing the land mourneth.

And what shall I say of the fourth commandment – remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy? I will not point you to those parts of our land where this day is devoted to amusement and sensual pleasures when the doors of iniquity are thrown wide open - I will not call you to listen to the noise of the passing traveler at noon day who cannot be molested by the civil law: But look into your own dwellings: And do you not find that there is a relaxation in the observance of this day? Is there not more mixing of worldly thoughts and actions with everything that relates to this day than in the times of your fathers? Are your children and domestics as faithfully taught religious principles as you were by your parents? Do you not look upon your fathers as bigoted in their observance of the Sabbath? Are you as scrupulous in attending public worship as they were – and in the choice of your reading on that holy day? Do not the questions put long since by the prophets sometimes describe your feelings? When will the new moon be gone that we may sell corn? And the Sabbath that we may set forth wheat, making the ephah small as the shekel great and falsifying the balances of deceit? O there is too much evidence of a falling off in the observance of this sacred day – And shall not the land tremble for this and every one mourn that dwelleth therein?

In passing the fifth commandment, honor thy father and they mother, I shall not stop to notice an increasing pettiness and want of respect for the aged among our youth – nor under the ninth commandment, thou shalt not kill, shall I pause to repeat any thing upon the exhausted subject of dueling – nor under the seventh commandment, thou shalt not commit adultery, shall I point to the increasing haunts of profligacy and licentiousness that threaten to make our land one universal Sodom and to call down a tempest of fire and brimstone from heaven. But the eighth commandment, thou shalt not steal, cannot in conscience be passed over by any professed preacher of morality or religion while he knows himself to be a member of that nation which contains within its bosom more than a million of human beings that have been stolen and enslaved. This is a fact, my hearers, that ought to freeze the blood of this nation. The existence of slavery in a land of tyranny is to be expected – in a land of monarchy it might be endured but in a free country it is intolerable – it is an abomination of desolations standing where it ought not. Its enormity will never be known until we stand as a nation around that tribunal in heaven where the blood of these poor murdered beings will be demanded at our hands - For the mighty ocean of their blood will go before us to judgment and for every drop of it will there be poured out in equal measure of God's wrath.

I know that as individuals we are not chargeable with this sin - but as members of this nation can we say that we are free from the blood of these innocent men? Have we not in some way lent our assistance in the bloody work? Or have we done all in our power to prevent it? If we do not suffer for the sin in another world, there is every probability that God will visit His iniquity upon us in this life as a part of this nation and upon our children to the third and fourth generation. At least there is a cup of God's indignation filled to the brim, that must be drank to the dregs in time or eternity for this outrageous abomination.

Were there time to point out the many violations of the ninth amendment – Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbors, we might enlarge upon the vile sins of falsehood and slander. And under the tenth commandment, Thou shalt not covet anything that is thy neighbor's, might be named a wide spreading and destructive spirit of avarice and ambition. But the catalog of our prevailing transgressions has already been extended far enough to show us that the land which is full of the goodness of the Lord is nevertheless defiled and daily provokes the judgment of heaven upon it. And now in view of all these iniquities shall we not humble ourselves this day in the presence of God? Shall we not sigh and cry for all the abominations that be done in the midst of us? Oh what ungrateful returns have we made to our heavenly father for all the manifestations of his goodness to us - for electing us to heaven in point of privileges? Let us remember that as members of this nation we are accountable for its sins if we have been guilty of the like sins ourselves or have winked at them in others - or have not done our utmost to prevent them. So long as it was in the power of Pilate to have released Christ, it did not free him from the sin of his minder to wash his hands before the people and declare himself innocent of the blood of that just person. So neither shall we be free from partaking in other men's sins unless we stand forth fearlessly and do all in our power to oppose them. And it is only by humiliation's, repentance, prayer and active exertions in the cause of religion ~~that we can hope to avert the righteous judgments of God upon our land. These and these only~~ can stand like Phineas of old between the plague and the people away the wrath of an holy God.

Sermon 16 Sins of Omission and Commission

[Sermon No. 16, "Sins of Omission and Commission," Luke 18:13, 1820 Apr,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 3]

Luke 18:13

And the publican standing afar off would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast saying God be merciful to me a sinner.

There is a faithful proneness in man to look away from his own sins. He will acknowledge that there is wickedness in the world and an alarming mass of it. Yet when the question is brought home, and I enquire, how much of this sin exists in my own heart. I find a difficulty in fixing my thoughts on myself alone. Unwilling to be examined my heart endeavors to turn my eyes upon others, to compare them with myself. And if I find with the Pharisee that I am not as other men are in regard to extortion injustice adultery or any other aggravated sin, I am too apt to conclude my heart less depraved than theirs when perhaps it is full of evil. And the whole difficulty lies in my mistaking the standard of examination. I ought to look to see how I stand in relation to God: whereas I have been comparing myself with man. The law of God should have been the standard of examination: but I have used the law of man. In short I am one of those who measuring themselves by themselves and comparing themselves among themselves are not wise.

It is to such superficial self - examination my hearers that we are to impute our slow advances in the Christian course, and are frequent relapses into sin. For I appeal to your experience whether this imperfect half way scrutiny into your thoughts and actions be not with you a common thing? Do you not find within you a disposition to relax a little in your Christian warfare when you perceive your neighbor pause, whose ardent and devoted piety you have never doubted? While you acknowledge that there is much iniquity in the world do you feel disposed to change much of it upon your own head. Do you not feel that if others were as pure and holy as yourself society would wear a most religious aspect?

The true Christian should not need indeed omit to notice and to censure the prevailing iniquities of the nation or society in which his lot is cast. But he should be careful not to exhaust his zeal by his efforts against public vices. There are times in these not infrequent when his thoughts should be turned inward upon his own heart and sit in rigorous judgment upon his own actions. And this (the Sabbath) day is in an especial manner one of these times. It is a kind of yearly (weekly) court day when we have an opportunity of weighing ourselves in the balance of truth and holiness. It is in short a preparation day for the final judgment. If we improve it aright we shall get so near and so fair a view of our sins that they will seem to rise up like mountains occupying the whole view of the mind and hiding the sins of others now diminished to mole hills. Like the publican in the text we shall be absorbed in the contemplation of ourselves so as not even to enquire whether their brethren engaged in the same works of self - examination. Like him too shall we smite our breast crying, God be merciful to me a sinner. To produce this state of feeling is the object of this discourse: And it may help to effect this by bringing into view:

- 1 Some of our sins of commission and
- 2 Some of our sins of omission

It may give us a deeper and juster sense of our sins if we recall to mind the obligations we are under to conform to the will of God. And these obligations result from these facts - that God's character is alone supremely lovely - but he is created us - preserved us - redeemed us - giving us his holy word - and may I not add his Holy Spirit? For I am now addressing those who are able to form some just estimate of the demerit of sin: not those if any such be present who dead in iniquity. From all these distinguished blessings there results an undoubted and unlimited obligation to consecrate every faculty of body and soul to the service of God - to perform whatever he requires and refrain from what he forbids, so that whether we eat or drink or whatsoever we do to do all to the glory of God. And since sin is that abominable thing which God hates and he has most solemnly commanded us to refrain from it is thought word and deed - we are sacredly bound to practice holiness which alone is pleasing in his sight. We are bound to let his love be the grand foundation principle that regulates our whole lives. All the dispensations of God to our fallen world above all the astonishing mission of his Son here for their object to deliver us from the power of sin and thus prepare us for glory. And we have reason to believe that there is a mighty contest now carrying on throughout the universe between holiness and sin and that we are made a spectacle to men and to angels. We my Christian brethren have professedly enlisted on the Lord's side and now mark how great is our treachery to our principles and our treason against heaven, when we forsake this side and do the works of darkness! By our sins we make an effort, whether we know it or not, to break down the walls of heaven - that we may live in the Prince of darkness and raise him to the throne of Omnipotence. And if there be joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth so is there triumph in hell over one Christian that sinneth. Under such circumstances every transgression of which we are guilty, however small the eye of man assumes an immense importance and we know of no measure of its magnitude unless it be infinity.

Carrying along with us then a deep impression of the vile nature of sin and of our perpetual obligations to love and serve God let us look at the prevailing disposition of our hearts and practice of our lives. And first does the tenor of our conduct satisfy us that the glory of God is the moving cause of our activity rather than selfishness? We labor month after month and year after year with unremitting diligence to gain to ourselves more possessions or honors. And now what thought enters first and most frequently into our minds when thus employed? The idea that we shall hereafter experience happiness from these acquisitions - or that we shall thus be qualified for making greater efforts in the cause of Christ? Have we resolved that if we become rich we will cast our superfluous riches into the treasury of the Lord? Or if we shall become honorable, we will exert greater influence more boldly and decidedly on the side of religion? Ah, my brethren, it is to be feared we have no such enlarged views! But that we look forward to the splendid pleasures of opulence and the shouts of admiring people rather than to the service of the Lord! Strike out worldly selfish motives and our activity would languish and we should feel that we were serving a hard master.

This brings me in the next place to remark the inconsistency of our conduct in devoting ourselves so assiduously and eagerly to the acquisition of the world when we profess to be seeking a better even an heavenly country. Mark for a moment how vigorously and decidedly the Scriptures address Christians on this subject - and to such this discourse is directed. Love not the world, says John, neither the things that are in the world - If any man love the world the love of the father is not in him. Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth says Christ where moth and rust corrupt and where thieves break through and steal. For where your treasure is there will your heart be also - Ye cannot serve God and Mammon. Therefore I say unto you take no thought (or more properly be not anxious) for your life what you shall eat or what you shall drink; nor yet for your body what ye shall put on. What Christian is there who does not tremble for his spiritual state when he brings his conduct to the test of these unsparing rules of duty and observes the mighty discrepancies! When he looks back upon his life and calls to mind his constant and arduous labors for the meat that perisheth or for the honor that cometh from men only - and remembers how many more anxious thoughts and helpless hours have been given to the improvement of his fortune than to his spiritual state - how much greater interest he has felt in worldly pursuits than in religion how much more zeal he has manifested for the former than the latter - how immense the balance of time and effort and devotion given to the former - how much more careful in looking into the concerns between himself and his neighbors than between himself and his God; how shorten he has shortened the hours of his devotion and meditation that he might hurry into the business of the world - how that world has often intruded upon his thoughts even in his most solemn services to God and how much greater have been his fears of losing an earthly possession or reputation than a crown in heaven - when all these facts rise up in his memory in terrible array clashing with the commands of God there must there will be within him a fearful looking for of judgment. And yet who of us is so free from these sins that he would venture to cast the first stone at his neighbour?

There is also in society a sin resulting from excessive attachment to the world or the peculiarities of the times - or from blindness of heart and it may be some Christians are chargeable with it. I mean a want of perfect fairness in our ordinary dealings - a disposition to hide the deficiencies of our commodities - and to overstate their excellencies - a tendency to make the ephah small and the shekel great and to falsify the balances by deceit. And on the other hand, it is naught it is not naught saith the buyer; but when he is gone his way then he boasteth. Such practices creep insensibly upon society and are at length regarded as honest and laudable. But so long as this rule be true, whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you do ye even so unto them, these cannot be justified.

It is probable in the next place that we are chargeable with too much conformity to the world. Here again must we appeal to the decisive language of the bible. Woe unto you says Christ when all men speak well of you. Know ye not says John that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? Whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God says Paul, do I seek to please men? For if I yet pleased men I should not be the Servant of Christ. And be ye not conformed to this world; but be transformed by the renewing of your mind that you may from what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God. Such then is the wide separation that ought to exist in the opinion of inspired apostles between the believer and the world. But alas how often have we endeavored to confound this distinction! Though we may have denied ourselves at times and taken up the cross yet soon have we been weary - and in the hour of temptation cast it aside and exclaimed, I know not the man. We are commanded to avoid the appearance of evil. Is this done when we give license by our example to fashionable extravagances - to the gaming table - to idle conversation - to the tale of slander? There is indeed an austere singularity of practice sometimes to be met with that is censurable; because it is affected and proceeds from a desire to be distinguished. But there is also a fear of the public opinions that in a Christian is cowardly. Yet how often has this fear operated upon us more powerfully than the fear of God! Whenever we have disguised our sentiments because they are sentiments because they were unpopular - whenever we have adopted practices because others did or because we fear to be denominated singular or because we were unwilling to displease our friends or lose our popularity then has this base fear governed us - then have we criminally conformed to the world.

And what is the root of this cowardice? It is pride - that cancer of the heart which clings to the Christian as long as he lives. It is this which perpetually disposes us to think of ourselves above what we ought to think. Here it is that we dread so supremely the contempt and reproach of the world and rather than see the finger of scorn pointed at us even by sinners, we are disposed to yield a little - to lower somewhat the standard of practice and mix with the pure principles we have learnt in the school of Christ some of the maxims of men. O could we travel in that elevated path trod by the apostles and martyrs we should find ourselves carried above the sneers and threatenings the little tricks and practices the follies temptations and vanities of the earth. Were our aims as elevated as theirs we should be looking to no inferior throne of glory in heaven. But now are we satisfied if we can just enter there by the lowest door and shine only as stars of the seventh magnitude.

Let us now proceed to consider some of the our sins of omission: not because those of commission have been all set before you: but because the time allotted to this discourse will soon be exhausted.

It will carry us at once to the foundation of all our deficiencies in Christian duty to consider our omission or imperfect performance of these things - secret prayer - self-examination and reading the Bible. When these are duly and sincerely performed all the Christian affections will be in lively exercise. For these constitute the nourishment of practical godliness without which it will wither and die.

Yet after all, these duties apparently so easy, are the most difficult in life. Take for instance self-examination. The man who has practiced this most will confess that there is no science so difficult as that of his own heart - and after the researches of his whole life the believer will perceive that he has but just learnt the elements of it - and that there is no spot in heaven above or earth beneath which it is not easier to examine than his heart. So full of intricate windings and deceitful appearances and so artfully wrapped in a thousand impenetrable folds that no eye but that of Omniscience can thoroughly look through it. And the man who does not realize that his heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked has yet to learn the ABCs of experimental religion.

But there is another more powerful difficulty in the way of attaining a thorough knowledge of the heart and that is a fearful tendency within us to look away from it. There is no other object so difficult to fasten the eye upon. And when we once get a distinct view of ourselves we love to be diverted from the picture.

No wonder then that with all these obstructions before him the Psalmist should cry out Who can understand his errors? Search me O God and know my heart - try me and know my thoughts. And see if there be any wicked way in me and lead me in the way everlasting. And surely then if David could not penetrate the recesses of his heart it is no wonder that we with all our pressure of worldly pursuits with all our strainings after distinction and with all our conformity to the world, should neglect its examination - should imagine ourselves to be rich and increased with goods and to have need of nothing, while we are wretched and miserable and poor and blind and naked.

It is the business of a Christian who grow in grace daily, to shut out from his soul the world the flesh and the Devil and to bring his heart for trial before the tribunal of conscience.

The great question here to be decided is whether he be at that moment prepared for heaven or hell? And to determine it he will examine the evidence on both sides with a most rigid and unsparing scrutiny. He will not shrink from the examination because he fears the result may at once destroy every hope of heaven and show his exposure to perdition: For if such be the case he wishes to know it while the day of salvation lasts.

But my brethren when we look back upon our Christian course how thinly is it marked with such seasons of self scrutiny. How often have we hurried through the world contenting ourselves with indefinite enquiries and in definite answers and passing judgment according to the laws of human society instead of the laws of God! And the little anxiety we feel concerning our spiritual state is the proof of this deficiency: For the more faithful a man is in self - examination the more depravity will he discover in his heart and the greater will be his anxiety to be freed from it lest it should conduct him to the pit of perdition. While on the other hand the more a man neglects to compare his heart with the law of God the less will he realize the enormous disagreements and the more inclined to settle down into a fatal security. While his feelings and views upon religious subjects are general his conscience will not be disturbed. For such views do not go deep enough to reach it - and such feelings like the faint rays of the winter sun upon the ice melt only the surface of heart. Deeper within it may be a frozen spot - barren of every Christian grace.

Genuine self-examination leads to secret prayer. If therefore we have failed in the former we have failed in the latter. But mark how difficult is it to reconcile this deficiency with supreme love to God. In every earthly friendship we inevitably delight in the society of our friends. If then we love God more than everything human and this is the very excess essence of religion, why do we so often come into his secret presence with so much indifference if not reluctance. Wherefore is it that there is frequently so much formality intrusion of the world and deadness in our communion with God? Why so much distance between God and our souls when there is a day's man between us who can lay his hand upon us both? O who can reconcile all these feelings and this conduct with Supreme love to God? In the words of Christ we may answer, With man this is impossible but with God all things are possible. The son of God is emphatically the sword of his Spirit. Very few men are so invulnerable that they can seriously read it without feeling a wound in the conscience. And is not this the cause why we are so prone to neglect it? If as admirers of fine writing we acknowledge the Bible to be full of sublimity and beauty excelling every work merely human - if as lovers of history we acknowledge the events there related to be full of interest - and if a Christian we believe it to contain the words of eternal life - why should that be so visible a disposition to neglect its perusal unless there be a fear within us that our hearts will be reached and smitten by this sword of the Almighty? That we do not understand the bible as well as we ought and might few of us will presume to deny. We all acknowledge this as the standard of religious truth: and yet in our conversations on the subject of religion how soon do we resort to speculation and probable reasoning. And on no other account but because our stocks of bible knowledge is exhausted. How much better do we understand many works upon literature and science than this work of God - this preparation book for the school of eternity!

As before observed the omission or imperfect performance of self-examination, secret prayer and reading the Scriptures - leads to a corresponding deficiency in every other duty. It has affected our observance of the Sabbath. In looking back upon these holy days who of us does not perceive a doing of his own ways - a finding of his own pleasure and a speaking of his own words? What Christian does not perceive a mixing of the things of earth with those of heaven. And when we look forward who does not see with trembling all these Sabbaths going before him to judgment?

It has affected our exertions for spreading the Redeemers kingdom among men. While sin has flourished on our right hand and on our left - while thousands perhaps some of them our relatives and friends have given decided evidence of their hatred of God and heaven - we have not warned them of their danger. When the fire has threatened their dwellings we have been faithful in giving the alarm: but the exposure of their souls to everlasting burnings could not extract from us even a word of exhortation to flee from the wrath to come.

It has affected our improvement of afflictions and mercies. When exercised with the former how seldom could we say in truth before I was afflicted I went astray: but now have I kept thy word. And when the latter have been showered upon us without number we failed to realize that, the goodness of God leadeth us to repentance. In short this deficiency has affected the whole man. It has caused many of us to be banished the clear and warm sunshine of God's favor into the cold and cloudy regions of the backslider where we must grow in the twilight and freeze with indifference. Hence are we served, with the spirit of slumber - having eyes that we should not see and ears that we should not hear, and continuously balancing between spiritual life and spiritual death.

And now Christian brethren let us summon all our resolution and collect together these many sins of commission and omission and uniting them with those secret sins that are known only to God and our own hearts let us hold them up be they errors so terrific and unsightly before the eye of conscience and look at them in mass and look at them one by one. And if I courage do not fail let us hold up by the side of our sins a catalog if they are not innumerable of the bounties of our long-suffering God. Next to this let be exhibited our obligations to love God supremely as for example his perfect and lovely attributes – a pleading savior – a Spirit of consolation - the word of God and the ordinances of the Gospel. And in the same field of view let there be written the ten commandments. And shall not our own good works also find a place? Alas if placed on such a picture they are too minute to be discovered.

This is the picture of my hearers which we should carry with us this day into our closets. And that is not a Christian eye which can view it unmoved. For there is written upon it in characters too plain to be mistaken in gratitude to God! But is there nothing that can blot out this mortifying inscription? O the tear of repentance and the sign of a broken heart will do much. Yet there is something more powerful still wanting - and it is within our reach. The blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin. Yes and through the pleadings of that spirit which maketh intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered that blood will be sprinkled upon every penitent. The foul inscription will be effaced and there will be written in its stead, Son be of good cheer. Thy sins be forgiven thee.

And when I look around upon this church and congregation do I not catch the eye of some venerable father in Christ Christ who came carries this inscription continually engraved upon his heart? Who can say with Paul, I have fought the good fight - I have kept the faith - henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness - for me to die in this is Christ, to die is gain - for I know that I have passed from death unto life - who although not yet delivered from infirmities and sins - does not feel quickly but of a small part of those which have been exhibited in this discourse? If there be such an one present he missed must be a man who early enlisted on the Lord side under the captain of his salvation - and who has grown gray in fighting the battles of faith. Just such a un1 it would be presumption in us who are young to offer advice. But we would be bold to ask it. We long to know by what resolutions by what prayers - by what mortifications of flesh and spirit only what services and the cause of Christ you have reached this enviable point in the Christian race. And should we survive you in this world, we want to catch your falling mantle as you are carried up by a chariot of fire into heaven!

Sermon 17 Deity of Christ

[Sermon No. 17, "Deity of Christ," John 1:1, 1820 Dec,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 3]

John 1:1

In the beginning was the Word and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.

The meaning of the language of the bible is to be obtained in the same way as the meaning of any other book. In this principle men of almost every denomination are agreed. Why then do they vary so much in their interpretations of scripture? One great source of their disagreement is the different state of feeling with which they read it. One takes it up and resolves to believe whatever facts are there stated, unless they most evidently contradict one another. Where the subject is above his reason and all his knowledge of it derived from revelation, if there be a difficulty in reconciling some of the facts stated concerning it in the bible with other known facts he is not disposed to say that there is any real contradiction - because he feels himself incompetent to decide. He prefers trusting to plain facts as given in the bible rather than to speculation.

Another man comes to the Scriptures with a resolution to believe no factor there stated or rather to doubt concerning the meaning of every passage till he can reconcile it with every other principle of revealed and natural religion. He supposes that the more perfectly his religious system derived from the bible apparently agrees with the reason the nearer is he to the truth and the more accurately does he understand the true meaning of scripture. Where the fact or doctrine is about the reach of his reason as for instance the future resurrection of the body he will indeed believe it on the authority of the bible, unless there be something in it that apparently clashes with some known principle of morality or science and then he will reject it. If he can he will attach some other meaning to the passage or passages - and if he cannot he will declare himself incapable of attaining to the sense.

We should not know before hand that these two men would be led by these different ideas to any very wide disagreement in religious doctrine. Because we could not say that the bible contained anything apparently opposed to reason. But facts show us that they will adopt very different systems. It becomes therefore necessary to determine which of these men has chosen the most proper mode of examining the Scriptures. And we cannot hesitate to approve of the first as the true course. For in the first place human reason is weak and very liable independently of the bible to form wrong conclusions especially concerning spiritual subjects. These are too much out of the sphere of reason to get a distinct view of them in our present darkened state. And so to God - his nature and the mode of his existence they are subjects too vast for our limited faculties if we are not quickened by revelation. In the second place from the very nature of a revelation we might presume it would contain things incomprehensible. And how shall we presume to say that an assumption concerning one of these things is contradictory to reason where we are able to look at it only in a single point and are ignorant of all its relations except one or two? In the third place this mode of examining the bible will tend to make us more humble than any other - and conquer any prejudices we may possess against facts in the scriptures that are unpleasant or mortifying to pride. We shall therefore be in a better frame of mind for examining them impartially to arrive at their true meaning. We shall be more disposed to look to God for the assistance of his Spirit to enable us to understand his word. And to get at its true meaning will be the principal object we shall have in view - the reconciliation of the facts with reason being a subordinate consideration. Whereas the man who takes a different course will not feel so much the need of divine assistance: because he supposes his reason to be a sufficient guide and when he comes to a text that seems to contain a mysterious and apparently obscure doctrine - he will be greatly disposed toward its meaning until it teaches something else.

Our first enquiry then in reading the bible is what facts does it reveal? The agreement or disagreement of those facts with one another and with our previous knowledge is an after consideration. Keeping this principle in view. I am about to examine at this time a very important Christian doctrine - and to enquire whether the Scriptures teach us that Christ is really and truly God? Let it be remembered that we are bound to enquire at this time merely after this simple fact. Whether there be three equal and eternal persons in the Trinity is not the question now under consideration. Those terms person and Trinity are of human invention not to be found in the Bible and have proceeded from the many unsuccessful attempts to explain the mode of the Divine existence as Father Son and Spirit. Such terms indeed may be of some use in communicating ideas on the subject so long as they are understood - but they are by no means essential to this doctrine of Christ's divinity. And in many cases they are doubtless the occasion of much difficulty in the reflecting mind and often lead to a disbelief in the doctrine. When the subject of Christ's divinity is mentioned how common is it for those who deny it to reply immediately that it is perfectly absurd to say that three persons are one person - God is one and yet three.

My hearers those who make use of these terms person and trinity as applied to the Godhead must if they can reconcile such seeming contradictions - we shall not attempt it. We wish you to lay aside these ideas at this time and attend to a simple question. Does the bible reveal to us that Christ is really and truly God?

In entering upon the consideration of this question a previous one occurs which must be first settled - how is the Supreme God distinguished in the Bible from all creatures? In the first place this distinction is made by the word God. This name is indeed applied in the Old Testament in a few cases to men. Thus Moses is called God to Pharaoh. But in all these cases the context prevents any mistake and renders the application of the word perfectly intelligible. And in the New Testament it is nowhere simply and singly used except to designate the Supreme God. In the second place the Supreme Gods is distinguished from creatures by his attributes such as almighty power universal knowledge and eternity. In the third place this distinction is made by representing the Supreme God as the only proper and lawful object of worship. Ye shall have no other Gods before me - I will not give my glory to another, etc.

Now if we find in the Bible that these three characters whereby the Supreme God is known from all creatures are each of them separately applied to Christ in the same unqualified manner as to God the conclusion will be irresistible that Christ is truly and really God - that is if the declarations of the sacred writers are to be credited.

Let us now examine the bible from Genesis to Revelations solely with a view to determine this question. In the course of this examination I select and put down only such passages as are most striking and clear upon the point. In the ninth chapter of Isaiah the prophet says of Christ, For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulders and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Jeremiah also says, this is the name whereby he shall be called, the Lord (that is Jehovah) our righteousness. In Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians is this text - Neither let us tempt Christ as some of them also tempted and were destroyed of serpents. And now to the 21st chapter of Numbers and the event to which the Apostles alludes is thus described - And Jehovah sent fiery serpents among the people and they bit the people and much people of Israel died. Paul therefore calls Christ Jehovah. He also expressly calls him God – Of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came who is over all God bless forever - Amen. Again in Hebrews he applies to Christ this passage from the Psalms – But unto the son he saith thy throne O God is forever and ever; a scepter of righteousness is the scepter of the kingdom. Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity; therefore God even thy God hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows. In another place Paul says, let the same mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus, who being in the form of God thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but humbled himself, etc. In the writings of John are many passages very clear up on the subject among which is our text- In the beginning was the Word and Word was with God and the Word was God. From the same Gospel we may likewise produce this reply of Thomas when his doubts concerning Christ were removed, And Thomas answered and said unto him my Lord and my God. Also the conversation between Christ and Philip – Philip saith unto him, Lord shew us the Father and it suffereth us - Jesus saith unto him have I been so long time with you and yet hast thou not known me Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, shew us the Father? In John's first Epistle is this text, And we know that the Son of God is come and hath given us an understanding that we may know him that is true even in his son Jesus Christ - this is the true God and eternal life.

Here then we find a series of texts disperse through the Bible where Christ is expressly called God or Jehovah. But are not these passages wrongly translated - or have they not been added to the sacred text since the days of the Apostles? To determine these questions I resort to the comments of learned men and find that there can be little doubt about the genuineness or correct translation of these verses. The most that has ever been done by any these men is to conjecture that the passages might have been originally written differently. But these conjectures have no facts to support them and therefore of no consequence.

You have however doubtless perceived that I have omitted to mention several text where Christ is expressly or impliedly called God. Such as that in the first Epistle of John – There are three that bear record in heaven the Father the Word and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one. Also that in Revelations – I am Alpha and Omega the beginning and the ending saith the Lord which is and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty. And that in the first Epistle to Timothy – God was manifest in the flesh - justified in the spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory: and likewise that in Acts – feed the church of God which he hath purchased with his own blood. These texts have been omitted in proof of the doctrine of Christ's divinity not because there is no evidence that they are a part of the bible but because that evidence is not so complete as it is in the passages that have been produced. These texts might require considerable time to clear them from objections and in such an examination there would be danger of forgetting the point at which we were aiming. Those texts therefore have been chosen which have stood and will stand the most severe scrutiny of criticism and which cannot be warped by friends or enemies. And now if these texts do not teach in us that Christ is really and truly God, I confess that I cannot see that they teach any thing – may I cannot understand any part of the Bible.

But we proceed in the next place to enquire whether any of the attributes of God be ascribed to Christ in the Bible. Try first the attributes of almighty power. And here let it be remarked that the only mode of proving God to possess omnipotence is from the fact that he created the Universe. So the power that is able to perform this we can set no limits and hence conclude is to be infinite. Now John says of Christ, All things were made by him and without him was nothing made that was made. And these words of the Psalmist are applied by Paul to the Son of God – And thou Lord in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth and the heavens are the works of thy hand, they shall perish but thou remainest: and they shall wax old as cloth or garment; and as a creature shalt thou fold them up and they shall be changed: but though art the same and thy years shall not fail. And in the Epistle to the Colossians Paul thus speaks of Christ - Who is the image of the invisible God - the first born of every creature: For by him were all things created that are in heaven and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones or dominions or principalities or powers: all things were created by him and for him: And he is before all things and by him all things consist. Here then the creation and the presentation of the universe are ascribed to Christ. If we now look to the old Testament we shall find it stated that, In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth. And God by the mouth of Isaiah speaks of himself - I am the Lord that maketh all things, that stretcheth forth the heavens alone, that spreadeth abroad the earth by myself. Thus do one class of passages in the bible ascribe the creation and support of the universe to Christ and another to God. If therefore Christ be not God the scriptures contain a direct contradiction not only in sense but in words. And my hearers, let God be true, but every man a liar.

We come next to enquire whether the scriptures attribute omniscience or universal knowledge to Christ. Peter saith unto him, Lord thou knowest all things. And Christ by his silence assented to this declaration. Says Christ, no one knoweth the son but the Father; neither knoweth any one the Father save the Son and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him. Christ therefore is able to comprehend God and must have infinite knowledge since God is infinite. In the address of Solomon to God at that the dedication of the temple he says, For thou even thou only knowest the hearts of all the children of men. Yet in Revelations Christ says, And all the churches shall know that I am he who heareth the reins and the hearts. If these things do not prove omniscience, what can?

Let us now look for evidence of Christ's eternity. Says Paul to the Hebrews, Jesus Christ the same yesterday today and forever. And in Revelations, not in the passage that has been already mentioned as not possessing complete evidence of having been spoken by Christ but in the 22nd chapter, Christ says, I am Alpha and Omega the beginning and the end the first and the last. That the person here speaking is Christ is evident because in the preceding verse he says, behold I come quickly, and in the third verse following the same person says I have, sent mine angel, etc. Now in the preceding chapter the same description is given of God which is here given of Christ - I am the Alpha and the Omega the beginning and the end. And in Isaiah Jehovah thus speaks of himself - I am the first and I am the last and besides me there is no God. That is the eternity of my existence distinguishes me from all false Gods.

Thus do we find the bible most clearly attributing omnipotence omniscience and eternity to Christ. Let us now proceed to the last distinction between God and creatures - and enquire whether the Scriptures ascribe and render proper divine worship to Christ.

In the Gospel of John Christ speaks in this manner, For as the Father raiseth the dead and restoreth them to life so also the Son restoreth to life whom he pleases. For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son, that all men might honor the Son even as they honor the Father. But how is the Father honored? By obedience - by love and by worship - yet such ad in an equal degree is the honor claimed by Christ.

It may however be said that the word worship has two significations meaning obeisance as well as spiritual homage and perhaps by men's worshiping Christ is meant nothing more than obeisance. Grant that the word does mean these two things and that some while Christ was on earth paid him obeisance as an uncommon man who yet thought nothing of spiritual worship. Yet we find this worship is not confined to man but is paid by angels and archangels who cannot be ignorant of the true character of Christ and if the following passages do not describe a worship as chaste as spiritual and as exalted is ever given to the Supreme God it will be impossible in human language to describe such worship.

When he (God) bringeth in the first begotten into the world he saith let all the angels of God worship him. Again in the second chapter of Philippians, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow of things in heaven and things in earth and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father. Hear also the vision of John when heaven was open to him, And I beheld and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne and the beasts and the elders the beast and the elders: and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand and thousands of thousands; saying with a loud voice worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power and riches and wisdom and strength and honor and glory and blessing and every creature which is in heaven and on earth and under the earth and such as are in the sea and all that are in them hear of saying blessing and honor and glory and power be unto him that sits upon the throne and onto the Lamb forever and ever - And the four beasts said amen. And the four and 20 elders fell down and worshiped him that liveth forever and ever. Is this mere obeisance - an inferior kind of worship? O my hearers it is one of the most elevated songs of heaven.

Many instances may be produced where Christ was worshiped by his disciples and followers. The strongest case of the kind is that of Stephen, who in the agonies of a cruel death when he had seen heaven opened and beheld the glory of God and Jesus standing on the right hand of God cried out, Lord Jesus receive my spirit. And he kneeleth down and cried with a loud voice, Lord lay not this sin to their charge - and having said this he fell asleep new.

Is this mere obeisance an inferior kind of worship? And could a dying martyr favored with a vision of God be so much mistaken as to violate the first and greatest commandment of the decalogue - thou shalt have no other gods before me - thou shalt worship no other God? If he were thus mistaken so was Paul when he besought Christ that the messenger of Satan might depart from him - and he prays, that God himself and the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ might direct his way unto the Thessalonians - and also when he prays that grace and peace from God to the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ might rest upon the Romans - and indeed what apostle and martyr was not mistaken!

In thus going through the Scriptures we find separately and unequivocally the names and the characters of God ascribed to Christ in an unqualified manner. He has every title given him that is bestowed upon the only living and true God except that of Father. The attributes of omnipotence omniscience and eternity (and indeed every other attribute) are given him. He is described as the creator, upholder, governor, and disposer of the Universe and finally he is represented as worthy of the worship and as having received the worship of men and angels. All those marks these by which God is distinguished from creatures in the Scriptures are applied equally to Christ and equally distinguish him from all creatures. If then God be God Christ is God.

My hearers we have been enquiring in this discourse after a single simple fact - whether Christ be truly and really God. And now setting aside all previous opinions we have formed - and omitting all efforts to explain the doctrine and looking at the naked fact, does not the bible reveal it as plainly as any other fact whatever? Suppose I had heard of such a city as London and that it was in England. I now take up a geography of the world to determine whether this be true. On examination I find it stated in half a dozen places in this work that London is in England. In other places also it is said to be in Great Britain and England is known to be a part of Great Britain. It is also said to be on the River Thames and that I know to be in England. It is also put down in the map of the world as being in England and its latitude and longitude agree to England. After all this should I have any doubt that London was in England?

Perhaps this comparison may be thought imperfect on such a subject: but I would ask whether with all this evidence before me I should not have as much reason to doubt of the situation of London as I should to deny that Christ is God when I find the facts so clearly and so repeatedly stated in the bible? I am aware indeed that an objector will produce in opposition to the texts I have advanced many others in which Christ is described as inferior to God. Such texts will indeed prove another fact that Christ was a man: but I dare not say that this contradicts the idea of his being God because the subject is beyond my comprehension. When I hear John declaring that, the Word was with God and was God, I feel it to be safer to trust to his declaration than to my own speculations about contradictions: And with the example of an apostle before me I cannot refrain from crying out in view of Christ with all the strength I and ardor of an unwavering faith – My Lord and my God!

Sermon 20 Joys of Heaven

[Sermon No. 20, "Joys of Heaven," Psalms 16:11, 1820 Jun,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 4]

Psalms 16:11

In thy presence is fullness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore.

It is not given to Christians [man] in this life fully to understand the nature and amount of heavenly happiness. Yet the Scriptures sometimes draw aside the veil that hangs before futurity and give us a glimpse of the eternal mansions. And from their representations we learn that the joys of heaven will be internal, external, and eternal. Here then are we get at once three divisions for this discourse. And we shall first endeavour to describe those heavenly joys that are internal - or in other words proceed from the nature of those who dwell there. For the happiness of heaven will not result entirely from an immediate agency of God. It will in part and in no small degree neither, flow from that holy principle implanted in every regenerated soul. God is necessarily happy in himself: because his nature is such as must make him so. And the saint whose soul is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that creates him must for the former reason feel a similar happiness - in a less degree indeed: because God is infinite - man finite. Whenever the saint - is placed if sin be away from him, he must experience a degree of happiness: for the sole tendency of moral virtue or holiness is to produce this. In the present life this tendency is thwarted in a great measure by sin; but when the Christian is freed from this body of death, it will be in him a well of water springing up unto everlasting happiness. It is as natural for a Christian at death to go to heaven as for the sun to rise or the streams to descend. He has within him the seeds of happiness: and wherever he be there will spring up and flourish. Wherever he be he is in heaven.

But holiness is an active principle and therefore the heavenly inhabitants will be full of exertion. In this world our efforts produce weariness - fatigue and pain: but in heaven with a body and mind can never tire, the reverse will take place and activity will be a principal source of happiness.

In the first place it will be one employment of the righteous in another world to study the works and learn the character of God.

The works of God are either material or immaterial. It is generally supposed that the material part that is the visible universe will all be destroyed at the general judgment. But perhaps there is not sufficient foundation in the Scriptures for such an opinion. And it is much more accordant with our ideas of the goodness of God to suppose that He will continue through eternity to fill space with worlds and worlds with various beings. Now even in this world limited and imperfect as is our knowledge of nature, how alluring and full of interest is the study of the works of God! Whether we look abroad upon the earth and consider the immense yet harmonious variety of insects, animals, plants, and minerals in the earth, air or water, or whether we turn our eyes toward heaven and look at those eighty million suns and worlds that move in silent order and beauty over our heads, there is a calmness - a delight an elevation and a purity in which we render them worthy an immortal soul such contemplations! How supreme the satisfaction then to examine all these astonishing and magnificent works of God with the pure eye of an inhabitant of heaven. But if the present material universe be all destroyed of the judgment there will be a new heaven and a new earth fit for the residence of righteous and undying spirits. And if the present earth and heavens display so much of the wisdom power and goodness of God, how supreme will be the beauty of this new creation - and how impressively will the character of Jehovah be written upon if to learn whose character will be delightful employment of eternity.

Now if there is reason to suppose that if the world of matter can afford any joy to a glorified spirit much greater will be its delight in examining the world of minds. See all the heavenly inhabitants are made in the image of God - and if the powers of some of the inhabitants of the earth distinguished for their wisdom and knowledge excite our admiration how will this be increased when we are permitted to contemplate the faculties of angels and archangels and to advance in this investigation investigation through the scale of higher intelligences towards the forever incomprehensible Jehovah! There too will the Redeemer, having the form the features and the feelings of a man and yet being over all God blessed forever, there will his mysterious and interesting character furnish a source of everlasting enquiry and contemplation. And through his human nature maybe learnt all that finite beings can learn of the superior Divinity.

The character of God will be more extensively learnt in heaven from his moral government. And the righteous there will be able to understand this - to see the origin, reason, bearing and ultimate effect of every act of God's Providence. What I do, says Christ, though knowest not now but thou shalt know hereafter. The whole created universe will then appear as it really is, an immense system of means every one of which however remote appearance now, and however mysterious, has an important bearing upon the great end of all gods works viz. to promote his glory and the good of the universe.

In this world and in this subject we speak as children we understand as children we think as children. For we now see through a glass darkly: but then face to face. Now we know in part but then shall we know even as we are known. Though to mortal vision clouds and darkness are round about God, and though, he hath his way in a great deep, yet in heaven will be seen that, justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne, and that, mercy and truth go before his face.

Thou art now perplexed O Christian when the when the wicked prosper. When their minions designs succeed and when they oppress the righteous. You see them triumphing over all efforts to extend the Gospel - breaking down religious institutions and establishing immortality and infidelity on their ruins while the faithful and devoted servant of Christ can do no more than sigh and cry in secret places for these abominations. At a period so gloomy the providence of God appears to you inexplicable and you feel your faith in Him to be severely tried. But in heaven you will see that all these events were part of God's moral government - you will see that instead of hindering any of his plans they were the means of accelerating their accomplishment. You'll see that the wrath of man is made to praise God: and while the ungodly set themselves in array against the Lord and against his anointed and exert all their efforts to break down religion in the world all the labors are made subservient to the more speedy establishment of the Redeemer's kingdom.

If may be you are perplexed when you see the mild and faithful Christian struggling through life with poverty sickness and misfortune and finding in this world no resting place. If he be indeed a Son of God why is the hand of the Lord thus heavily laid upon him - why must he go down to the grave in sorrow? O you will learn the cause of all this in heaven when you see on what an exalted throne this man sits - and how purely he shines in the kingdom of God having come forth out of great tribulation as gold several times refined.

Perhaps too in this life you find incomprehensible in some of the doctrines of the bible. You cannot see how man is a free agent and yet entirely dependant on God - how every event can be decreed in the councils of heaven and yet man be accountable for his actions - how the existence of sin and pain and death in the world are reconcilable with the benevolence and wisdom of God - and how a thousand other difficulties perplex you unsolvable by mortal intellect – fettered in a mortal body. But in heaven being freed from the grossness all these things will be unraveled and you will be able to trace the various branches of the great chain of the divine government and to see how beautifully and harmoniously they bind the universe in one great whole.

These are some of the interesting subjects that will probably exercise the faculties of future glorified spirits. And in themselves they are inexhaustible - in as the heavenly inhabitant advances from one degree of knowledge to another he will find the field continually opening before him his faculties perpetually enlarging - new sources of knowledge unfolding - and everything brightening and beautifying in his intellectual march towards the source of all knowledge and beauty and glory - the unsearchable God. No feeble organs of sense will then interrupt the delightful search – but as their minds speak so will their resurrection bodies be fitted for everlasting and untired exertion. They will drink forever at the fountain of truth and wisdom - undeceived by faults or imperfections and unfettered by the grossness of mortality. The innumerable societies of blessed in heaven will assist each other's investigations - advance without emulation yet with vigor in the same paths and communicate to each other the various dispensations of God to his church and their respective ages and their own trials and temptations - warfare with the world, perseverance and triumphs. Oh how animating the thought that you will then hear from the mouth of Adam, of Noah, of Abraham, of Moses, of David, of Paul and the whole constellation of patriarchs, prophets, apostles and martyrs - the history of their spiritual conflicts and victories!

The second employment of glorified spirits which will be mentioned is to befriend each other.

When Solomon had lived long and observed much of the world he exclaimed, A faithful man who can find? And many a man since him smarting under the wounds of treacherous friendship has repeated the question. Oh the friendships of earth are indeed full of uncertainty.

As breath will make them in a breath destroy.

But in heaven will each one literally love his neighbor as himself. For there will be no separate interests no rivalry for honors or profit - no undue ambition - no jealousy to stir up resentment and intrigue and kindle the hatred of spirit against spirit. There the interest of one will be the interest of all. Every individual will perceive that his own station in heaven is precisely that which is calculated to afford him the most delight and contribute most to the pleasure of all. In that station he finds all the happiness he can desire and he cannot envy others. And no small share of this happiness will result from rendering mutual service to each other. Throughout heaven there cannot be found an enemy. In this world if we have one faithful friend it is an inestimable blessing; but there all will be friends - not requiring the trial of twenty summers to prove their sincerity and constancy but at first and forever faithful and constant. Among the many millions of the heavenly inhabitants you will not find one who feels indifferent to your welfare - not one whose heart is not open to your inspection - where you can read all his thoughts and feelings - and these will all be in harmonious unison with yours thus begetting a mutual love that cannot decay. O this is a friendship of which heaven alone is worthy and which heaven alone can produce. It is not the feeble and fickle attachment of mortals but the warm the vigorous and the eternal affection of immortals.

In the third place the chief employment of the blessed in heaven will be to glorify God and the Lamb.

In a future state God will comparatively be all in all both in the natural and moral creation. And these astonishing displays of his character cannot but awaken supreme reverence in the glorified spirits. He will indeed be divested of those terrors in which he so often manifested himself to our inhabitants of earth. To sinners he appeared as a devouring fire in his way was in the whirlwind and the storm - but these manifestations are in heaven unnecessary. Yet he must forever appear in an incomparable greatness and majesty - and here will be a ground for the most profound reverence.

The heavenly host will also find an unfailing source for admiration in God's works of creation and providence. Even in this darkened state enough is seen to awaken this emotion - how much higher then will it rise in heaven where the cumbrous fetters of mortality will be unloosed and the soul be free to range without limit and to comprehend with angelic cleanness!

And from all the displays of God's character on earth and in heaven will the saints hereafter be induced to trust in him trusting him with unwavering confidence. From all these emotions there must result a supreme love - a perpetual complacency in a being so great and wise and good. And when the glorified spirit looks at himself and considers what this being has done for him in bringing him to that place of happiness and perceives the exhaustless streams of divine goodness flowing out continually upon ten thousand times ten thousand beings around him then there must spring up within him a returning feeling of gratitude.

All these exercises which spontaneously rise in the glorified spirit will flow out into songs of praise. In this employment an innumerable company of angels and the great multitude which no man can number of all nations kindreds and tongues are described by John as engaged. They surround the throne and unite in the song, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty who was and is and is to come! Amen blessing and glory and honor and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne and unto the lamb forever. These elevated descriptions will flow from souls filled with admiration of God and love to his character and since these exercises will be eternal coeternal will be this song.

All this is what is meant by glorifying God. And what greater glory can the creature render to the Creator? So great a part of the employment of heaven will consist of these exercises that the Scriptures call heaven a temple - and describe the heavenly inhabitants as in the temple day and night serving God.

We come at length to the second general division of this discourse where we are to attempt to point out those joys of heaven that are external. By this term I mean such joys as are conferred by the direct agency of God. And that such an agency is exerted the tenor of Scripture decides. It will consist in the first place in giving an absolute release from all infirmity sorrow and pain. These things could not indeed entirely destroy the saints happiness but they would greatly diminish it. God however might place them in a state subject to these evils. But it shall not be this in heaven - for the glory of God enlightens it in the lamb is the light thereof: and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes - and there shall be no more curse. (They shall hunger no more neither thirst any more neither shall the sun cast upon them nor any heat.) There remaineth a rest to the people of God.

In the next place the direct agency of God in heaven will supersede positive pleasures to the righteous. We are not able indeed to decide what these pleasures will consist. For we cannot fathom the stores of infinite benevolence. But we are certain that to him that overcometh will Christ give to eat of the hidden manna and will give him a white stone and in the stone a new name written which no man knoweth saving him that receiveth it. He shall eat of the tree of life which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them and shall lead them to living fountains of water. Whatever different views may be entertained of that figurative language all will agree in this, that it implies a direct communication of very great happiness from God to the righteous. But even Paul did not attempt a description of these joys although he saw them: for they were unspeakable.

In the last place the joys of heaven will be eternal. And this is a property necessary to give perfection to all the rest - and God said that heavenly happiness should be more pure and elevated and that the Saint should feast upon the stores of infinite benevolence and yet had he added that this happiness should at some remote period terminate - it would at once cast a dark shade over the picture. The glorified spirit would be continually looking forward with a fearful, melancholy anxiety to the period of this banishment from felicity. And this would be even in heaven an undying horror that would devour every joy in its bud. But there is no such fear in heaven for the righteous, Shall go into life eternal to an inheritance incorruptible undefiled and that fadeth not away. They shall reign forever and ever. In the presence of God they shall have fullness of joy and at his right hand pleasure for evermore.

And not only will the joys of heaven be eternal but they will perpetually increase. As the faculties enlarge they will become capable of greater enjoyment. And God will continually multiply the means of enjoyment. So that the inhabitants of heaven will find his path of happiness wider and brighter as he advances. And his soul both in capacity and joy will be more and more like God as the ages of eternity roll over his head.

Such my brethren is a faint description of those felicities that are the inheritance of every regenerated soul that endures unto the end. And after all how far short of the reality is this description! O it doth not yet appear, says John, what we shall be. But we know that when Christ shall appear we shall be like him: for we shall see him as he is. In this world we are permitted to catch only a glimpse catch of heaven. The full disclosure would overwhelm our feeble powers. But when we are told that in the presence of God is fullness of joy and at his right hand pleasures for evermore, full license is given to us to suffer our imaginations stretch themselves to the utmost in anticipating this glorious rest. We need not fear a disappointment of our anticipations by too ardent or too vivid a conception of those boundless joys. In the hour of spiritual stupidity these conceptions will reanimate our dying love and hopes - and while we are struggling along the rough and barren regions of the earth it will revive our fainting spirits to direct our eyes to those immortal shores - to those sweet fields that stand forever dressed in living green.

Are bound now O Christian bending beneath the weight of infirmity - feeble and pale with some inveterate disease that is slowly undermining your constitution and spoiling all your relish for the comforts of life and enfeebling you for the services of God - O lift up your head for your redemption draweth nigh. Your infirmities and disorders you will leave in the grave - and a body spiritual and immortal will be given you - and your pains will not be remembered amid the joys of heaven.

Art thou oppressed with poverty and with the reproach of the world - art thou vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked - O remember that your Redeemer now lives and reigns being in heaven though worse than you was he once on earth persecuted hated and despised without a place to lay his head. And he will prepare a place for you in his house - will bring forth the best robe and put it on you - and your poverty and persecution will be exchanged for the riches and the love of heaven.

Or art thou Christian, now mourning over the ingratitude and treachery of a child or a friend? Art thou forsaken by one most dear to you on whom you leaned for support and left alone to struggle through an unfeeling world. It will all be made up to you in heaven - you have a friend there who never faileth and he will soon receive you to his bosom that where he is you may be also. What though for a few days you feel the wounds of ingratitude and be without a friend. Soon will you open your eyes in that world where ten thousand times ten thousand glorified spirits will extend their arms to receive you to their bosoms and cherish for you a friendship pure as heaven - lasting as eternity.

Sermon 22 [Ways in Which Christ Knocks at the Door of the Human Heart]

[Sermon No. 22, "Ways in Which Christ Knocks at the Door of the Human Heart," Revelation 3:20, 1820 Jun, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 4]

Revelations 3:20

Behold I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear my voice and open the door I will come in to him and will sup with him and he with me.

Notwithstanding all that has been said concerning the inability of the natural heart to love God it is doubtful whether any sinner ever believed there was any insurmountable obstacle in the way of his becoming religious - if he were in earnest to set himself about it. If any have realized that their own unaided exertions were insufficient to give them this character yet when they read in the bible that God giveth the Holy Spirit to them that ask him - that every one who asketh receiveth and he that seeketh findeth and to him that knocketh it shall be opened - that the grace of God which bringeth salvation hath appeared unto all men and when he hears Christ saying, behold I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear my voice and open the door I will come in to to him and will sup with him and he with me - when such persons read the unlimited promises of assistance though they believe in their own inability even to think a good thought yet they cannot avoid realizing that they might be able to overcome this through Christ strengthening them. And if after all they do not become religious it is impossible they should not charge the deficiency upon themselves and feel guilty of the grossest negligence in not receiving offered assistance. The object of this discourse is to exhibit more particularly in what this assistance consists or to show in what ways Christ knocks at the door of the heart. And he does this

By his spirit,
By his word,
By his ordinances,
By his providences.

Christ knocks at the door of the heart by his spirit.

So radical deep and universal is the disparity of man's heart so dreadfully alienated from God in its every affection and so much positive opposition to his character exists in it that the heat of summer is not more necessary to the bringing forth of the plants of the earth - than is the influence of the Spirit of God to the production and preservation of holiness in the soul. Let man put forth his mightiest moral energies let him rigidly adhere to rules of discipline and duty let him study the works and the character of God - if during all this while the Spirit be withheld he has labored in vain and has not acquired one particle of love to God. Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one. Every good and every perfect gift not only in the natural but in the moral world is from above and comes down from the Father of lights.

But Blessed be God he has promised that in the times of the Gospel - that is after the coming of Christ unto the end of time he will pour out his Spirit upon all flesh, Christ hath, ascended up on high leading captivity captive and gave gifts unto men. It is expedient for you says Christ to his disciples that I go away: for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you: but if I depart I will send him unto you. And when he is come he will reprove the works of sin and of righteousness and of judgment of sin because they believe not on me – Of righteousness because I go to my Father and ye see me no more; of judgment because the prince of this world is judged. Here it is evident that by the Spirits reproving the world we are to understand that he reproves the whole world not only saints but sinners: for in the next verse the reason of the reproof is given - because they believe not on me - and this is the character of sinners.

From these passages and many more that might be named - indeed from the tenor of the bible throughout the tenor of the bible throughout - we may be assured that although we are not sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves yet God's Spirit is even striving with us and warning us of our spiritual danger. As the result of Christ's obedience and intercession he is poured out upon all flesh and when they do not visit him he convinces them of sin righteousness and of judgment to come. When they listen to his warnings he alarms them till they are disposed to flee to the strong hold of safety - and when they hearken to his invitations of mercy he melts their hearts into gratitude by exhibiting to them the boundless love of God displayed in the work of redemption.

The incipient influences of the spirit however when he has not yet entered the heart but is only knocking at the door of it, are so gentle and mild that we are very apt to mistake them for the ordinary operations of the mind. Indeed how can the sinner (and of such we now speak) believe that the Spirit is operating upon his own heart when he denies his influence upon any heart? But there are seasons when every unregenerate man pauses in his worldly and sinful pursuits and seriously reflects upon his past conduct and his future state – when for a time he feels that there is something real in religion and something unsatisfying in the world - and something wrong in his heart. Then is the Spirit active - and these feelings as a result of his influences. Some peculiar circumstances and the man's condition might indeed have been the immediate cause of his sober reflections. But the Spirit gives his thoughts religious character and this up his moral powers of discernment. But the world again presents its allurements, Satan is active in his efforts - and this man closes his ears to the Spirits warnings and returns to his wallowing in the mine. O what an exchange has he made! Had he only opened the door of his heart. He who was in the beginning with God and was God – he who created all things in heaven and earth, visible and indivisible would have come in and been his guest. But against him does he shut the door. And what companions has he in exchange. O vile substitutes! The world - the flesh and the Devil!

There are times also when the sinner realizes that the Bible deserves more of his serious perusal. He can indeed repeat many passages out of it but he has never read it seriously and with a heartfelt anxiety to discover the truth it reveals. He resolves to commence a sober investigation of the sacred volume. This my hearers is the workings of the Spirit. Not but that the man could read the bible without supernatural assistance yet he would not read it with such impressions of its importance - there would be a part of that religiousness of feeling he now experiences. And did this man carry into effect his resolutions - did he improve the gentle breathings of the Comforter he would find them followed by a demonstration of the Spirit and of power. For whosoever hath to him shall be given and he shall have abundantly but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath. And so probably would it be with this man. His reading the bible would be limited to a few chapters - because he had not cherished that religious feeling the Spirit had given him. But suffered it to be effaced by the lusts of the world - those eternal enemies to religion - those resisters of the Holy Ghost.

There are other seasons when the Spirit unwilling that any should perish stands at the door of the heart and beseeches admittance. You will never forget that hour when some dear friend was torn from you by death your arms by death - and you are left alone on earth a monument of sorrow - O then how tender and yielding was your heart. And with your sensibility there was mingled a feeling of religion. The thoughts of another world often came across your soul because your friend had gone thither. And if you were in heaven you longed at your exit from life to be with him. But for that holy place you fill yourself unprepared and there seemed between your soul and God a mighty interval - an untrodden gulf - you felt alarmed and were brought even to pour out your soul in prayer. O then did the Spirit like a kind friend redouble his strivings with your soul and make intercessions for you with groanings that could not be uttered. But gradually did your affection for the dead pass from your heart by the intrusion of the living and so did your thoughts of heaven, go away as the morning cloud and as the earthly dew.

In like manner does the Spirit renew his strivings with the unconverted heart at every peculiar season of life. When mercies are showered down in perfusion he touches a more tender string and would fain awaken the feelings of gratitude and love toward so kind and bountiful Father in heaven. In the day of sickness he addresses the fears - as also when his judgments are abroad in the land or the voice of his thunder is in the heavens and his lightnings lighted the earth and the tempest is spreading ruin around us. Through the instrumentality of his preached word he likewise comes sometimes an unwelcome visitor with a voice that thrills through the soul of the sinner and carries conviction to the conscience. But alas how often are these convictions suffered to bear away without terminating in conversion!

But we have dwell upon the first head of this discourse longer than we intended and therefore hasten to say in the second place that Christ knocks at the door of the heart by his Word. And were not man's heart harder than the stones it would be broken by this so powerful engine: for in Jeremiah it is said - Is not my word like as a fire? saith the Lord; and like a hammer that breaketh that rock in pieces! It is also emphatically styled by Paul, The sword of the Spirit, and again he says, for the soul of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and Spirit and of the joints and marrow and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart. And when we examine the bible we find that the Apostle has not over rated it's power: though to the understanding of those who have never felt its influence and never read it with seriousness this language of Paul appears the mere effusion of an over heated enthusiast. There is such a simplicity yet pungency in the Scriptures - such a knowledge of the human heart and such a searching into its dark windings displayed by the inspired freeman - such a blow is aimed at human pride on almost every page - such a sinking of the creature and exalting of the Creator - such a bold and unsparing delineation of the universal and unalienated depravity of the human heart - such a picture of the wretchedness blindness and helplessness of man by nature - such a vigorous grouping of mankind into two great classes of sinners and saints - such a leveling of human distinctions - such an extension of the law of God even to the thoughts and motives - in fine so much of heaven and so little of earth is found in the bible that there is no such thing as reading it sincerely and seriously with a belief that it is from God without feeling it's reproofs, entering like so many arrows into the conscience. When the sinner seriously compares his own doings and feelings with the law of God as given in the bible - when he reads that the first great commandment is to love the Lord with all his heart soul and strength - and perceived by looking back upon the exercises of his heart that he does not love him at all - when he reads that, whether he eat or drink or whatever he do he must do all to the glory of God and cannot avoid knowing that the glory of God has no place among the motives of his conduct, when he reads that he must deny himself and take up his cross and follow Christ - must crucify the lusts and unholy affections - must not love the world neither the things that are in the world - must pray without ceasing - must confess Christ before men - must come out from the world and be separate - and all this time knows that he indulges in known sin - that he has never restrained his passions any farther than health and worldly reputation required - that he has uniformly and eagerly sought the riches or honors of the world solely from selfish motives without any desire to promote thereby the cause of religion - that he does not pray at all unless it be in seasons of affliction - that he has not confessed Christ before man - nor done anything in his service - nor come out from the world any farther than to live externally decent to which worldly interest prompted - when the sinner makes such a comparison as this and he cannot avoid doing it he attentively read the bible, it must discover to him his total deficiency and his imminent danger: A conflict will most likely ensue in his heart between the flesh and the spirit and he may be induced open the door that Christ may come in to him and be formed in him the hope of glory. Now there are three modes in which sinners avoid this result. The first is to deny that the bible is inspired - the second is to read it carelessly over with a caviling sceptical spirit - and the third not to read it at all. In one or the other of these modes are most men successful in shielding their hearts against the penetrating influence of the Word of God - and the last of these methods viz. not to read the Scriptures is the one most usually employed.

We come in the third place to say that Christ knocks at the door of the heart by his ordinances. Among these the Sabbath and the administration of the word by preaching are the most restricting. And even infidels acknowledge their importance in maintaining morality and order and decency among men. Since experience evinces that where these ordinances are not maintained society soon relapses into corruption and barbarism. But their influence is not limited to this world. Religion also advances or declines as these flourish or decay. Faith, says Paul, cometh by hearing. And how they shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher? Ever since the days of Christ his house has been the spot most signalized for the conversion of such sinners. Thousands have there first felt the arrows of conviction reach their hearts, piercing there a wound which they could never heal till they had applied to the great physician of souls.

Let not the success of the ministers of the Gospel however be imputed to their own strength - or talents or eloquence or superior holiness. They are but men, weak, sinful men - who have within them the same passions to subdue - the same body of death to weigh them down - and the same spiritual conflicts to maintain as other men. The treasure of the Gospel is committed to earthen vessels that the excellency of the power may be of God and not of men. God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the mighty - that no flesh should glory in his presence. It is not always under the preaching of that man who can bring all the energies of a gigantic mind to impress the truth of the Gospel that we find the most instances of arrested attention and conviction of heart - nor under the preaching of him whose harmonious periods and striking images fasten upon him every eye and captivate every feeling. All this may be to the heavens only as a very lovely song of one that has a pleasant voice and can play well on an instrument: for they hear his words but they do them not.

The truth is my hearers that aside from the cooperation of the Spirit the chief efficacy of preaching and of all the Gospel ordinances results from their nature. There is something in the stillness and order of the Sabbath and its professed object that can hardly fail of arresting the attention of the most careless. And as to preaching, there are no other subjects so momentous, grand, and awful as those discussed in the pulpit - and however plain and homely the dressing in which they may be presented their inherent dignity grandeur and solemnity, though they may be obscured cannot be destroyed. The doctrines of the Gospel cannot be presented in a more forcible manner than in the language of the bible. And yet how plain, unaffected and simple is that language! In short the bible is a quiver full of arrows and however unskillfully the preacher may hurl them it is scarcely possible that some of them should not reach the conscience.

But notwithstanding the fitness of the Ordinances of Christ to arrest the attention of the sinners, the great majority of men contrive to evade their influence and to close their ears against that voice which Christ is thus directing to their hearts. This is in part effected by neglecting these ordinances - and in part by attending upon them in a careless improper manner with hearts full of the word; whereby the world is choked and becometh unfruitful.

The next mode and the last we shall mention in which Christ may be said to knock at the door of the heart is by his Providences.

The influence of condition upon the sentimental feelings and habits of men is very extensive. A change in our external state frequently produces a change in feeling and sentiment. We seem as it were to be translated into a new region where objects appear to us in an entirely different aspect. This is more eminently true of adversity. It has a powerful influence in moving those scales from our eyes which prosperity have covered over them. To be abundantly filled with this world's good things ought indeed to lead our thoughts in gratitude to the giver - and were not it not for a strange perversity in our hearts and the dreadful alienation of affections from God which would be the effect and the goodness of God would lead us to repentance. But in the day of prosperity man is too apt to say, By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom for I am prudent. But when God in great mercy takes away our enjoyment - our riches - our honors - our friends - these false impressions are destroyed and man is led to see his own poverty and weakness. Our mountain that seemed to stand so strong suddenly falls and discloses its foundation of sand. Those flattening prospects to which we were pressing forward so ardently and eagerly - where the fields were covered with flowers and fruit and the voice of music sounded on every side these are now changed into scorched and barren deserts covered with rocks and echoing with the yell of beasts of prey. Before we looked at these things through a deceptive medium which could convert beauty into deformity - barrenness into fertility - and death into life. When this medium is taken away we look at the scene as it is. We pause in our ardent pursuit and weep over the desolate picture and lament our infatuation.

Oh my hearers, there is no need of appealing to your experience in proof of this representation. For at the mention of the holiest you can hardly fail to look back to that day of darkness when you saw yourselves reduced from plenty to want - from honor to dishonor - from health to sickness - from the smile of friendship to the bitterness of hatred - from the endearments of love to the stabs of enmity or when you saw the grave close over the remains of a wife or a husband a father or a mother a sister or a brother a child or a friend. O how dreary and desolate and uncertain did the world then look to you! How tender was your heart - and how you wept over the ruins of your brightest hopes! But what was the final termination of all this? Did not this sensibility soon become blunted and the world gradually lose its deformity and emptiness in your eyes and become more beautiful and engaging until you were again as ardent in its pursuits and as much captivated by its prospects as ever? Did your afflictions end in your conversion to religion and do you now exhibit the fruits of it and well ordered lives and conversations? O it is to be feared that many of us slighted this gracious call of the Redeemer - this powerful knocking at the door of our hearts and went back to the world with hardened hearts - saying its vanities - these be our gods.

A single inference will close this discourse and it is this. It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for those who do not open the door of their hearts that Christ may come into them and repenteth them and be he with them.

Who is Christ? In the scripture he is styled over all God blessed Governor. Yet this being who created all things - first condescended to come into this world and die for mankind that there me that they may live. He next ascended to the right hand of the Majesty on high to make continual intercession for sinners. And to contemplate the picture of infinite beneficence and love he again comes down from his throne of glory and condescends by his Spirit, his Word - his ordinances and his Providences to knock at the door of every man's heart for admittance - to beseech him by all the motives in heaven and earth to accept of salvation as a free gift readily purchased at his hands. And these tender entreaties does he continue month after month and year after year though perpetually resisted and avoided. Where can there be found a picture of love equal to this?

And now what shall the end be of those who turn a deaf ear to all these offers of mercy and close a hard heart against all these pleading solicitations of care and kindness? How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation? He that despised Moses' law died without mercy under two or three witnesses. O how much our punishment suppose ye shall he be thought worthy who have trodden under foot the Son of God - and hath done despite into the Spirit of grace? O it will be one of the bitterest pangs of our future misery to look back upon this world and remember how often we have driven a pleading Saviour from our hearts - how often we have resisted the stirrings of his spirit - the warnings of his Word - the calls of his ministers - and the rebukes of his providences - and how willfully we rushed to destruction though we had to fight all our way to hell against the stirrings of infinite love.

Sermon 23 Characters That are Shut Out of Heaven

[Sermon No. 23, "Characters That Are Shut Out of Heaven," Matthew 25:10, 1820 Jun, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 4]

Matthew 25 verse 10

And the door was shut

Christ in his public instructions often seized upon passing events, OR referred to particular customs among the Jews FOR illustration of his doctrines. Every occurrence was improved and pound to some religious end - and by exhibiting the communion between natural and spiritual objects he would often surprise his hearers into a belief of the truth by thus throwing instruction into their minds at a moment when they were not aware and their hearts were not barred up against conviction. The text we have just read illustrates one of these cases. It is the conclusion of the parable of the ten virgins - five of whom are said to have been wise and five foolish. The Jews in their marriages observed much ceremony - usually keeping a feast seven days. And at the end of this time the parties were conducted to the bridegroom's house by their friends with lighted lamps. After those who were invited and attended him had entered his house, it was closed and after the door was shut no more were admitted. Though the foolish virgins returned after going to buy oil and said, Lord, Lord open unto us - yet he answered and said verily I say unto you I know you not. Their neglecting the accustomed preparations manifested such an indifference to the bridegroom and his invitation as justly excluded them from the honors of the marriage feast.

The application of this parable to religion is so plain that Christ did not think it necessary formally to make it. He is the bridegroom - his church the bride - the marriage is the future union of the church to Christ in heaven. And the ten virgins represent professors of religion. Five of went into the marriage feast, because their lamps were trimmed and burning - that is, in the Spiritual sense, because their hearts were filled with holy affections in this country's dispositions by the Spirit of God. But five had no oil, that is were destitute of these affections although they had an appearance of religion. They therefore were thought out from shut out from the marriage - and against them will the door of heaven hereafter be shut. And so will it be closed against many other descriptions of persons. And it is the object of this discourse to point out more definitely who will thus be excluded from heaven.

And here let it be remarked that the invitation to the marriage supper of the Lamb is not like the invitation to a feast on earth confined to a few - but it is wide as the world embracing every rational soul - To every one that thirsteth come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy and eat; yea come buy wine and milk without money and without price. The Spirit and the bride say come and let him that herewith say come: And let him that is a thirst come and whosoever will let him take the water of life freely. And Christ not only gives this invitation, reaching to every man civilized or savage, but he urges them to accept of it by the stirrings of his Spirit by the teaching of his word - by the instructions of his preached gospel and by all his dealings with men prosperous or adverse. The world is an immense storehouse of means all adapted to bring us to accept this gracious offer. O it is indeed gracious! to invite and urge such unworthy rebels as we are - without any moral soundness from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot to go to the seat and to feast forever upon those joys which eye have not seen nor ear heard nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive. But the day of mercy cannot last forever. And when this is once closed and the night of God's vengeance settles over the world the door of hope and of heaven will be shut up forever. Those who have listened to the calls of the gospel and clinging around the cross have been carried into the new Jerusalem will no more go out. While those who have slighted these invitations will plead in vain for admittance. O who of us my hearers will be thus left in outer darkness and see the door of heaven eternally barred against us?

In the first place this will be the lot of those of us who professing to be the disciples of Christ do not live agreeably to his Gospel.

And shall we say that because the ten virgins in the parable represent professing Christians and half of them were foolish therefore half of the professors of religion will be shut out from the marriage supper of the Lamb? Such a principle or interpretation carried through the Bible would involve us in absurdity. The day of judgment alone will declare who among professors of religion are wise and who are foolish. But it is certain that many of us who have named the name of Christ before man will hereafter knock in vain at the gate of heaven for admittance. For says Christ, Many are called but few are chosen. Strive to enter in at the strait gate: for many I say unto you shall seek to enter in but shall not be able. Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord have we not prophesied in thy name and in thy name have cast out devils? And in the name done many wonderful works? Then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me ye that work iniquity. There be some professing Christians who concerning the faith make shipwreck - others having begun in the Spirit and in the flesh - others who forsake their first love and others whom it is impossible to renew again to repentance, saying they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh and put him to an open shame and do despite unto the Spirit of grace. Against all such most surely will the door of Heaven be finally closed. There are others who cannot find any evidence of their Christian state in their lives - but who rely upon certain powerful convictions and succeeding joys at the period of their supposed conversion for proof of their regeneration. Such will find at last that not every one that saith unto Christ Lord, None shall enter into the kingdom of heaven but they who do the will of his Father which is in heaven. Other professors there are who have surrendered their hearts to Christ only in part - they do not feel that salvation is holy by grace through faith but place some secret reliance on their own good deeds. If religion can be made a secondary object and if God will accept of a secondary place in the heart these would be saved. But in heaven is no place for the man who does not seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness - who does not feel the burden of his sin to be so great that a Saviour alone can free him and who does not accept of salvation as a free unmerited gift through the redemption by Jesus Christ. From general confessions of their sin - a general view of God's benevolence and a speculative acknowledgment of the doctrine of atonement will never save men from the wrath of God. He has chosen his own way of saving sinners and if they refuse to come quite up to that discriminating line he has drawn in the Bible - if they take part of their religious system from the Scriptures and supply the rest by their own reason - if they lower down one jot or tittle that standard God has established as the measure of their holiness or if they received for doctrines the commandments of man they do all this at their peril. God hath said Except a man be born of water and the Spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. This man who is not thus regenerated therefore never will enter heaven. God has said that, Christians are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. Therefore a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law. Therefore by the deeds of the law shall no flesh living be justified. Hence then we may conclude that the door of heaven will be closed against all those shut against all those who seek justification by their own works. And hence to perceive that vague and general view concerning the plan of God salvation will not save us - since such views will never lead us to seek regeneration and justification in the way God has appointed.

There are other professors of religion who assent to every doctrine of the Gospel and who are very zealous in contending for the faith once delivered to the saints but who show their faith by their words not by their works - who are not careful to maintain good works and who do not keep the commandments of Christ. Now there is nothing plainer in the bible than that faith without works is dead - and there cannot be a heresy more destructive or a delusion more fatal than a belief that a man can be a Christian however firm his belief who wittingly and habitually violates the commandments of the moral law. Scarcely a moral precept can be found that is not contained in the Scriptures enforced by the strongest language. This new principle implanted in the heart of the Holy Ghost is an active principle - and will be in continual exercise for destroying remaining corruption in a man's own bosom and for fulfilling every duty to his fellow men and his God. The works of the flesh says an Apostle are manifest, which are these adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulation, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envying, murders, drunkenness, revelling and such like: of the which I tell you before as I have also told you in times past that they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God. But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long deferring gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance, against such there is no law. If therefore these last mentioned fruits do not appear in the professed Christians conduct the love of God is not shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost. If any man love me, says Christ, he will keep my words. He that loveth me not keepeth not my sayings. He that saith I know him, says John, and keepeth not his commandments is a liar and the truth is not in him. Hence then may we conclude that if any of us makes the whole of religion to consist in belief without practice, we are deceiving ourselves: and when once the master of the house (that is Christ) hath risen up and shut the door and we begin to stand without and to knock at the door saying Lord Lord open unto us: he shall say unto us I know you not whence you are: Depart from me all you workers of iniquity.

And here we may remark how aggravated bitter and agonizing will be the disappointment of the professor of religion who has deceived himself with a false hope who has imagined himself to be rich and increased with goods and to have need of nothing. But when he opens his eyes in the eternal world finds himself a naked miserable unfriended soul. And O how despairing will be that look of his when he turns his eyes toward heaven and sees the last of its gates closing against him and the bridegroom is death to his voice pleading for admittance! There was a friend in heaven to intercede for him while he was on earth - and strove with him by his Spirit, his vow and his ordinances to deliver him from the strong delusions which self-righteousness had involved him. But with a blind obstinacy he would not listen to those merciful warnings. And now will that friend - that long suffering Jesus close his ear against all his cries and he will be see the mild countenance of a friend changed into the sternness of a judge - and instead of feeling the warm and invigorating beams of the Saviour's love he will feel the flames of Divine wrath withering his inmost soul. He will even the man of Nineveh around him enduring a punishment more tolerable than his for they repented at the preaching of Jonah. But he has been deaf to the calls of the Gospel to the word of God - and closed his eyes against the full blaze of lights that shines in a Gospel land. Nay with presumption has he taken a seat at the table of Christ without examining his heart and thus has eaten and drank damnation to himself.

We proceed in the second place to point out some other descriptions of men against whom the door of heaven will finally be shut. And by looking forward only a few days we can in imagination see them as they approach the new Jerusalem and seek in vain for admission to its golden streets.

Look first at the man who in this world entertained the idea that God was so benevolent Being that He never could punish such weak and ignorant creatures as men are and who therefore expected to be received into heaven without having made any preparation for it. But he has now crossed the dark valley of death and the scales are fallen from his eyes and he perceives that God has also an attribute of justice to support. He sees that justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne and against his own character does this attribute now stand out to ban him from heaven. On earth justice and mercy might have been reconciled in this man's salvation had he only embraced Jesus Christ as a mediator. But his proud Spirit would not stoop to so humbling a doctrine which seemed to him foolishness. He preferred trusting to loose notions of God's clemency. And how full of vexation and disappointment must it be that look he now cast towards heaven and hears the armies thereof uniting in the song of Moses and the Lamb – just I am there are thy ways thou king of saints.

Next to this man you may see him advancing full of confidence in his qualifications for heaven who on earth believed that if a man were honest and upright and honorable and merciful he could not fail of heaven though he did not believe in the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel. But as he approaches the walls of heaven he is struck with those elevated songs of worship which continually ascend from the blessed inhabitants: he has never acquired any relish for such worship and all this appears to him now as disgusting as when he saw the saints on earth engaged in adoration and praise. And were he to be admitted to heaven he would have a spiritual body and would have no temptations to sin so that there would be no room for the exercise of but a small part of morality he had practiced on earth. Hence does he perceive that were he in heaven he would have no employment there, since he could not join in those services which constitute the chief happiness of the saints. And now for the first time does he perceive that it is right the gate of heaven should be shut against him since he must be miserable were he admitted there. O how bitter is that mixed emotion of disappointment and vexation and despair which now feeds upon his soul.

Look now at a man of another description advancing towards the gate of heaven through which the Bridegroom and his guests have gone in and shut it up never to be opened. This man on earth was one of those who gave himself no trouble concerning a future state and suffered every warning to die away without ever rousing him to reflection. But he is at length soured - and with a fearful anxiety presses for admittance into heaven. But it is too late. The door is shut! Perhaps for twenty or thirty or forty years he has slighted the most pressing invitations to put on the wedding garment prepare himself for the marriage supper of the Lamb. At length death called him from the world of grace and he now lifts up his eyes in a world of sorrow. And wherever he turns then all to him is the shadow of death.

The next man who presses toward the closed gate of the New Jerusalem is one who has lived and died without prayer that is without a habit of prayer either and his family are in the closet. Believing that God knows all our wants before we ask him and then he will not infringe the cause of nature to answer our petitions this man regarded prayer as mere waste of breath not considering that it is one of the appointed means by which God communicates his blessings and that it is the natural expression of a heart that truly loves God. And now as he comes to the door of heaven he begins to realize that his God is a stranger to him and that by neglecting communion with him while on earth he is a stranger to the employments of heaven. Hence does he perceive the reasonableness of that fate by which he is shut out from the presence of God and the Lamb.

We may look next at the rich and the honorable man who advances with a full confidence that as on earth so in heaven he shall be welcomed and flattered and raised to an exalted seat. How cutting then will be his misery when he hears a voice from the high and holy place thou in thy lifetime has received good things – thou hast had thy servant. And when he raises his eyes toward heaven this man recognizes many who on earth were his inferiors who waited upon his nod whom he oppressed and despised and in whose society he felt it a disgrace to spend even an hour many of these he now sees sitting upon thrones wearing white robes with palms in their hands and crowns of immortal glory upon their heads: while he is thrust into outer darkness with dogs and sorcerers and whoremongers and idolaters and whatsoever loveth and maketh a lie! O what a state is this at human pride and you can perceive how deeply it strikes his heart by that countenance wild with despair and by those curses that are forced forth against the Almighty. But all is of no avail for the door of Heaven is one which Christ shuttereth and no man openeth. However powerful riches and splendor and learning on earth they cannot purchase heaven.

But who is this that stands at a distance and seems afraid even to cast a look toward the city of God? It is the man who scoffed at religion on earth and regarded it all as a delusion. And now when the full blaze of reality and demonstration bursts upon his sight and he perceives that he has been fighting against God how should he dare to attempt an entrance into the spot where this God his energy makes the most signal manifestation of his glory and truth! Better is outer darkness with all its weeping and gnashing of teeth than such a display of God and were he forced into heaven it would add a double pang to his misery.

By the side of this man stands another who on earth has taken the name of God in vain and who now begins to feel those curses he so often invoked. O he dare not approach the hall of heaven lest the flaming sword of God's justice turning every way to guard the holy city from everything that defileth it should come down upon him without mercy.

Along with these men you perceive others of different characters on earth but all bearing the mark of sin in their foreheads. Then you see the idolaters, the drunkards, the liars, the fornicators, the adulteress, the deceitful, the dishonest, the thief, the robber, and the murderer not presuming to look toward heaven for admittance there - not wishing to approach nearer to that Being whose absence produces despair but whose presence would be to them a consuming fire. O what a group of misery! What a hateful society in which to wear away eternity!

Yet my hearers among all these various characters against whom the door of heaven is closed, do we not discern our own! Let the enquiry come home individually to our hearts who among us must be cast into outer darkness where is weeping and gnashing of teeth? What if an Omniscient God this day should call upon those of us whose lamps are trimmed and burning to go with him to the feast of eternity! Would not a fearfully great multitude of us be left to crowd around the closed door and to mock in vain? What if at this moment death should smite every person present! Would our spirits immediately ascend to heaven? Would there be no suffering? Is our work done and well done have we consciences void of offenses towards God and man? Have we all embraced Christ by faith? Have we all been regenerated by the Spirit of God? Is there no false or self-deceived professor among us - no self-righteous man - no one living unconcerned about futurity - no one living without prayer - no one receiving all his good things in this world - no scoffer - nor blasphemer - nor drunkard - nor liar - nor fornicator - nor adulterer - nor hypocrite! O thou who searches the heart and triest the reins make each of us to know our real characters and suffer none of us to neglect our preparation for heaven till the door be shut! And to thee shall be the glory through Jesus Christ - Amen.

Sermon 25 Day of Judgment

[Sermon No. 25, "Day of Judgment," Revelations 20:12, 1820 Jun,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 4]

Revelations 20:12

And I saw the dead small and great stand before God.

II Corinthians 5:10

We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ.

[The first paragraph appears to have been added some time after the sermon was originally written. It is squeezed between the title and the passage of scripture.]

For nearly six thousand years death has been mowing down the human race and consigning them to the grave by multitudes. Nearly twenty - five millions have fallen before him every year - more than seventy thousand every day and about three thousand every hour and nearly one every second. At this rate the earth already contains in its bosom the graves of more than one hundred - fifty - thousand millions of our race. Many thousand millions more will sleep in it and the final consummation of all things mentioned in the text.

If we suppose the average population of the globe since the creation to have been no higher than six hundred millions and that one such generation disappears every forty years and is exceeded by a new one it will follow that the number of inhabitants that have lived on earth previous to the present time falls but little short of ninety thousand millions. How many more inhabitants are to exist on earth previous to its destruction we know not: but as the millennium is not yet commenced and at that time Christ is to reign a thousand years in the world it will be a very moderate calculation to state the population of the globe from beginning to end at one hundred - fifty thousand millions. And these are that great assembly of small and great which will then stand before God [which must appear before the judgment seat of Christ]. Not one of this immense number at whatever period he lived - in whatsoever place however obscure and unknown in life or death - however short his existence not one will be about - for that day all of the days were made - that meeting is the consummation of every earthly event.

In this world a thousand causes separate us from those we once knew and even from our nearest relatives and friends so that we see them no more. The grave of the father is often in one quarter of the world and that of the child in another. The husband perishes on the ocean many leagues from his family - and thousands of friends are denied the mournful satisfaction of closing the eyes of those they love. But the meeting before the judgment seat of Christ will restore to each other's view the separated friends. Yes and their too will enemies meet and the rich and the poor - the honorable and dishonorable - the prince and the peasant - the virtuous and the vicious - the religious and the irreligious - all of every character grade and condition will hear the shout of the archangel at the trumpet of God and crowd around the tribunal of Christ.

It is my intention my hearers in this discourse to confine myself as closely as possible to the facts stated in the text that we must all [stand before God] appear before the judgment seat of Christ. Having taken a general view of that great assembly we shall now proceed to select individuals who were in some way or other connected on earth and whose opinions or words or examples contributed to help one another to heaven or to hell. We shall endeavor to point out to you their appearance and feelings when they first meet before the judgment seat and looking at each other recognize a relative or a friend or a companion or a teacher or a scholar.

The object for which we are to assemble around the heavenly tribunal will be known by every Spirit. We show each one of us most forcibly realize that our eternal destiny is there to be fixed, according to the deeds done in the body. Our thoughts therefore will be irresistibly turned back upon this world. And all our conduct here will pass in rapid distinct view before us. Every spot where we violated the laws of God or performed deeds of holiness - and every companion who persuaded us to the one or the other will be more clearly impressed on the memory. How forcibly then will it strike us and what a mixture of emotion will it excite when we lift our eyes and see that companion standing by our side!

Look first at the scoffer who on earth turned the subject of religion particularly the experimental part of it into ridicule. Before a particular set of companions he displayed all his wit in setting off the man of prayer - and even provided so far as to make a mock prayer in the presence of the God who will not be mocked with impunity. He then gained the hardy applause of his companions and they formed a band mutually though unknowingly pledged to blind each other's eyes and to rush unto destruction. Religion then appeared all a farce. Now it seems all reality - as they open their eyes before the judgment seat and find themselves with the same companions. But O how changed the scene and how changed their feelings! Every look at each other recalls to mind their hated communion on earth - their scoffing and blasphemy. Self-condemned they do not wait the sentence of the judge before whose bar they stand but begin to pour forth mutual reproaches and curses - an employment which is to last forever.

We will point you next to the man who in the world spent much of his time and possessions in riot or drunkenness or gambling. How full of honor is his countenance when he sees his companions stand before him! They allured him to those corrupting scenes when he was yet uncontaminated by the evil that is in the world. They led him on from one step to another - from the intemperate frolics to the gaming table - from this to profanity - fraud infamy disease and untimely death. All these scenes and this conduct now rush over his guilty soul as he stares these companions in the face: in vain does he call upon them now to save him from the coming wrath of the judge and execrate their cruelty - their only answer is reproach for reproach and execration for execration.

Before the same tribunal you may see also the seducer meeting the object of seduction. This sin of his was already praying upon his soul and he knew that it would in justice cast him down to the very lowest place in hell. For he had violated his most sacred promises - he had betrayed unsuspecting innocence and virtue and plunged a human being from hope and happiness down to despair and perdition. On earth his heart felt not how enormous was his guilt but now the very thought was in supportable: and what a shock does it give his feelings, as the wild and despairing countenance of mindless innocence turns fall upon him and fastens upon him a look of anguish inexpressible! He turns to flee from the agonizing pictures: but that countenance follows him through the midst of so many millions and he hears continually the shriek of despair and the cry of reproach entering like so many arrows into his soul! Yes and this same countenance and this same voice will follow him and find him and harrow up his soul forever!

We will turn our eyes next to two men who on earth were enemies. They could not endure each other's society and a separation took place between them - and they would listen to no reconciliation each one insisting that the other was wrong and must make all the concessions. Thus did they cut themselves off from every hope of heaven: for when they came with their gift to the altar that is when they came to pray before God they did not first go away and be reconciled - and since they did not forget neither did their father in heaven forgive their trespasses. Thus they lived and thus they died. And when they meet before the judgment seat of Christ how full of fury and revenge is that look each casts upon the other according him as the author of his ruin as the means of bringing him into final condemnation. It is indeed true that they have mutually barred each other out of heaven. Had they been forgiving and reconcilable on earth their father in heaven would have forgiven them. But their ungodly feelings separated them while they lived and led them to say all manner of evil one against another: and now will they have the satisfaction of indulging their persecuting Spirit through all eternity.

The next man who arrests our attention before the judgment seat by his agitation and trembling is a character very common on earth. You have often seen him on the Sabbath that day which the Lord hath made in violation of the laws of the land - and in opposition to the feelings of all the more respectable classes in society and above all in defiance of the law of God, remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy - you have seen this man strolling about the fields - or tending to his worldly business or riding for pleasure or profit, or paying visits, or reading irreligious books and in many other modes doing his own ways - finding its own pleasures and speaking his own words. When entreated by some Christian friend not to pursue so demoralizing and unworthy a course of conduct he only laughed him to scorn. But as he now stands before the judgment seat he perceives that in heaven there is one eternal Sabbath more spiritual and strict than any he even ever witnessed on earth - he perceives therefore that he is not prepared for enjoying heaven were he admitted there. His violations of the Sabbath on earth now crowd upon his memory - and so do the admonitions of that friend whom he left to scorn. Yes and as he raises his eyes he perceives that friend before him - with a countenance full of immortality and beaming with that joy he is soon to enter. O that look goes to the soul of the sinner and raises the storm of emotions there which never can be quelled. The laugh of scorn with which he once answered every warning is now exchanged for the groan of despair. He flees from the presence of his once faithful friend - and gladly would he hide from the face of his judge who is Lord of the Sabbath - for he now appears in flaming fire.

The next picture to which we would direct your eyes is that of the oppressor now in his turn tormented by those he once oppressed. You see one of this description surrounded by the poor the widow the fatherless whom on earth he had robbed of their hard earned pittance and made himself rich by cruel extractions. Once he was above law and feared no earthly tribunal: but these poor men now call upon him to look at the judgment seat before which he is dragged. O his heart has already been condemned and how gladly would he give a thousand worlds to those whom he oppressed on earth if it could ease for one hour the gnawings of that worm that never dies.

You see another earthly oppressor surrounded by a whole nation, calling on him to remember how many of them he had been the means of hurrying into eternity, and what an enormous load of misery he had heaped upon them. What a meeting is this and what man could endure it! Yet it must be endured by all the conquerors and bloody oppressors of the earth - and the pang will become more and more intolerable forever.

We are next called to look at those who sustained a more intimate and tender relation on earth. And do you not see the fallen countenance of that husband as he meets her who was once his wife? On earth that wife had often entreated him by her Christian example and affectionate exhortations to forsake him and embrace the Saviour. But he was deaf to all her kind warnings. He regarded her as a weak deluded woman. Yet now before the judgment seat of Christ he perceives her about to hear the invitation come thou blessed of my Father inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. While to him it will be said, depart thou cursed into everlasting fire.

And on the other hand you may witness that wife on reclaimed by the thousand examples and admonitions of a husband now taking a last agonizing look at him as he is ascending a throne of glory while she is hurried away to the regions of outer darkness.

Before the judgment seat of Christ will the unbelieving husband also meet the unbelieving wife. In their journey through life they united to oppose religion and strengthened each other's hands in resisting the warnings of the Spirit - of the Bible and of the pulpit. And they succeeded. But now they have opened their eyes in a world of realities and what a meeting is theirs - where as they look at one another they realize that they were blind leaders of the blind and that each has helped the other forward in the road of ruin! Regarding one another as mutual betrayers they will pour forth mutual reproaches and look upon each other with unmingled disgust.

But in the midst of these reproaches their children come forward to fling another dagger to their souls. O how agonizing and distracting is their complaint! Hear a son on earth dearly beloved, thus addressing his father. O my father, through your example and omission I am here a guilty wretch before the tribunal of my God. How many Sabbaths passed away and you gave me no instruction in religion! You never told me that I was a sinner - you never pointed me to Christ nor informed me of the torments of hell. You never taught me how to pray - you did not collect us morning and evening around the family altar. In everything relating to our worldly interest you were kind and faithful. But in regard to religion you were unfaithful and cruel beyond expression. And we now call on you to deliver us from the wrath of our offended judge. O save us from going down to the flames of the lower world.

Another meeting of those intimately connected on the earth will take place before the judgment seat of Christ and it is a meeting full of interest. The unfaithful unworthy minister of the Gospel there finds the wretched people whom he has deluded and helped to perdition. It may be that he spent his time on earth in inculcating false doctrines - or that he preached himself instead of Christ - or that he omitted to declare the whole council of God - or that while he proclaimed the truth as it is in Jesus - he did not live as becometh the Gospel and thus by his practice gave a lie to his profession. In either of these ways he was an unfaithful minister and was a means of destroying the souls of men. And now you may see the people who were thus deluded crowding around him, and crying aloud for vengeance to be poured upon him. In vain does he strive to hide himself from their view. With the fury of despair they follow him and reproach him in the midst of millions. And when he and they are cast into outer darkness it will be no small part of his torment to dwell forever with those whom he his preaching or omission or example has cut off from heaven and from hope.

On the other hand you perceive the judge of all the earth confronting impenitent sinners with the faithful minister whose warnings they slighted although they heard them so often. This preacher cried aloud and spared not - and declared the whole council of God whether men hear or whether they forbore. All this the sinners who sat under his ministrations well remember and now they stand without excuse naked and unfriended before their judge. Formerly they got rid of the faithful exhibitions of their duty from the pulpit by ridicule or by reproach. But the day of realities is now come - they dare not deny that they were warned of such a day. For he who warned them is now before them. And they stand waiting for the moment when the whirlwind of the Lord shall blow them away as stubble.

But my hearers we will dwell no longer on such agonizing pictures. We will look for a moment at those whose meeting before the tribunal is joyful. And it is animating to look at that man who meets one on earth formerly his friend and who by his faithful admonitions was led to embrace the Saviour. How much of heaven beams from their countenances as they now first meet after having crossed the dark valley of death and are safe on the shores of eternity, before that Saviour whom they love, who is already more bending forward to place them upon that throne whereon he sitteth at the right hand of the Father!

There too may you see the husband and the wife who helped each other forward in the road to heaven while on earth. Their union in this world was rendered the means of preparing them for an everlasting union in heaven. And as they now witness the smiles of an approving judge how sweet it is to look back to the earth and remember how often they walked to the house of God in company - how many prayers morning and evening they offered up and how many exhortations and encouragements they gave each other to press forward toward the mark for the prize! And O what an accession to their joy do these parents experience when the children over whom they have so often watched and prayed and whom they have taught so much in religion and offered in baptism to the glory of Almighty God when these children meet them and bless them for all their kind exertions whereby they were brought to embrace religion and can now meet their judge in peace! Christian parents could heaven itself afford a sweeter or a purer joy than this?

Yet there is one more meeting not less delightful. And it is the meeting of the faithful minister of Christ with those who have hearkened to his instructions and by his instrumentality have been led to embrace the Saviour! These are the seals of his ministry and the crown of his rejoicing - the proof that he has not labored in vain. And could he be assured of meeting one such soul in the day of the Lord. O it would be worth laboring and suffering, spending and being spent, during a life of three score years and ten!

My hearers we ought not to dismiss this subject without enquiring what will be our meeting at the judgment seat of Christ. For there must we all stand - either in our character as preacher or hearers - as husband or wife as parents or children - as enemies or friends. There as we cast our eyes upon one another all our relations in this world and all our actions here will crowd upon our memories and sink us with despair or elevate us with joy! O it is an overwhelming thought.

What then will be the dread reality! Would to God that meeting might be to every one of us full of peace and joy and heaven. Would to heaven that we who have this day worshipped God in his earthly temple, however we may be separated on earth, might hereafter unite in peace and noble services in that building of God that house not made with hands eternal in the heavens!

Sermon 27 [Prayers for the Irreligious]

[Sermon No. 27, "Prayers for the Irreligious," Psalms 106:23, 1820 Dec, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 5]

Psalms 106:3

Therefore he said that he would destroy them, had not Moses his chosen stood before him in the breach to turn away his wrath, lest he should destroy them.

There is not on record a more striking instance of the ingratitude and obduracy towards God than is found in the history of the Israelites during their journey through the wilderness. Scarcely had they entered upon their route with the plagues inflicted upon Egypt yet fresh in their memories - and with a cloud by day and pillar of fire by night manifesting to them the certain protection of God and though they advanced under the constant display of a miracle they soon began to distrust the faithfulness of God, and they said unto Moses because there were no graves in Egypt hast thou taken us away to die in this wilderness? Wherefore hast thou dealt thus with us to carry us forth out of Egypt?

By manifesting such a distrustful Spirit the Israelites as the Psalmist declares provoked by the Red Sea. But the prayer of Moses turned away his displeasure. And the Lord said unto Moses wherefore cried thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward. They did so and saw the Red Sea divide itself for them to pass through - while its returning waves buried their enemies forever. Yet in three days where these stupendous miracles forgotten and ungrateful murmurs again filled the camp because the waters of Marah were bitter. The intercession of Moses again prevailed. And in the midst of miracles they again advanced. But soon was the cry heard - Would to God we had died by the hand of the Lord in the land of Egypt when we sat by the fleshpots and where we did eat bread to the full: for ye have brought us forth into the wilderness to kill this whole assembly with hunger. Still did the long-suffering of God endure so much perverseness - and he replied to Moses, behold I will rain bread from heaven for you.

These repeated deliverances however did not prevent repeated murmurs. And at Mount Sinai on whose top the glory of the Lord sat like devouring fire - in the visible and awful presence of God the people have fallen away to idolatry - had seared a molten calf and were celebrating its unholy rites while Moses was in the Mount receiving laws from God. This insult upon the Majesty of heaven appeared too outrageous for forgiveness - therefore says the Psalmist, God said he would destroy them had not Moses his chosen stood before him in the breach to turn away his wrath lest he should destroy them. And in the book of Exodus where this event is recorded similar language is used. The Lord said unto Moses I have seen this people and behold it as a stiff - necked people. Now therefore let me alone, that my wrath may wax hot against them and that I may consume them: and I will make of thee a great nation. And Moses besought the Lord his God and said Lord why doth thy wrath wax hot against thy people which thou hast brought forth out of the land of Egypt with great power and with a mighty hand? Turn from the fierce wrath and repent of this evil against my people. Remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel thy servants to whom thou holdest to thine own Self and saidest unto them I will multiply your seeds as the stars of heaven; and all this land that I have spoken of will I give unto your seed and they shall inherit it forever. And the Lord repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people. This is indeed language accommodated to human transactions and not to be understood literally because God cannot repent:

but the fact which we wish to be noticed in this affair is this that the Israelites were spared in consequence of the prayer of Moses.

Nor was this the last time in which the intercessions of this man of God prevailed. At the distance of only three days journey from Mount Sinai the people again complained and it displeased the Lord and the Lord heard it and his anger was kindled and the fire of the Lord burnt among them and consumed them that were in the uttermost parts of the camp. And the people cried unto Moses and when Moses prayed unto the Lord the fire was quenched. Besides this instance we find Moses in the ninth chapter of Deuteronomy thus addressing the Israelites - Again at Taberah and at Massah and at Kibroth-hattaavah you provoked the wrath - Likewise when the Lord sent you from Kadesh-barnea - then ye rebelled against the commandment of the Lord your God and ye believed him not nor hearkened to his voice. Thus I fell down before the Lord forty days and forty nights as I fell down at the first because the Lord had said he would destroy you. I prayed therefore unto the Lord and said O Lord God destroyed not by people and thine inheritance which thou hast redeemed through the greatness which thou hast brought forth out of Egypt with a mighty hand.

In all these instances my hearers you perceive one prominent fact - that the prayers of Moses were the means of saving the children of Israel from destruction and of obtaining for them many distinguished blessings. This fact is asserted in the text, therefore he said that he would destroy them had not Moses his chosen stood before him in the breach to turn away his anger lest he should destroy them. Moses is said in the Scriptures to have been very much above all the men which were upon the face of the earth and he is called the man of God. His eminent piety thus rendered his prayer thus efficacious. And here you have a most striking instance of the mighty influence of a devoted Christian's prayers to God. Moses indeed is not the only example we might produce from the bible on this subject. Witness the wrestling Jacob and the prevailing Israel. Or Hezekiah when the Lord in answer to his prayer slew in one night one hundred eighty - five thousand Assyrians and at another time added fifteen years to his life. Or David erecting an altar sacrificing thereon and imploring mercy until the raging plague was stayed. Or Elijah when, he prayed earnestly that it might not rain and it rained not on the earth but by the space of three years and six months. And he prayed again and the heavens gave rain and the earth brought forth her fruit. But it is unnecessary to multiply instances of this kind for the intercessions of Moses to which our text refers are sufficient for our present purpose, sufficient to establish this position - that the irreligious part of society are greatly dependant upon the prayers of Christians. This is the point aimed at in this discourse and which we shall now endeavor to illustrate.

But it will be well before entering upon the subject to show who are meant by the irreligious part of society. And in general terms we mean all who are not real Christians. This includes not alone the openly corrupt - the thief the defrauder the liar the adulterer and the like: but also many a moral and amiable man. We mean those who have a form of godliness but deny the power thereof - and those who live without a habit of prayer however regular and exact their morality - and those who substitute an amiable disposition - or speculative believe - or deeds of charity for a humbling self self-scrutinizing principle of piety. Although there is a great diversity among these different characters as it relates to this world yet there is one characteristic common to all - they are wanting in love to God, a characteristic so important and radical that it groups them all into one great class - and that is a want of love to God. This deficiency in the first principle of religion leaves all these descriptions of men the proper subjects of prayer since they are stamped with that alienation from God which exposes them to his righteous indignation.

We now revert to our proposition that the irreligious part of society are greatly dependant upon the prayers of Christians.

And in the first place they are dependant upon these prayers for many temporal mercies.

When Christian nations that have long been blessed with the light and privileges of the Gospel wane worse and worse - when their inequities are multiplied and only one be found here and there doing justice and loving mercy - why does not God pour upon those nations the vials of his wrath, and strip them of their distinguished blessings? One principal reason why God is thus forbearing is because in those nations he discovers a few that sigh and cry for all the abominations that be done in the midst of them. The case of Sodom is an illustration of this principle. Had there been found ten righteous within its walls the fire of the Lord had not consumed it. And in Christ's prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem he says, And except those days should be shortened, there should be no flesh be saved; but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened.

And adducing instances of this kind from the bible to prove that God often spares nations from destruction or calamity on account of the piety and the prayers of a few, we are sensible that some will perceive a difficulty. For they consider most of the events related in the Scriptures as miraculous - as produced by a particular interposition of God under a particular dispensation - and therefore these events will not apply to the present state of the world. When miracles have ceased and God governs by general laws, the destruction of Sodom was indeed strictly and eminently miraculous: but in the case of Jerusalem there is no evidence of the suspension or counteraction of any of the laws of nature and this is essential to what we call a miracle. There might indeed have been a divine influence exerted upon the councils and dispositions of the actors in that bloody tragedy. But this was unknown to them nor did it infringe at all upon their liberty of thought or action. And why may not this same sort of influence be exerted upon the present rulers of the world - so that while they are pursuing their own chosen way God is fulfilling his purposes in their actions. Or by withholding his influence and suffering the rulers of this world to walk after the council of their own heart, God may often accomplish important designs. As in the case of Pharaoh he hardened his heart by withdrawing the strivings of his Spirit.

Now the prosperous or adverse conditions of nations depend almost entirely upon measures adopted by the government. When therefore God wishes to bless the nation he may dispose its rulers to adopt those measures that shall result in its prosperity - and when he would punish a nation he may abandon its rulers to their own evil councils. This is all the influence exerted by God upon the present nations of the world for which we contend in this discourse. He may indeed interpose for the preservation or distinction of kingdoms in other ways and indeed by miracles: but the influence which he exerts upon the minds or hearts of rulers is enough for our present purpose. Granting this influence it is easy to see how many ways God may answer the prayers of his elect who cry unto him day and night for the nation in which they live. Are the rulers disposed to engage in war? He can dispose them to peace. Are they inclined to oppress and defraud their subjects? He can soften their stubborn hearts. Are they negligent and indifferent to the welfare of their people? He can inspire them with resolution and perseverance.

But it is not in a national view alone that the irreligious part of society experience mercies through the prayers of Christians. The hearts of all men are in the hands of the Lord and he turneth them as the rivers of water are turned. And when the irreligious experience kindness or protection in their intercourse with society this may result from the influences of God's Spirit given in answer to the prayers of Christians whereby many a heart naturally ferocious and unfeeling is disposed to be merciful and compassionate. And it may be that this same grace has subdued the ferocity of some monster of iniquity who had already sharpened his assassin dagger to plunge into the heart of the man who lives without prayer and without God. So that in these and many other ways even the security which sinners enjoy in a Christian land may have been procured to them by the prayers of the pious.

We hasten in the second place to say that sinners are dependant upon the prayers of Christians for many spiritual mercies.

When a Christian prays for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit and the extension of the Gospel he is certain that he asks those things that are agreeable to the will of God. For he hath declared that every knee shall bow to him and every tongue confess to God. When he supplicates for temporal blessings he knows not but he ask for those things that would be injurious or inconsistent with the will of God to grant. But such a doubt does not rise in his mind when he brings a fellow sinner in the arms of prayer to the mercy seat and beseeches God to convert and save him. Prayer indeed has chiefly to do with our Spiritual concerns and here is its greatest efficacy exhibited. When Christians restrain prayer before God, what do we find is the consequence? Religion in their own heart is at its lowest ebb and sinners around them press on careless and unworried in the broad road to destruction. But when Christians shake off the Spirit of slumber and receive a spirit of supplication from on high - what is then the consequence. They arise and trim their lamps and seem indeed like a city set on a hill that cannot be hid And the effect does not terminate here. Sinners also begin to hear the voice of the Son of God and arise from the dead. And the enquiry is men and brethren what shall we do?

Here then do you perceive my hearers that where Christians cease to pray, sinners cease to be alarmed and drop into eternity unforgiven and unsanctified - but when a spirit of prayer is revived within them it brings down in answer to their supplications the awakening Spirit of God to soften the flinty heart and implant within it immortal principles. These prayers then offered up in the name of Christ where the means of the sinners conversion. Had they never been presented he would have remained and are alien from the commonwealth of Israel and dead in trespasses and sins. And no regenerated man can say that the Spirit was not given him in consequence of some Christian prayers. Some pious friend might long have made intercession with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from death and was heard and that he feared. God does indeed convert some almost without means: yet as a general fact it may confidently be maintained that the prayers of his children are the condition on which he bestows regenerating grace. So that in a secondary sense it depends upon the prayers of Christians whether the religious part of society be ever converted.

There are two inferences which we can scarcely avoid making in the conclusion of this subject. And first if so many mercies spiritual and temporal flow to the sinner through the intercession of Christians, how grateful should he be for their prayers and how anxious to have them redoubled in his behalf! Leave out for a moment the consideration of temporal advantage and look at the single fact that such prayer is maybe the means of procuring for this sinner the regenerating grace of God. Here is a translation from darkness to light - from the dominion of sin and Satan and death to the service in favor of God - a deliverance from an exposure to everlasting perdition and a restoration to the hope of eternal happiness. Yet this mighty revolution can perhaps be produced through the instrumentality of fervent effectual prayer. And the Christian unasked goes into his closet again and again to supplicate so rich a blessing for the sinner. Is not here a cause for gratitude? Shall a deed so noble and disinterested meet with no return? Shall the sinner not even manifest anxiety that such prayers may be repeated? Alas my hearers, what do facts teach us? Did you ever see any evidence of such a feeling of gratitude in the bosom of the unregenerate - or even the very smallest solicitude to secure such a favor unless it were in the in the hour of sickness or danger? On the contrary, when he sees the humble devoted servant of Christ praying for his conversion does there not arise within a feeling of resentment?

But in the second place there is no reason to dissuade the Christian from supplicating mercy for the irreligious man. On the contrary it is a motive for urging the request with greater fervency. For it shows such a blindness and insensibility - such a headstrong tendency to destruction as must awaken all the sympathies of him who has drank into the Spirit of Christ. Christians, it may be your prayers for this man will be heard in heaven and he be restored by your instrumentality to light life and immortality. O it is an animating thought and it should awaken within you the wrestling Spirit of Jacob and the earnest supplication of Elijah. There is placed in your hands a more powerful engine than ever the proudest and mightiest conquerors obtained. They indeed have triumphed over all the united energies of man and hurled earthly monarchs from their thrones. But it is given to you to trample down a mightier foe even the Prince of Darkness.

*And Satan trembles when he sees
The weakest saint upon his knees.*

Prayer is indeed that instrument in the hand of God which is to break down the empire of darkness and establish the empire of righteousness. Why then do not Christians use it more faithfully? Why do they not make one vigorous and persevering effort that shall at once bury the strong towers of irreligion in ruins!

Sermon 28 Neglect of Vows

[Sermon No. 28, "Neglect of Vows," Ecclesiastes 5:4, 1820 Sep,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 5]

Ecclesiastes 5:4

When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it; for he hath no pleasure in fools: pay that which thou hast vowed.

There is scarcely an individual in all the immensely varied conditions of human society who does not in some hour our danger or distress realize the want and the value of religion. The stormless hours of existence may indeed be passed without looking beyond the little smiling landscape around us – but when our horizon begins to blacken with the Tempest and the thunder to break over our heads we involuntarily stretch our thoughts to some happier sky that is never overcast with storms and sigh that our dwelling is not beneath it. To drop the metaphor - though man may be forgetful of futurity when every thing around him is pleasant and prosperous yet sickness and pain and sorrow and calamity bring with them a feeling of religion. They strip off the veil that concealed the deformity of the world from our view and hold it before us naked and unsatisfying. We feel that something more is wanting to fill up the void that is made in our hearts and when we cast our lives over every limit of this our moral habitation, we perceive that there is but one thing which can possibly afford us relief - and that is religion. Could we feel that God were our father – that between him and our souls there were no interval - no controversy we might indeed rest serenely beneath his almighty arm and bid defiance to all the calamities of life. But this God is a stranger to us. We have never sought him in earnest and conscience will not permit us to believe that a mere wish now in the day of adversity will procure us his favour - when we have neglected to seek him all the years of our prosperity. We are convinced and the bible stamps a certainty upon our convictions that there must be a revolution within us - a change in the inner and outer man. Our past life does not satisfy us. We are sure such a life would not ease us to heaven and that it must be radically altered. These reflections These reflections revolve within us for a time while we are under the pressure of affliction and they produce many unavailing regrets - many sighs of repentance over our misspent days. We must proceed to the forming of resolutions. O should God spare our lives this once - should he avert this danger and restore us to our former state we are determined to pursue a different course - to act henceforth with an habitual reference to to eternity. In other words we are led to vow a vow unto God – a vow made in the most solemn manner - in the presence of heaven and earth.

The Christian also in seasons of unusual distress, finds by a review of his life that he is not lived as a stranger and sojourner on earth and being led to deep repentance because he has so often crucified that Lord afresh he renews his former resolutions before God and binds himself anew and if possible by a more sacred and solemn vow. Indeed my hearers who of us whether Christians or not has not formed resolutions of amendment when sickness or calamity had weakened our hold on the world? And now upon reading our text, When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it, the question forces itself upon us, have we carried into effect these resolutions - have we fulfilled these vows? What if we should now institute an enquiry into the subject - and searching the storehouse of our memories, take a retrospect of every season of trial darkness and affliction through which we have passed? Such an enquiry it is our object in the first place to assist in bringing to your view a few instances of these of adversity and then secondly to present before you the motives that urge to the immediate performance of every unpaid vow.

Our first business then is to endeavor to hold up to your view some of those seasons of adversity when your soften hearts felt the value of the bible and vowed vows before the King of heaven. We do not indeed hope to point out the particular case of any individual: but perhaps we may be able to trace some feelings that were common to many of us.

And do not some of us my hearers remember a period when a sudden check was given to our efforts and a damp to our spirits by leveling blow of disappointment? The object of our most ardent pursuit seemed almost within our reach and appeared beautiful and excellent with our most vigorous efforts. We had already doted much upon it anticipated possession and it had cost us many a wearisome and many sleepless hour. In the evening we saw it almost within our grasp and never did it appear so lovely. In the morning it had vanished. It might have been wealth or honor or pleasure or friendship. But no matter what it was now gone - and there was left within us an emptiness nothing mortal could supply - and a distress nothing earthly could alleviate. We looked around on the world but a few hours before so beautified and enchanting and it was desolate without a single object on which we could turn the eye with pleasure. The visionary fetish of our hopes had in one hour had been trampled into ruins - beauty had been converted into deformity - fertility into barrenness and life into death.

Perhaps the man who met this disappointment was a Christian. And when the object of his most constant pursuit had thus eluded his grasp there was time left for reflection. He looked back upon what once was when God in heaven were foremost in his thoughts and affections and felt for the first time how widely he had wandered from duty - how he had suffered the creature to usurp the place of the Creator, how he had crucified the Son of God afresh and done despite unto the Spirit of grace. And yet that God whose compassions fail not had lengthened out his forfeited existence, watching over him with the same fatherly care and supplying all his wants during this season of backsliding rebellion and idolatry. O how keen is the sense of ingratitude which now seizes his heart when he makes this comparison between his treason and God's kindness! Repentance deep and unmixed humbles him in the dust - and with all the energy of returning affection he devotes himself anew to the service of God and resolves henceforth the march forward in the path of duty trampling the world the flesh and the Devil under his feet. But Christians how is it with you now? Have those vows been performed? And are those resolutions the continued rule of your life? Or are you again seized with a Spirit of slumber and traveling again the same wayward path.

But perhaps the man who felt the pain of disappointment was not a Christian. Yet in that season of desolation he could not avoid the thoughts of religion. The Spirit of grace was then pressing the subject home upon his heart and when he looked back upon his past life his soul sickened and when he look forward his soul trembled. He sees religion reaching forth one hand to his relief while with the other she points to heaven. And now most resolutely does he determine to accept proffered assistance. And many a vow of amendment and change of life passes his lips and is registered in heaven. Man of the world, those vows are still recorded there, but are they performed? Why then are you now as eager and ardent as ever in chase of this world's vanities?

It may be however that some of us are not sensible of any great loss in any anticipated comforts. We may actually have attained them and enjoyed them for a course of years. Prosperity may have rolled upon us its full full tide and we borne up by its smooth stream may have been carried on to fortune and subliminary happiness. Every thing around us has been calm and everything before us inviting. The breezes of health and hope have blown gently and steadily upon us and we had almost forgotten that this was a world of waves and tempests. But in an unexpected hour the storm has risen around us and poured its fury upon our heads, and we have been driven shipwrecked and naked upon a barren and inhospitable shore. Is this figurative language too strong? Let him answer who has been reduced in one day from wealth to poverty - or him who has sunk from an honorable station in society into contempt - or him whose heart is yet bleeding by the wounds of treacherous friendship.

Now the effect of these strokes of calamity upon the heart is very similar to that where anticipated happiness proves to be a phantom. Was the man a Christian? He perceives that the comforts of which he is now deprived had become his idol and that God has now taken them away in mercy to prevent his final apostasy. He therefore acquiesces in the Divine conduct and resolves henceforth to worship God only. And the enquiry which we wish to urge home upon such a man is, whether these vows have been performed?

The same question we put to the man who has experienced similar losses of some of his most valuable earthly possessions if he were not a Christian. For these calamities no doubt produced the firmest resolutions of amendment and therefore O man, the vows of the Lord are upon you and you cannot go back.

But so obdurate is man's heart that outward losses and disappointments do not always soften it into a religious frame. And therefore God touches him in a more vulnerable point. Skin for skin, yea all that a man hath will be given for his life. Hence when God puts forth his hand and touches his bone in his flesh, few very few are there whose hearts are not touch also. Though none of us in health ever formally deny the truth of the proposition that we are constantly exposed to death, yet our conduct evinces that this truth does not reach our hearts. There is a certain giddiness or perversity within us and so much false glare about us and our eyes are ordinarily as much averted from our own dissolution as if it were never to take place. But when an unrelenting disease comes upon us and the vigorous arm becomes nerveless the bright eye sunk and heavy and the whole frame in pieces with pain - it is astonishing how everything earthly and everything heavenly changes to our view. This world and all its glory which but a few hours before had risen up before us so beautifully and magnificently occupying the whole soul is now diminished to a point and religion seems to us to be all in all. Conscience irresistibly turns back our eyes upon our past lives and what if this be the first time we have taken such a retrospect? Do we find nothing in them that alarms us? Has self had no undue predominancy in our motions and actions? Does the tenor of our conduct look as if the love of God were the regulating principle? O no! This hour an hour of sickness, when we are forced to the brink of the grave, will not flatten us nor deceive us. And is there no one of us who can remember how appalling in that hour was the picture of past life - how like an uncultivated field it seemed barren of every useful plant and covered over with unprofitable or poisonous weeds? O how earnest was he to be restored again to health that he might have an opportunity of exhibiting an altered life before the world! Would God have mercy on him but this once and rebuke his disease then when he sound forth the praises of preserving and redemption in that great congregation and never never could he forget so great mercy or cease to regulate his conduct by the will of God. Perhaps God listened to his supplications and rebuked his disease. And once more do we now urge the question upon his heart have not these so ardent vows been forgotten - have they not passed away like the morning cloud and the early dew?

And does not this representation recall to the mind of some Christians an unperformed forgotten resolution of the greater diligence which the near prospect of death forced upon his heart? When his hold on the earth was failing him he perceived that he had no sure hold on heaven. He fancied indeed that he was fastened to the cross but there was a grossness and a dimness before his Spiritual eyes and a bluntness upon his Spiritual senses so that all to him was uncertainty. He might be deceived and he now saw that sin had blinded his eyes and blunted his feelings. He longed therefore to live yet a while to shake off this drowsiness and to clear his vision by the tears of repentance. He lives - but does he repent - does he strive more earnestly to enter in at the strait gate? These are questions we wish him to decide.

There is no tie that fastens man more firmly to the world than friendship in all its multiplied forms of father and mother wife and husband brother and sister brother and sister friend and friend. When therefore this tie is cut asunder we feel as if we were almost loosened from the earth. And that it is often thus separated the garments of mourning in every congregation will testify. There is not however any other season of adversity better calculated to show us the emptiness of the world and to turn our thoughts inward upon our hearts than when a friend as it were a part of ourselves is torn from us by death.

Shall I appeal to that father or mother who had been called to witness the last this sickness and the last struggles of a beloved child? How think he did this world look to them as they watched the expiring spark of life and saw it go out? The world! It was in that hour a desolate spot and they wished to remain in it only that they might devote themselves more unremittingly to the service of their Redeemer. Yet what would be the answer of those parents if they were now asked whether the world did not again steal upon their affections and gradually obliterate their religious resolutions.

Or if these parents were not Christians they saw their child, perhaps, passing to eternity with no hope of heaven - while they remembered that they had never instructed him in religion nor offered up a single fervent effectual prayer for his spiritual welfare. This was a bitter aggravation of their anguish and it could not fail of awakening within them the most fixed determination of amendment. Alas! Can it be believed that their other children are suffered to live on in the same neglected state?

Or shall I call upon the widow to bear testimony to the truth of my remarks? The memory no doubt is full of that most agonizing hour when a husband a protector a friend turned upon her that last look of affection and closed his eyes forever. Soon as this first burst of grief was assuaged and she cast a look upon the world about her and saw that she was left alone, feeble and heartless to struggle against its winds and its waves, oh how did her spirit shrink from the effort and flee to her heavenly Father for succour and how fervently and entirely did she consecrate herself to his service. Religion! O it was her only hope her only refuge - her only delight. She felt as if the world were trodden under her feet - as if her spiritual conflicts were over. The best hours of the day and the sleepless hours of the night were spent in such communion with her heavenly Father. And was it possible she could have ever grow weary of this sublime service and condescend again to feed on the husks of this world? Alas you have the answer in that sigh which she breathes forth at the recollection of those sacred days and of the many vows she then made which remain yet unperformed.

Under the second head of this discourse we were to present motives urging to the immediate performance of unpaid vows. And we urge to this course of conduct.

First because these vow are recorded in heaven.

What is a religious vow? it is in fact a covenant between God and man. A person in a certain situation feeling his dependance on God promises to perform certain conditions if God will please in His providence to bring about certain other things. When we are sick for instance we engage to devote ourselves to the service of God if he will recover our health. Now when we are thus recovered we have a manifestation that this covenant is entered into on the part of our Maker and the conditions of it performed. And as we proposed the conditions and terms of it we have surely no reason to complain of them. It is right therefore that this law should be registered in heaven and remain sacredly binding upon us until performed. Alas the great the Almighty God condescended to permit mere dust and ashes to prescribe the conditions of a covenant - and has he also performed on his part these conditions and will he now suffer us to break it with impunity? Will he obliterate it from the book of remembrance? No my brethren, that vow is marked with a pen of iron. All heaven is witness to it and unless it be fulfilled they will stand forth as evidence against us in the great day of accounts. And this constitutes a second motive to the performance of unpaid vows. Because they will be exhibited against us in the day of judgment.

In this world we are permitted to rest secure in unconcerned while many a vow is unperformed. Our hearts perhaps are the only witnesses on earth - and our hearts are deceitful above all things. They hide these resolutions and promises from our view or persuade us that they are of small importance and thus do we press on year after year with a lie in our right hand. God does not awaken us because he hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness - and our consciences do not disturb us because the world has rendered them invulnerable. But my hearers, that day of God, that hour of universal scrutiny, will come at last. And when the shout of the archangel and the trump of God shall arouse the dead - when these heavens and this earth shall be on fire - rolling together as a scroll - when the elements are melting and the last pillar of nature is falling - in the midst of all this uproar and desolation how can we bear the thought that we have not fulfilled a covenant made with that God who sits behind and hurls these thunders? And when this final storm is over and the tribunal of God rises on the wreck of the universe and the stillness of the judgment succeeds to the crashing of nature and the records of heaven are opened - how can our fainting souls endure the challenge of Omnipotence, the vows of the Lord are upon thee and thou cannot go back - He hath no pleasure in fools: pay that which thou hast owed. Yes, my brethren, it is true that of our vows be not fulfilled in this life they must be paid at the judgment - if not paid at the judgment we shall pay them in the regions of despair.

Sermon 29 [The Holy and the Unholy]

[Sermon No. 29, "The Holy and the Unholy," Ezekiel 44:23; Malachi 3:18, 1820 Dec, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 5]

Ezekiel 44:23

And they shall teach my people the difference between the holy and profane and cause them to discern between the unclean and the clean.

Obvious marks of difference between the righteous and the wicked.

Malachi 3: 18

Then shall ye return and discern between the righteous and the wicked, between the him that serveth God and him that serveth him not.

It is curious to observe with how much vigor and boldness the writers of the bible [New Testament] mark off the whole human race into two great classes - the righteous and the wicked or the holy and unholy. They [not only] declare these two descriptions of men not only to be different but represent this difference to be great as that between light and darkness death and life. And to irreligious men there is not a greater mystery than this in the Gospel. When they look at the moral and amiable around them who make no pretensions to religion and compare their conduct with that of many who profess to belong to Christ they cannot see any such broad distinction and therefore looking no farther the external appearance they conclude there is none. Indeed there is a constant effort among the irreligious part of society to narrow the distinction between religion and the world till at length they are blended - till the line is drawn between the moral and immoral shall also be universally the line between the religious and irreligious - in other words to make religion a mere system of morals. And even some Christians who are in very lukewarm state almost deserted by the Spirit of God are often perplexed to discern between the righteous and the wicked and are disposed to consider that those expressions used by Christ and the Apostles (the sacred writers) on this subject to be exaggerated. It may be profitable therefore to exhibit some of those discriminating points by which the holy righteous are universally to be discerned from the unholy wicked and he that serveth him him not. We do not intend to point out all the real differences between sinners and saints because some of the most important characteristics of the Christian are so frequently counterfeited that even a very good men are at a loss to know whether they possess them.

Other characteristics again are possessed by most Christians and yet we might hesitate to say whether it were impossible a man should be a Christian without them. We mean to fix our eyes upon a few very obvious and important things the possession of which no inconsiderable evidence of a regenerated heart and the event of which is good evidence of a sinful heart.

In entering upon the subject we remark that the grand distinction between the wicked and the righteous between the holy and unholy is that the one loves God and the other does not. Without this principle no man can be a Christian: with it he cannot be otherwise. By nature all men are destitute of this love and all the strivings of unaided nature cannot fix it in the heart. It comes not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh nor of the will of man, but of God. It is shed abroad in the heart of the Holy Ghost and is the sum and substance of regeneration: For it is in the foundation principle of the new heart and produces all other holy exercises and actions. This love then constitutes the grand and universal distinction between the saint and sinner. But this is not the point on which we mean now to insist - that is in an abstract manner. We wish to look rather to the effects of love to God - and some of those displays of this in the life and feelings by which we prove its existence in the heart. For such displays are indeed the only evidence we can have the existence of this principle within us.

The first characteristic then by which the righteous is distinguished from the wicked [or the holy from the unholy] is that the one has a deep sense of his own sinfulness and of the evil of sin while the other has not. The real Christian feels that his heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked. He feels sin within him a body of death clinging to his best services. He suspects himself to be the chief of sinners - and when he compares his conduct and feelings with the laws of God he fears lest he offend in every point and is actuated altogether by selfishness. This penetrating sense of his sinfulness sinks him in the dust before an holy God and he mourns over his blindness of mind and hardness of heart over his innumerable sins of omission and commission and in the sincere language of penitence he cries out, God be merciful to me a sinner. And these contrite feelings result not alone from a view of the immense number of his sins; but also from a sense of the extreme evil and demerit of any sin when committed against an all holy and all merciful God. The whole of God's nature is opposed to it - all his attributes of mercy have been displayed to man to dissuade him from sin and all his attributes of justice revealed to warn him from its commission. If therefore in the face of all these mercies and all these terrors man persists in violating the law of God, there is no measure to the enormity of his conduct unless it be infinity. This sentiment does the Christian feel deeply. And knowing that he has sinned and still continues to sin he dare not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven.

Mark now how widely different are the feelings and sentiments of the irreligious man. He will not deny indeed that he has infirmities and that he is guilty of some sins. But he does not feel that they are very numerous or very great. They do not press upon his heart like some enormous load from which he longs and strives to be freed. He does not feel within him an obstinate contest between the old and the new man - a law in his members warning against the law of his mind. And he cannot conceive how those small sins of which he is guilty should be so enormous and evil in the sight of God. That God is infinitely exalted above all the effect of these sins and they cannot retard for one moment the designs of his government. Why then should he punish so severely a few departures from rectitude in a being who is so weak and so tempted as a man? This man cannot feel that his sins deserve so much severity and that God who is represented to him as threatening everlasting perdition not only to the sinful acts of man but even to the ungratified sinful desires such a being appears to him as unmerciful - as reaping when he has not sowed.

Now this so thinking difference in the feelings of these two men on this subject shows that the one has been made to see the depravity of his heart and the holiness of God's law which the other has not - in other words it renders it probable that the one is a Christian while the other is dead in trespasses and sins. Real converts indeed differ in their sense of their own sinfulness: but they all agree in this, that they are deserving of the everlasting punishment of a righteous God. For this feeling lies at the very turning point of conversion.

The second mark of distinction between the righteous and the sinful [the holy and the unholy] is that the one finds a delight in the society of Christians and in their pious conversation while the other does not. John makes love to the brethren the decision test of regeneration. We know says he that we have passed from death to life because we love the brethren. Now to love any being implies a delight in his society. And Christians are traveling on the same narrow path - struggling with similar difficulties by the way and destined to the same home at last. Shall they not be gratified then in each other's society? Look at the travellers upon the same road on earth. How soon will they learn each other's destination and how it gratifies one to find another going to the same point as himself! He immediately feels an attachment for this man and they derive much comfort and assistance in discussing the distance the conveniences and in conveniences the security and the danger of the wayward and in deriving plans for their most speedy advance. So the Christian in a higher sense rejoices to meet with a kindred spirit advancing like himself through the wilderness of this world on the path to heaven. He feels strengthened - to advance with great alacrity and to overcome the difficulties in his way. The men of this world being like a dead weight upon his progress - but he has now found one who will encourage him and advance hand in hand and heart with heart.

*Their fears, their hopes, their aims are one
 Their comfort in their cares.
 They share their mutual woes
 Their mutual burdens bear
 And often for each other flows
 The sympathizing tear. [Hymn by John Fawcett, 1782]*

When the real Christian perceives in any one around him the genuine Spirit of Christ - no matter whether he be rich or poor, polished or unpolished, learned or ignorant - no matter of what grade or colour or nation this Christian will experience towards him a love a complacency. It is not an esteem for his person or wildly or worldly greatness: but it is a love for the soul of the man. He sees in him a brother and anticipates a delightful union with him in a purer world. And he takes a pleasure in his conversation upon religion. For there is a general sameness in all regenerated hearts however modified by minor circumstances. There is a certain something stamped upon each of them by which they know one another and are drawn together. In a spot so full of obstruction to their Spiritual welfare as is this world where they must maintain a constant warfare with foes within and without how can it be otherwise there unpleasant for those who are the children of the same Father to sit down and discuss all these subjects to strengthen each other's hand and encourage each other's hearts to run with patients the race that is set before them and to enquire of each other the grounds of their hope in Christ and to dwell with the delight on the scenes that await the righteous beyond the grave.

But my brother and these are not the marks of the character of the unregenerated. He does not indeed object to hear the subject of religion discussed in the pulpit but it gives him pain to sit down with a devoted Christian and engage in a thorough enquiry upon experimental religion. And most of all does he dread any questions that relate to the state of his own heart. So long as the subject is some speculative point on which he can display his ingenuity by caviling he is not unwilling to converse upon it. But when the enquiry becomes practical and therefore personal - when it is urged home by asking him whether his Spiritual comfort increase or decrease - whether his own depravity of hearts becomes more sensible - whether the struggle in his heart between sin and holiness is more or less arduous - whether Christ appears to him as the chief among ten thousand and the one altogether lovely - whether the secret exercises of his heart are more or less pure and holy - whether he delights more in secret meditation upon God and heaven and in communion with him and whether upon the whole he believes himself to be Christian - such enquiries as these even if made by an intimate friend, are most offensive and disgusting to the unrenewed heart. The Christian is pleased with such questions because they probe his heart and tend to awaken him from any false security. If he be not a son of God he wishes to know it before it be too late. But there is nothing more offensive to the irreligious man than those plain practical Christians which serve to show him his sinfulness and his danger. He often trembles when in the society of devoted Christians lest they should put such enquiries to him. It is a language he does not understand. It is in his view the language of mystery and fanaticism and he feels his whole heart rising against it.

If then the irreligious man does not take pleasure in the society of the devoted Christian he cannot love him. As an upright and honest member of society he may indeed respect him and if he will let religion alone he does not feel averse to his conversation. But when he witnesses his bold and zealous exertions in the cause of Christ there springs up in his heart a feeling of disgust if not of hatred. And he is led to ridicule and condemn this servant of God for his zeal in the cause of Christ. This zeal he regards as fanaticism and he can have no complacency in the man so superstitious and bigoted. But as already observed the Apostle John makes love to Christians a discriminating mark of regeneration. Whenever therefore a man feels a disgust or resentment towards an eminently devoted servant of God it is strong evidence that his heart is yet unsanctified.

We are led very naturally on this palace place to state a third distinctive feeling between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not. The one rejoices in the conversion of sinners and the other does not. An irreligious man might indeed be gratified by learning that an abandoned profligate or Son or relative had embraced religion because this would produce a reformation of life and thus restore him to respectability in this world. And parents in general desire the happiness of their children and if religion can make them so they do not seriously object to their embracing it even if themselves are destitute of it though they do not really believe that it has any such efficacy. But aside from these peculiar cases the irreligious man does not rejoice in the conversion of sinners. Let him be told of a stranger lately living careless and unconcerned and trusting to his amiableness and morality for salvation but now brought broken hearted to submit to Christ and he will receive no pleasure from the information. He will consider it all a fit of enthusiasm and secretly wish the man may prove a hypocrite that his opinion may be confirmed. And when he learns that a former companion of himself of similar sceptical views has embraced religion he forms the like conclusion. Or when it is told him that a general seriousness prevails in some particular region, instead of rejoicing he will most earnestly desire that such a feeling which he supposes to be mere animal impulse may not extend. And when he looks around him and sees multitudes giving decisive evidence of their irreligion, perhaps there never enters his heart a serious wish to see them converted.

But how widely different are the feelings of the real Christians! Wherever an immortal soul is rescued from the dominion of sin and turned towards God no matter how suddenly and in what manner the revolution be affected, this man rejoices – nay there is a thrill of joy running through his breast: for he regards every instance of conversion as a triumph of truth over error - of grace over nature - of religion over the powers of darkness. And most earnestly does he desire to see the glorious work carried on till every sinner shall bow to Christ and every tongue confess to God.

We now proceed to state a fourth distinction whereby the righteous may be discerned from the wicked. And this is their different habits and feelings in relation to prayer. This is a very important mark in fixing the boundaries, between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not.

Prayer is most emphatically and correctly called the breath of the Christian. We care not what are the professions of a man, if he lead a prayerless life he also leads a sinful life. Point me to the man who does not pray and I will point to one who does not fear God. Point me to one who does not fear God and I will point to one who is a slave to sin and a candidate for perdition.

We are not saying however that no irreligious man prays. In the hour of danger or distress when he can no longer cling to the world - when all his earthly supports are failing him, he turns his thoughts towards God, not because he loves him but because he sees no other quarter from which he can possibly obtain relief. Let his danger or distress be removed and God is banished from his thoughts. He ceases to pray - and here is the grand distinction between him and the Christian - he does not always call upon God - nor does he do this habitually - but only when forced to it. This therefore is not praying in the Holy Ghost. These are the prayers which are an abomination in the sight of God.

There is not indeed a perfect uniformity in the Christian's prayers. He is sometimes left in a stupid formal state - and at other times finds his whole soul drawn out in prayer before the mercy seat - but he prays habitually - he does this for years - nay as long as he lives - in prosperity as well as in adversity in health as well as in sickness - and herein lies the wide difference between him and the sinner.

There is another circumstance concerning prayer wherein they differ. Christians are pleased when their brethren pray for them. They believe in the efficacy of prayer and feel the need of the intercessions of others. But this is not the case with the unregenerated. In seasons of afflictions indeed they do not object to the Christians prayers in their behalf. But in the time of health and prosperity, they have no wish may they are unwilling to be carried in the arms of prayer by the devoted Christian to the mercy seat. They feel as if he were interfering with those things that concern only himself and his God - and besides they look upon such a procedure as an act of enthusiasm and wholly unavailing.

These my hearers are some of the most obvious characteristics by which the righteous are distinguished from the wicked. And are they not plain marks? Is there much difficulty in applying them to ourselves? It cannot be difficult to determine whether we regard sin as a very great or a small evil - whether we look upon our own hearts as desperately wicked or as moderately so - whether we are pleased with Christian society and conversation - whether we rejoice at the conversion of sinners - whether we pray in secret daily and whether we wish to have Christians pray for us. When we are told that love to God is the foundation principle of every Christian obedience, we may be at a loss to determine whether this be the motive of our actions: because the human heart invents so many comes counterfeits of this love. But here are certain feelings and actions which it is not easy to counterfeit or mistake. We do not say indeed that it is impossible for a man should not be a Christian who imagines he can trace in his heart and life all these feelings and actions. But we maintain that in ordinary cases these would be no contemptible evidence of his Christian state unless the indulgence of some habitual sins furnished a contrary proof. And on the other hand we maintain that the want of these feelings and actions is a decisive evidence of the want of religion. What! A Christian without a sense of his own sinfulness - without a love of Christian society - without any joint at the conversion of sinners - and above all without prayer! No! Experience declares it impossible! The Bible declares it impossible and stamps upon the forehead of that man the sentence of Belshazzar - thou art weighed in the balances and found wanting!

Sermon 35 Reasons Why God Spares the Wicked

[Sermon No. 35, "Reasons Why God Spares the Wicked," Job 21:7, 1821 Jan,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 5]

Job 21:7

Wherefore do the wicked live?

The most unlearned Christian is better qualified for answering this question than the wisest philosopher. It is indeed as difficult now as ever to unaided reason: but the bible has put into our hands a clew in some of its plainest declarations, for giving at least a partial solution of this enquiry. We are there taught that God, worketh all things after the council of his own will - that the hairs of our heads are all numbered - that not a sparrow falleth to the ground without His notice and that He causes the wrath of man to praise Him and the remainder of wrath he restrains. In other words we learn that every saint is ordered and directed by an all perfect God that in forming the universe He had a certain design in view and that he so controls every occurrence as to promote this design. Hence then when the enquiry is made, wherefore do the wicked live? the Christian may answer, they live to fulfill the purposes of God. To prove and illustrate this principle will be the object of this discourse.

So far as we can judge from the book of nature and the book of revelations the only objects for which God created the Universe were to display his own glory and to bestow the greatest possible happiness upon his creatures. And in the Divine administration we may hence presume that these two objects are kept steadily in view and that every event is made conducive to their advancement. The permission of natural and moral evil in the creation might to our limited faculties appear to contradict this position. For we know that sin is opposed to God's glory and ruinous to the creatures happiness. It would seem therefore most wise in God to sweep it at once with an annihilating blast of his nostrils from the universe - and that He should continue in existence the wicked who are opposed to his glory for the purpose of promoting his glory at first sight a contradiction. But God's ways are not as our ways nor his thoughts as our thoughts. We believe indeed that this subject in its full extent cannot be taken in by a finite mind - certainly not by any human mind. There are some instances however in which we can see how the continuance of wickedness and of the wicked in existence is promotive of God's purposes. And some of these instances it is object to bring to view at this time.

And first the wicked live to display the mercy of God.

This is indeed a most triumphant and wonderful display. You have often been astonished no doubt in reading the history of the Israelites particularly during their passage to the wilderness that their uninterrupted disobedience rebellion and defiance of God did not provoke him to forsake them and utterly to exterminate them from the face of the earth. So constantly did they experience miraculous interference for their protection and so unequivocally were the laws of God made known to them that they were utterly without excuse for their transgressions. But my hearers the history of the Israelites is the history of the world - the history of our own hearts. As in water face answereth to face so the heart of man to man. Over the face of this whole world there is a wide a settled and universal alienation from the love and service of God - and a banded rebellion against his government. Excepting those whom his Spirit has reconciled there is none righteous no not one. And this hostility which exists within us against God is no more excusable than the perverseness of the Jews. For we have not only the clearest revelation of this law as did the Israelites but we have also the added the brighter light of the Gospel. And the evidence that the bible is the revelation of God is so various and overwhelming that it was scarcely equalled by the miracles wrought in the immediate presence of his chosen people - nay we venture to say that if such miracles were wrought at the present day they would be no more conclusive in support of the Scriptures than is the evidence we now enjoy. If we hear not Moses and the prophets neither should we be persuaded though one rose from the dead. And when we take into view the great superiority of the Gospel dispensation over the Jewish we do not hesitate to say that the Jews had fewer modest obedience than are presented to us. But after all look at the world and see how little regard is paid to the bible and the will of God! Look at the overwhelming majority in all Christian lands, walking in the sight of their own eyes and after the counsel of their own hearts, and as dead to vital religion as if there were no God no Saviour - no heaven. Indeed the words of God to Israel will most apply to us - Hear O heavens and give ear O earth: for the Lord hath spoken. I have nourished and brought up children and they have rebelled against me. The ox knoweth his owner and the ass his master's crib; but Israel doth not know; my people doth not consider. Judge I pray you betwixt me and my vineyard. What could've been done more to my vineyard that I have not done in it? Wherefore when I looked that it should bring forth grapes brought it forth wild grapes?

Notwithstanding all this indifference and positive opposition to the Gospel sinners are continued month after month year after year within its calls. Nay God pleads with them and warns them and exhorts them by his word his Spirit his ordinances and his providences to turn to the strong hold of safety and to accept of salvation as a free gift. Here is a display of forbearance at which man should be overwhelmed at which angels may be astonished and which God only can exercise.

Secondly the wicked live to display the power of the grace of God.

If a man saves the life of his most bitter enemy who is hunting his destruction we cannot but regard the deed as a most noble instance of moral excellence and must admire the character of the man. This feeling has often been excited within us when reading how David at the cave of Engedi cut off the skirt of Saul's garment and the next day called out to him and said, behold this day thine eyes have seen how that the Lord had delivered thee today into my hand in the cave: and some bade me kill thee but mine eye spared thee and I said I will not put forth my hand against my Lord. Such a generous deed melt even the persecuting and unrelenting spirit of Saul and forth from him the confession to David. Thou art more righteous than I: for thou hast rewarded me good whereas I have rewarded thee evil. But my hearers, this instance of rewarding an enemy good for evil is not worth naming when compared with another case recorded in Scripture in which Saul and Tarsus fought against God. Being pulled up with the knowledge of a Jewish lawyer and being exceedingly enraged against the humble followers of Christ he obtained the commission from the chief priests and's seizing the torch of persecution he rushed forth in pursuit of the defenceless worshipers of God as a wolf among sheep. As we view him scouring through Judea and breathing forth threatenings and slaughter we cannot but enquire why does God suffer this furious madman to live? Why is he not struck down in the midst of his murderous career? and left on the plain like the wife of Lot a monument of divine vengeance? O the breadth and the depth of the love of Christ! This is indeed stricken down and made a monument - but it is a monument of divine grace. That Jesus whom he was persecuting had still compassion on him and arrested him with an almighty hand in his caves of blood - gives him another heart and the minister of Satan is converted into the minister of God - the murderer of Christians into their defender - the persecutor into the martyr and

Saul of Tarsus the enemy of the cross into Paul the Apostle of Jesus Christ. This revolution so astonishing and complete whose effects have already reached from the rising to the setting sun and will be felt till the final shout of the archangel, this change was all the work of God and thousands in every age have shouted grace grace onto it.

Such is the power of divine grace and not only Saul has felt its almighty influence: but thousands in every successive age equally hostile to the truth as it is in Jesus and equally bent upon its expulsion from the world have been arrested and conquered and converted by the same Spirit - while the wondering world have admired and hated the change. And therefore it is that these have been suffered to live that God might have all the glory of their conversion and that men might know how vain it is to resist him in whose hands they are as the clay in the hands of the potter.

A third reason why the wicked are suffered to live is that God may use them as instruments of advancing his cause in the world.

After the death of Jacob in Egypt the brethren of Joseph supposed that he would revenge himself upon them for their treachery and cruelty and selling him to the Midianites. But Joseph said unto them Fear not: for am I in the place of God? But as for you ye thought evil against me: but God meant it unto good to bring to pass as it is this day to save much people alive. Here you perceive that the purpose of God was directly opposite to the opposite purpose of man - or in other words, he caused, the wrath of man to praise him. The brethren of Joseph had no other object in view than to glut their envy and jealousy. But God well this action as a means of preserving his church in the world by continuing in existence and increasing as the stars of heaven the seed of Abraham. Therefore it was that these cruel brethren of Joseph were suffered to live.

The Scripture history abounds with instances of a similar kind. The whole Jewish nation would have been destroyed for their rebellions in the wilderness had they not been the only people on earth that had been chosen to convey to posterity a knowledge of the true God and of a Saviour. And the same remark will apply to them at many other periods as when the ten tribes separated and when they were carried away captives to Babylon. In the days of our Saviour this nation had become so corrupt that nothing could have saved them from destruction, but the fact that they were the appointed people who were to crucify the Lord of glory and were thus to be made instruments introducing the Gospel among all nations. And it is a curious fact that while they were doing everything in their power to prevent this they were in fact taking the most effectual measures for its establishment and diffusion. By crucifying Christ they at once fulfilled the Scriptures and prostrated the separating wall that had so long stood between them and the Gentiles. Still farther did they forward the great work when they persecuted the disciples of Christ and compelled them to fly from Judea whereby Christ was proclaimed to all the nations of the known world.

The exertions of the wicked at the present day are made subservient to the propagation of the Gospel in a variety of ways. The attacks of infidels upon the bible have called forth the most able defenses - and indeed so completely triumphant have been these answers that an avowed infidel at the present day is rare. Indeed many of the peculiar weapons which not long since were employed to crush Christianity are now wrested from the hands of the devil and successfully used as a means of its propagation. The opposition of the ungodly to practical religion also has awakened the more vigorous exertions and the more faithful prayers and admonitions of Christians whereby vital piety has been strengthened and disseminated.

Another cause why God does not cast off the wicked is that he may use them as instruments of securing the perseverance of Christians.

There is nothing that tends so much to awaken the energies of the moral as well as intellectual powers of man as a pressure upon them. And accordingly we find that the exertions of men are generally proportional to the difficulties in their way. Were Christians left without any foes they would soon sink into stupidity and spiritual death. They have indeed many powerful enemies in their own bosoms: but they need also foes without to awaken their vigilance and lift them up to the fortifications of their heart as there is not a more just saying among the records of heathenism than that a man stands in need of very faithful friends or of bitter enemies. The opposition of the wicked to the righteous furnishes this requisite incitement and probably many a Christian is indebted to their reproach and scorn or public persecution for that holy zeal and unwavering resolution that have carried him triumphant through every difficulty in given him the victory over the world the flesh and the Devil. Had Lot lived in a Christian land he would probably have never been the eminent saint he was in Sodom. Had David not been surrounded by bitter enemies most of his life he had probably relapsed into open iniquity. Paul felt, his spirit strive within him when he saw the city of Athens wholly given to idolatry, and no doubt that in every age the profligacy the hatred and the persecution of the wicked have seemed sure to drive Christians nearer to God and to wean them from the world.

The last reason that we shall mention why the wicked are suffered to live is that they may fill up the measure of their iniquity.

When a person transgresses every law of God and man living in open defiance of heaven and earth and scattering misery around him we cannot help admiring why the sword of eternal justice is not commissioned to cut him asunder. But says an Apostle what if God willing to show his wrath and to make his power endured with much long suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction. We must acknowledge indeed that this forbearance is not inconsistent with the attributes of God. By using these vessels of wrath as instruments God might execute his vengeance upon his enemies without infringing at all upon the free agency of their instruments. For they would be only giving loose to their own abominable desires - and therefore while they were fulfilling the judgment of God they were treasuring up to themselves wrath against the day of wrath. And when at length the wrath of God is poured out upon them also the justice and the power of God will be more conspicuous because the measure of their iniquity is filled up. Saith God to Pharaoh, even for this cause have I raised thee up that I might show my power in thee and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. The heart of this king was hardened and he was permitted to sit in defiance of God for so many years in order that the power of God might be more signally displayed in the deliverance of the Israelites and the Pharaoh's final destruction in the Red Sea might be more complete and alarming. When we see a man whose career has been short and whose conduct has been moral and amiable when we see such an one with the hand of God heavily upon him - and hurried out of the world before he has embraced Christ and therefore gone down to everlasting woe there is excited within us short sighted creatures a distressing perplexity at the darkness and unsearchableness of the judgment of God. But when a man has long resisted all the warnings and the threatenings of God and has waxed worse and worse in iniquity even to old age when such an one is smitten at last we see and feel the justice of God. And that this justice may sometimes be displayed even in this world the wicked are permitted to live to fill up measure of their iniquity.

The first inference deductible from the subject is the consistency of the sovereignty of God with the free agency of man.

The crucifixion of Christ by Jesus is a good illustration of this principle. Every man will say that this people were perfectly voluntary and free and that they were merely indulging their malice and corruption in this barbarous deed. And yet this event was ordered in the councils of heaven with unerring certainty. This says Peter to the Jews, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God ye have taken and by wicked hands have crucified and slain. In this single instance we find no difficulty in reconciling the Divine determination or decree with the perfect freedom of man. And so we might produce a thousand other individual instances in which no more difficulty would occur. But when we find it essential as a general principle that God hath ordained whatsoever comes to pass we are very apt to revolt against it is a hard saying. Now do not our objections proceed from the impossibility of grasping with our feeble faculties the whole of this subject at once. When we look at particular cases which seem to involve this general principle our view is not perplexed. If thus the bible asserts the doctrine of divine sovereignty why is not the wisest course to receive the doctrine and to resolve all our difficulties in attempting feebly to comprehend it into the limited nature of our minds?

In the second place this subject shows us the folly and madness of contending against God.

The wicked may here see that they are in the hands of a sovereign God who is using them as instruments for promoting his purposes of mercy and justice and for his glory. So long as these purposes require they will be suffered to live in sin and whenever these require they will be made monuments of God's everlasting displeasure. All their efforts to prevent the spread of religion will be overwhelmed for its more speedy diffusion. More easily O sinner could you arrest yonder sun in its route through heaven, than you can check the Gospel of Jesus Christ. He will win - it will have free course - it will be glorified. The Lord who sitteth in the heavens will laugh at your opposing efforts and hold them in derision. *

But perhaps you reply that if God's fierce be promoted by the sins of men as well as by their holiness why do you urge us so strenuously to forsake sin and why should God punish us for promoting his glory?

And do you really believe sinner that because God has the power to overrule your violations of his law so as to prevent their natural tendency and even render them soon subservient to his purposes - do you believe that this exculpates you from blame? Remember that the universe is not given up to the ravages of sin not because you have been wanting in exertions to effect such a revolution - But because and only because God has so much power and so much benevolence and so much wisdom that he is able and willing to counteract your efforts and to bring forth good out of evil. Remember too that the fact of your opposing a being so great and wise as him will only sink you lower in condemnation and make you realize the justice of everlasting misery.

From then on bow your stubborn neck to the Gospel and from an enemy of God become a coworker with Him in the great designs that of his government. Then will you not only escape the fiery indignation that now awaits you but be admitted to the everlasting love and felicities of heaven.

Sermon 38 Submission to God

[Sermon No. 38, "Submission to God," James 4:6-7, Job 22:29, 1820,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 6]

James 4:6-7

*God resists the proud but giveth grace unto the humble.
Submit yourselves therefore to God.*

James 4: 10

Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord and he shall lift you up.

Job 22: 29

*When men are cast down then shalt they say, There is lifting up:
and he shall save the humble person.*

The opposers of revelation acknowledge that according to the religion of nature repentance is necessary to secure the favour of God. We demand of them to state the precise degree in which sorrow for sin must be exercised to meet the divine acceptance. But we demand an impossibility. They cannot put their finger upon anyone point in the scale of penitence and say, to this degree you must descend before God will stretch out to you the scepter of mercy.

In such a painful uncertainty about the conditions on which reconciliation with God may be affected does natural religion leave its miserable votaries. But we who profess to believe the Gospel have a more secure word of prophecy sure word of prophecy to which we shall do well to take as unto a light that shineth in a dark place. From that Gospel we can learn as definitely as words can trace out the feelings of the heart that the precise point at which a sinner must arrive before the light of God's countenance will be lifted upon him and before we are authorized to say unto him, Son be of good cheer: thy sins be forgiven thee. This point lies far below that exaltation to which all men are raised by the natural pride of the heart and therefore to reach it they must be cast down and then but not till then can we say to them, There is lifting up. [This last sentence is crossed out]

The degree of sorrow for sin in real penitents is indeed very different in different individuals. But under the Christian dispensation repentance though essential to conversion is not as in natural religion the only condition of acceptance with God. Other feelings must also be experienced by the sinner as conditions of his pardon. And the regenerating grace of God is given to that man in whom all these feelings exist at the same time even though their intensity be as different in different persons as the vary from one another in natural complexion or disposition. Or at least this remark will apply to the feeling of penitence - and therefore in stating the Gospel terms of salvation we are not compelled to attempt so impossible a thing as to define the precise degree in which it must exist.

That state of mind to which any sinner must be brought or he will never be converted, may in general terms be defined to be a cordial willingness to receive salvation entirely through faith in Jesus Christ. But this willingness is the result of other feelings which coexist in the mind. And these we shall now proceed to define and illustrate. In other words we mean to point out what is essential to be experienced by every man at the moment of conversion.

And let it be premised that the feelings we are about to describe are all the result of the operation of God's Spirit. So wide and universal is the alienation of the human heart from God and so opposite are its inclinations to His will that without this agent it would forever remain estranged from him. And when first the Spirit exerts his influences upon it the man is excited to resistance. The first impressions on the sinner's heart produce in him an alarm for his safety. But instead of submitting to Christ he strives in a thousand ways to rid himself of his fears. God however in great mercy will not leave him to his chosen way - but the admonitions and reproofs of the Spirit are again repeated and increased so that the sinner still refusing to submit often carries his opposition to rage and madness. At length his proud Spirit is broken and he sinks down a lost and helpless wretch before a sovereign God. And the state of his feelings at this moment is what we wish to describe.

And in the first place a man brought into such a condition realizes that his own righteousness cannot save him from eternal misery. He had formally flattered himself with the idea that his many fine moralities - his amiable disposition, his kindness to all about him and the countenance he gave to every benevolence and religious institution - would recommend him to the favour of God. He could not believe that the kind and beneficent parent of the universe whose will it is that all should be saved would permit any one to perish finally whose good deeds were so many and whose life was so regular and upright and unspotted. Besides he had believed for many years the Bible. And although he had doubted many of the doctrines which are contained in it and never knew personally what is meant by experimental religion yet he felt a confidence that in all his opinions and conduct he had been sincere and he felt assured that sincerity would be excepted rather than any particular belief.

But this man now brought to realize his true condition perceives that in all these conclusions he was deluded. In looking back upon his life he does indeed see many moral and benevolent actions which in the view of man were praiseworthy. But in not one of them does he perceive that he acted with a regard to the will of God. In other words had God not existed he would have performed the very same deeds. And therefore though they were laudable and agreeable to reason and the bible yet not one of them was a holy action. To all these actions he was prompted by animal impulses or worldly motives and for them he had had his reward - and therefore they could not extend to God. And as to his supposed sincerity in regard to the Scriptures he now perceives that it never prompted him to a diligent enquiry into their meaning. If you read them it was not with an anxious desire to discover every doctrine contained in them that he might embrace it. But rather that he might find texts to support his particular views. In short His sincerity never prompted him to read the bible with prayer - the only certain method of understanding it aright. And therefore he now realizes that his boasted sincerity was but another name for indifference or hypocrisy. Indeed he perceives that having been ignorant of God's righteousness and going about to establish his own righteousness he had not submitted himself to the righteousness of God.

But the delusions of this man are now scattered and these false confidences these self-righteous supports are torn away. The Spirit has shown him that he has leaned on the staff of a broken reed. And will he presume any longer to trust in his own righteousness? His righteousness! He now perceives that he never had any. But may he not now commence a new course and make the will of God his guide and the glory of God his motive - and in this way justify himself before God? Alas! How can he atone for his past sins. And can he hope to live a sinless life in future? Besides were this possible all his services would be justly due to God and he would still be an unprofitable servant. Self-righteousness therefore as the ground of acceptance with God must be wholly given up. And the man of whom we speak has given it up and now begins to perceive and feel the force of the Apostles argument - Now we know that what things govern the law saith is saith to them who are under the law that every mouth may be stopped and the whole world become guilty before God. Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight.

But the views of this man in regard to his own character do not terminate here. For in the second place he perceives that he has been and still is sinning against the holiest the kindest and the best of Beings. When he looks back upon his life he discovers it to be little else than a continued violation of that, law which is holy just and good, or an omission to comply with its requirements. And this too in deference of all the light of warnings and exhortations which have poured upon him from the bible from the pulpit and the providences of God. When he sees how many motives to holiness he has resisted he is astonished at the perversity and hardness of his heart. Once he was unwilling to be told that he was depraved and that he was an enemy of God. He might acknowledge himself guilty of some sins. But at the same time he believed that there were within him some virtuous and holy inclinations, prompting him to love God and his fellow men. And he felt it to be a hard judgment to be told that he was dead in trespasses and sins and treasuring up to himself wrath against the day of wrath. But how different are his feelings now that the Spirit has opened his eyes and convinced him of sin of righteousness and of judgment to come! Tell him now of the purity of his past life and the correctness of his motives and he will look upon you as a base flatterer. For that past life is now painted upon his memory in an impressive and painful distinctness. And among all his deeds for perhaps ten or twenty or thirty years he cannot turn his thoughts upon one which was prompted by the love of God. Nor can he discover among all his desires one that was strictly holy. And forcibly does he realize that the glory of God has not had a place among the motives that stimulated his exertions.

This picture of a past life that now rises in full and distinct view before the sinner is also aggravated when he compares it with the forbearance and kindness of God. Notwithstanding sin is the abominable thing which he hates and notwithstanding he had power to destroy both soul and body in hell yet this man has been suffered to go on month after month year after year in the habitual violation of the laws of heaven. Nay more God has watched over him and defended him from a thousand dangers and surrounded him with innumerable mercies during this so long season of forgetfulness rebellion and ingratitude. Such forbearances this was great beyond human comprehension. And wherefore was it that against a Being this infinitely benevolent and merciful this man should near the standard of rebellion and trample on the authority and spurn the protection of the omnipotent God? The perversity of the human heart can alone explain such infatuation. That perversity in all its unalleviated bitterness this convicted sinner is now made to feel. Once the language of the Bible on the subject seemed to him an exaggeration or a mystery. But he now finds by his experience that, the heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked - that it is full of evil - that the imagination a man's heart is evil from his youth - that in him that is in his flesh there dwelleth not good things - that the wicked are estranged from the womb and go astray as soon as they be born speaking lies, and that, the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, because they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them because they are Spiritually discerned. In the language of Eliphaz this man will say, Is not my wickedness great and my iniquities infinite? He will join in the petition of Job, I have sinned: what shall I do unto thee O thou Preserver of men? With the publican will he exclaim, God be merciful to me a sinner and with David will he say, Have mercy upon me oh God according to thy loving kindness; according to the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions.

It is hardly necessary in the third place to say that such a sense as this of his sinfulness and of God's forbearance will produce in the heart of the convicted sinner the contrite feelings of genuine repentance. Before he realized the extent and Spirituality of God's law and his violations of it - before he compared his uninterrupted and ungrateful opposition to God with the forbearance and mercies of his Father in heaven it is no wonder that he should feel none of the reproaches of conscience and refuse to humble himself and to mourn over his sins. But when all these things are presented before him in their genuine aspect it would be a miracle if the view did not soften and melt his heart - if it did not sink him in the dust before God and produce him that godly sorrow that work of repentance unto life. If we have wantonly outraged the feelings of our nearest earthly friend - there is no one who would not deeply feel this offence when the gust of passion passed over. Had we robbed of his property or reputation or peace the man who risked his life to save ours and who had loaded us with innumerable favors how bitter would be our anguish when brought to realize our ingratitude and cruelty! What then should be the feelings of the sinner when first made sensible of his unnumbered violations of the laws and will of his friend in heaven and that his life has been little else but a series of efforts to defeat the designs that God in whom he lives and moves and has his being and to disorder the cause of that Redeemer who has actually laid down his life to save him from eternal ruin!

The fourth sentiment that goes to make up the exercises at the moment of conversion of the convicted sinner is that he deserves to be forsaken of God and given over to eternal misery. Had he been placed where he could have had no opportunity to know what were the will and the requirements of God he might justly complain if forever deserted. But what greater light or what more powerful motives could have been set before him to persuade him to turn from his sins and those he has experienced in a Gospel land? And yet all these he has slighted and resisted year after year. And now where would be the injustice if God should leave him to his chosen way? Under what obligations is he placed to strive with man forever? Besides all this tell me if you can the precise evil and demerit of a single sin against such a being as God. In order to this you must be able to look through all the possible relations of Spiritual existence and your standard of measurement must be infinity. What then will be the demerit of a ten or twenty or thirty years series of transgressions?

This reasoning the convicted sinner feels in its full force and is thereby brought to the painful conclusion that the justice of God would remain untarnished were he to be cast off forever to suffer the interminable effects of his sins in the world of hopeless despair. If therefore God do save him it must be thorough sovereign unmerited mercy.

There remains but one of the prominent feeling to be mentioned that exists in the heart of the convicted penitent we are describing and that is a lively sense of the fitness and propriety of the Gospel plan of salvation through and to the crucified Redeemer. Having given up every hope in his own righteousness is a ground of acceptance and pardon and being weighed down with the intolerable load of his sins and perceiving that he might in justice be left to perish beneath them, he despairs of being able by his own exertions to restore himself to the favor of God. And therefore he casts his eyes about him with an anxious solicitude to see if he cannot obtain assistance from abroad. A voice reaches him from heaven, come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest. It is the voice of God, who is mighty to save - of Him who hath trodden the wine press alone - who was wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities. Here then is precisely that assistance this man wants. His own righteousness cannot save him: but here may he be justified purely by grace through the redemption there is in Christ Jesus. His sins are innumerable and he cannot atone for the least of them but here is one who have borne our sins in his own body on the tree and in whom there is plenteous redemption. He cannot overcome the perversity and corruption of his heart and turn it to love God and to practice holiness. Yet this almighty Saviour is ready to send down to him the Comforter and to save him by, the washings of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost. In this Redeemer then all fullness dwells. And the despairing sinner perceives that his atonement and righteousness are his only refuge from the wrath of an offended God and that he is alone fountain whence can be drawn the waters of eternal life.

We have now gone through with the delineation of those feelings that coexist in the heart of the sinner when he is brought to see his real condition and to be guilty and condemned before God. We have shown you that that he then realizes the total insufficiency of his own righteousness - and the sinfulness of his life and the stubborn fraternity and corruption of his heart and that there exist within him genuine repentance and a consciousness of deserving everlasting misery - and a sense of the fullness and sufficiency there is in Christ. And now to the man who is brought to this state of mind - to one who is thus cast down from the pinnacle of self-righteousness and pride and his wretched and miserable and poor and blind and naked before a sovereign God to such an one we are authorized in the name of the Lord Jesus to say, There is lifting up.

You are brought as we believe to that state of mind in which it is consistent with the Divine attributes to bestow on you regenerating grace (or rather you are already converted: for such graciously supply a new heart) you will be lifted up to the enjoyment of God's favor peace of conscience and joy in the Holy Ghost - to the exalted privilege of a Son of God - and an heir of heaven.

And to this point of submission to the possession of these feelings my hearers do we believe every man must be brought or he will never be converted. The manner in which this state of feeling is produced - the means of arriving at it and the distinctiveness with which it is experienced are seldom precisely the same in two individuals. One person is suddenly seduced to it and has an intense perception of it - another submits slowly and cannot determine the time when such a state of feeling was first experienced. Yet amid all this variety we maintain that this point is reached and must be reached by every man in order to his becoming a Christian. If we build on any other foundation we cannot expect permanent peace of mind. But we shall be carried about by every wind of doctrine and in every season of trial we shall find our basis of sand failing us. For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid which is Jesus Christ. Now that state of mind we have been describing is one in which Christ is all in all - and indeed we may define it to be a disposition to receive him cordially and unreservedly in his character of Prophet Priest and King.

But there is such a thing as coming very near the state of mind and yet never reaching it. The man is willing to submit in part but refuses to yield unreservedly to the will of God and to his method of salvation. He still clings to him some remnant of self-righteousness - some secret defendance on his own goodness - he does not feel that he is entirely lost or dependant on the grace of God. And hence it is that so many who profess to be Christians manifest so little zeal in the cause of Christ. Hence it is that they have no clear evidence of their interest in Christ. We have built on a false foundation and unless we tear this away and rest solely on that chief corner stone laid in Zion elect and precious we may be assured that the edifice we have erected is of wood or hay or stubble or that it will not abide that fiery trial which is to try every man's worth.

But that state of mind we have attempted to describe in this discourse is not confined to the period of conversion. It may then indeed be most manifest, but it remains in the true Christian through life. Whenever he presents himself before God he realizes the insufficiency of his own righteousness - and that his sins are multiplied and aggravated. And for there does he exercise repentance and acknowledge that God might justly leave him forever and not only does he perceive the necessity of Christ's atonement but he exercises faith in his blood. And it is the permanence of these feelings that affords decisive evidence of a Christian state. And to the man who is thus habitually cast down we can triumphantly say, There is lifting up. Perhaps for ten or twenty or thirty or forty years you can remember that such has been your state. Thus do we say unto you that you are already lifted up to an enviable height. And whatever be your infirmities and bodily pains soon will they be over and you will be lifted up to that world where sickness and sorrow and death will no more interrupt the enjoyment of your God.

Sermon 39 Christ the Searcher of Hearts

[Sermon No. 39, "Christ the Searcher of Hearts," Revelation 2:23, 1821 Mar,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 6]

Revelations 2.23

And all the churches shall know that I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts.

How few of the Christian church have any lively sense of the presence of the Lord Jesus when they assemble to commemorate his love and his death! And still fewer are there who forcibly feel that he is there looking into their hearts and registering the state of them in the book of his remembrance. Yet it is nevertheless there that our Savior is really present with us on every sacramental occasion as he was with the twelve disciples when this supper was first instituted. And he knows each one of us and the state of our hearts and our motives and our fitness or unfitness for participating on the holy supper as well as he knew these things is regard to the Apostles. This omniscient eye is indeed upon us at all times: but on such an occasion so solemn so tender so holy and so animating the Redeemer may justly expect in his preferred followers that preparation of heart which will not shrink from inspection. He expects to find on them the wedding garment and that they are waiting to welcome the Bridegroom. And therefore his destiny into their thoughts and feelings at such a season will be unusually exact and penetrating. Not an unholy desire can then lurk in the very darkness corner of the soul – not a worldly thought can enter nor any unworthy motive be wrapped in the thickest foldings of the heart which his all searching vigilance will not discover.

And this omniscient survey is going on unperceived by those who are the subjects of it. While their utmost exertions are directed to hide the state of their hearts (if it be unusually bad) from their brethren and to retain the favorable opinion of the world they are extremely apt to forget that he who searches the the reins and the hearts is then turning upon them an eye before whose glance the marks of hypocrisy becomes transparent the windings of the human heart are made straight. They go away rejoicing that they have deceived man; not remembering that a faithful unseen witness has written their sin with a pen of iron and with the point of a diamond.

It may be profitable to us Christian brethren if we follow in imagination the Lord Jesus as he enters the hearts of his preferred professed disciples this day assembled around the communion board. For it is not impossible we may in some heart discover a resemblance to our own and thereby be enabled to determine what estimate of ourselves will this morning be carried to heaven and sealed up to the judgment day.

The man whom we first approach is one in whose countenance and demeanor there is much seriousness – even an excess of humility and severance. But when we pass this extension we find the picture the reverse. In one word we find we have entered the heart of a hypocrite - of a man who professes religion because he hopes thereby to accomplish some worldly selfish end: but does not believe in its reality and despises its doctrines and its institutions. As he now sits at the Lord's table instead of examining himself and praying for an increase of faith and love he is reflecting with proud contempt upon the weakness and superstition of those around him whom he supposes to be sincere in the belief of such absurdities – and triumphing in his own superior discernment and wisdom by which he is able to rise above these superstitions and to turn them to his own aggrandizement.

My hearers did you ever look at a darker or more frightful spot than this man's heart. It is indeed a whited sepulcher full of dead men's bones and all manner of corruption. And do not hear the piercing reproof which Christ directs to this man – Judas betrayest thou the Son of Man with a kiss.

We hope however that there are few such hearts in the Christian church. It is to be feared however that the next example to which your attention is has many patterns in the visible church. We refer to the man who while he partakes of the body and blood of Christ does not believe in the doctrine of his atonement. He may acknowledge indeed that Christ has redeemed us from superstition and ignorance and that he has sent us an eminent pattern in his life for imitation. But that he has redeemed us from the curse of the law being made a curse for us - that he died for our sins according to the Scriptures and was delivered for our offences: that this man after he had made one sacrifice for sins sat down on the right hand of God: in short that the righteousness of Christ is the sole ground on which any man can be pardoned and admitted to heaven - such doctrine as this the man whose heart we are now exhibiting before you rejects as not reasonable nor credible. Why then is he partaking of the Lord's Supper? He will reply that it is to commemorate the death of Christ as the greatest of benefactors that ever appeared on earth. But he acknowledges that the benefits derived from him consist wholly in enlightening our minds - and therefore they differ from the discoveries made by other men such as Socrates and Plato in nothing but in the degree. Hence the feelings of this professor of religion at the Lord's table are precisely of the same kind as they would be if he were commemorating the death of Socrates or Plato - and such commemoration would be equally proper. Is this the doctrine of the bible? Answer ye humble souls who have never learned to speculate upon religious truth but who have received your instructions from the bible and the Holy Spirit and who have for years looked with a steadfast faith on the righteousness of Christ as your only refuge from the vengeance of an offended God.

And do you imagine my hearers that, he who searches the reins and hearts does not feel wounded in the house of his friends, when he reads the feelings of another description of his professed disciples concerning his exalted character? Who refuse to honor him as they honor the Father - who do not believe that, he is over all God blessed forever, and who withhold from him that worship which the angels of God bestow? And who reduce him from the Creator to the creature? Do such persons indeed realize while they approach the table of their Lord that it is he who searcheth the reins and the hearts? Let them then enquire whose prerogative is this and Solomon in his address to the supreme God will answer – Thou even thou only knowest the hearts of all the children of men. If then Christ be really God will he regard with complacency the man whose views of him are infinitely below the truth? Will he manifest himself unto such an one as he does not unto the world? Let experience answer.

But another heart is opened before us - and there is stamped upon it in painful distinctiveness - self righteousness. We care not if this man affirms his belief in the righteousness of Christ as the sole ground of his acceptance: for we know that he depends upon his own. When he looks back upon his many good deeds and his amiable conduct - when he remembers that such a sum of money he has given to one benevolent object and such a sum to another the view flatters him and occupies more of his thoughts than his sins of omission and commission during the same period. Hence the language of his heart will be Lord I thank thee that I am not as other men are. Whereas he ought to say and feel, I am an unprofitable servant God be merciful to me a sinner.

And will this man come in an acceptable manner to the table of communion? Will Christ there appear to him all in all? O this self righteous Spirit will exclude him from the fellowship of God and his Son Jesus Christ as certainly and as entirely as did the leprosy banish one from the Jewish camp. He is indeed the leprosy of the soul and if not cleansed in that fountain set open for Judah and Jerusalem to wash in from sin to uncleanness it will poison the whole moral system.

Concerning the next heart which we would describe as being sometimes perhaps not infrequently found at the communion table what my brethren shall we say shall we call it a Christian heart or not? For belongs to one who neglects almost wholly secret and family prayer. Day after day and week after week passes over his head during which rarely a single humble fervent effectual prayer is offered up by him to his Father in heaven. And does he then love this God while he is so so unwilling to come into his presence to seek those mercies he needs? Does he highly value the prevalent name of his Redeemer and yet so seldom use it? The supposition is contrary to every analogy on earth. For whether houses or land or wife or children be ardently loved their presence and society is universally sought - after and coveted. A Christian without prayer! As easily might the vapours float without air or the rainbow exist without rain or man without breath. And that a prayerless man should celebrate the Lord's supper as a disciple what is it but solemn mockery. And how will those answer it to thy conscience? And how will thou answer it to thy God?

The next Christian communicant whose heart is not right in the sight of God is he whose conduct and feeling are in general criminally conformed to the world. The practice is in contradiction to the words of John, know he not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God. For on every day of the week except the seventh he is ready to join in all the vain amusements - and less criminal pleasures of the world and in all if less violent opposition to religion. In other words during the week his select and chosen society are the enemies of religion - and on the Sabbath and sacramental communion he claims a brotherhood to the saints - and thus does he think to purchase a license for returning again to his week day companions. But certain it is that this tithe of mint anise and cumin though it may procure for him a release from the reproof of conscience in this world yet it will never purchase heaven. For an Apostle hath said, Be ye not conformed to the world: but be transformed by the renewing of your mind that you may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God.

The next character we would hold up to view does not differ materially from the last. For the former is conformed to the world and this one devoted to its acquisition. The riches of that world are his idol before which he bows daily and his worship and sincere voluntary and delightful. Compare this with worship of God. And where think you does he receive most pleasure when looking over his possessions and praying in his closet? And which would he soonest neglect his gold or his devotions? Where does he appear most active and interested in maturing and accomplishing plans for the increase of his property or in working out his salvation or in striving to advance the Redeemer's kingdom in the world? The answer to these enquiries is given on the face of this man's conduct - so plainly indeed that he himself will scarcely deny that his greatest pleasure arises from the acquisition of worldly possessions. And yet with this fact before him and with the alarming declaration of Christ sounding in his ears, ye cannot serve God and Mammon, he has presented himself this morning as a follower of Jesus - as one who has entered into a solemn covenant to consecrate his time and talents to his body and spirit to the service of his Redeemer to partake of his body and blood and thus sanction this covenant anew. And is it a harsh judgment to say that even in the midst of this solemn transaction when the symbols of his bleeding dying Saviour are so forcibly presented to him his thoughts are more occupied by worldly cares and dreams of wealth and by the glories and graces of his Redeemer's character or by the sinfulness and stupidity of his own heart? And is it a hard judgment to say that such a man eats and drinks unworthily and therefore eats and drinks damnation to himself?

The heart of the next man we approach directs us to his life as an index to that account which the searcher of reins and hearts will this day seal up against him. This is the professor whose intemperance in drinking is already known to the world notwithstanding all his efforts to conceal it. And why will he still continue to crucify his Redeemer afresh? May not rather now resolve to exercise repentance and be resolute in reformation!

Or with equal propriety might we point to the person who for weeks and months is employed notwithstanding the vows of the Lord are upon him in spreading the false report and stirring up discord between neighbor and neighbor - but who notwithstanding has this day come forth to commemorate the death of him who when he was reviled reviled not again. And is there not too much reason to fear that were we to hold up pictures of many other descriptions of evil doers we might find the originals in some part of the visible church? My brethren these things ought not to be.

Another heart which the omniscient eye of Christ regards with disapprobation belongs to one who is now about to come to his Redeemer table although he has made no peculiar preparation for it. No uncommon earnestness is in prayer - no additional strictness in self-examination has he practiced during the weeks or the morning past: but he comes now to this solemn institution with as much stupidity of heart as he usually brings into the ordinary services of the Sabbath. When we are invited to feast with our neighbors we are careful that our exterior at least shall be becoming and that we may not by our neglect of cleanliness and civility wound the feelings of the master of the feast. But when the Lord of glory - the Creator of heaven and earth condescends to invite us to his table we can with shameful indifference go up to his feast and enter into his holy and pure presence with the ragged and filthy garments of sin upon us.

There is another heart which we fear maybe found this morning at the Table are our Redeemer which is there in vain and worse than in vain. And to discover its deficiency we must look not alone at its state in relation to God but also in relation to man. This person hates his brother and a separation takes place between them in most of the intercourse of life: and they strive to injure one another's reputation and Christian character. Yet these men are both come professedly as Christian brethren cherishing towards each other a lively sympathy for the their mutual welfare and are about to partake of the Lord's body and blood of him whose garment was without seam from top to bottom and whose commandment it is that his followers love one another and who by the mouth of his Apostle said, if a man say I love God and hateth his brother he is a liar.

But let us turn from this painful exhibition of unworthy communicants and look at those (and we fondly and charitably believe these to constitute the great majority of the Christian church) whom Christ recognizes this day as his genuine disciples and who have on the wedding garment. We point you first to him whose heart is contrite and humble and penitent who has a lively sense of his own poverty sinfulness and need of the robe of Christ's righteousness and who sits at his table hungering and thirsting after the bread of eternal life. And to such an one do we firmly believe this will be given. For here is that preparation a heart necessary for its reception. There is that humble contrite spirit with which God declares he will dwell.

We point you in the second place to that man who approaches the Saviour's feast with a joyful heart. It is not the joy of the world which will soon be turned into mourning but it is joy in the Holy Ghost, a joy resulting from a long course of watching and praying. It results from a sense of pardoned sin - of acceptance in a Mediator - of a restoration of the favour and love of God and a firm hope of heaven.

This man then when partaking of the symbols of Christ's atonement will have awakened within him a lively gratitude to that Redeemer who, was wounded for his transgressions and bruised his iniquities who was borne his sins in his own body in the tree and who hath sent down his Comforter to lead him into all truth and to give him the peace of God which passeth understanding.

And in the third place are we not authorized to exhibit a heart in which dwells the faith of assurance? Does not the eye of your Redeemer ye aged fathers in the church as it penetrates your souls does it not there read your feelings in the language of Paul? I am now ready to be offered and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord the righteous judge will give me on that day. Then does the Lord pronounce you indeed worthy a place at his table – and to you will he whisper the language of promise and consolation – I go to prepare a place for you that where I am ye may be also, and that ye may drink wine and eat bread at my table in my Father's kingdom.

My Christian brethren let us apply this subject to ourselves. Let us enquire whether any of the characters we have held up before you belong to us. And if such be the case there are about two consistent courses - either to refuse a reception of the sacred elements before us or to exercise immediate repentance. The latter is the proper course. And may we each one of us be enabled also forcibly to realize that the eye of Him who searcheth the reins and hearts is now turned upon us. In the midst of us he stands this day to learn who are his followers and who are his foes - who are alive in his cause and who have forsaken their first love. Yes and the recording angel stands beside Him with his pen of iron and his opened roll to mark down our names and our love or our hatred - our zeal or our coldness - our feelings and our motives. That roll will this day be sealed up and stamped with the signet of God. And that record whether it be to our condemnation or our acquittal will never be opened till that final day when this same witness shall break the seal thereof and hold it up unaltered to the view of an assembled universe.

Sermon 40 Godly Sincerity

[Sermon No. 40, "Godly Sincerity," John 1:47, 1821 Mar,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 6]

John 1:47

Behold an Israelite indeed in whom is no guile.

Amid the many conflicting opinions that exist among the professed followers of Christ, while one learned man says this is the meaning of the bible and another puts upon it a totally different construction the humble enquirer after the truth who has not that stretch of intellect nor that store of knowledge necessary to discover the error or correctness of these clashing sentiments is apt to be perplexed and bewildered. And such an one will anxiously look about him for some clew that will lead him securely through this labyrinth of controversy. Is there no course that I can pursue will he say which is secure and which will unerringly lead me to the belief of such doctrines as will secure my acceptance with God? Show me that path and I will pursue it in defiance of every obstacle:. But if there be none then must I give up every hope of arriving at the truth and must regard religion as a mass of contradictions.

To the man who presents this supplication we are prepared to say that this is one thing whose possession is to human probability a security against fatal error and which like the hand of Moses stretched over the Red Sea will divide the waters of contention so that a man may pass through on dry land. And this thing is genuine sincerity and examining the bible and in performing those duties which God requires.

Many do indeed most strenuously object against the principle that sincerity will infallibly guide a man into a correct speculative faith in matters of religion and that it is all that God requires of us. For say they many of the Mahommedans and Pagans are unquestionably most sincere in the belief of their absurdities as the practice of their enormities and therefore if your doctrine be true it is no matter what a man believes or does. We do not indeed mean to extend this idea of sincerity to Pagans or Mahommedans. We leave them in the hands of a merciful and righteous God - and speak in this place only of the sincerity of those who live under the light of the Gospel. And of such we affirm that if they improve to the utmost of their power the facilities and means in their hands they have the promise of God that they shall be guided into all necessary truth. The purposes of God may indeed require after all that such a person should be left to go astray: but we speak here of the revealed will of God and according to this, everyone that asketh receiveth and to him that knocketh it shall be opened. What can be plainer than this unlimited promise that if any man seeks in the proper way (and what is the proper way if it be not in sincerity! ) for a right understanding of God's will and his duty he will have all necessary light given him and not seek in vain? There is however such a thing as a false and delusive sincerity which is no other than hypocrisy in disguise. Nay so well does it counterfeit genuine sincerity that the man in whose heart it exists is often deceived and that fatally. And we presume that it is this misnamed sincerity which leads many Christians to contend against the principle we lay down that genuine sincerity is sure of acceptance with God. In other words they deny this principle because they do not make a distinction between spurious and real sincerity.

It is an inquiry of peculiar interest therefore to every seeker after truth what are the marks of true genuine sincerity? And we shall appropriate this discourse to pointing out and illustrating those discriminating marks by which this virtue may be known.

And you have my hearers a distinguished example of this virtue in the Nathaniel who in the text is said to be an Israelite indeed in whom there is no guile. This was the character given of him by him who knew what was in man. Nathaniel did indeed indulge an unreasonable prejudice against the place of Christ's birth: but it was the prejudice of an honest mind - a prejudice that yielded in a moment as soon as the evidence of this Messiahship was presented before him. There with the like frankness he explained, Rabbi thou art the Son of God: thou art the King of Israel.

But the conduct of Nathaniel is presented to us in this place only in a single instance - and there is scarcely a man in any congregation who will not suppose that his own conduct in the like circumstances would be marked by the same candor and submission to truth. In order therefore to determine what would be the course a man of Nathaniel's character that is a man of genuine sincerity would pursue were the bible just put into his hands as a revelation from God - we must go into a more particular analysis of his character.

We will of suppose for the sake of brevity that this man is convinced from a rigid examination of the evidence that all scripture both in Old and New Testaments, is given by inspiration of God and is profitable for doctrine for reproof for correction for instruction in righteousness. The next enquiry therefore will be what do the Scriptures reveal to be believed and what to be practical. To determine this question genuine sincerity will lead him in the first place to give up all confidence in the expositions and commentaries of the Bible by men of every name and nation.

When this man looks over the countless volumes that have been written in illustration of the scriptures he does indeed find an agreement in relation to certain facts and many circumstances of comparatively small importance are exhibited in a clearer point of view. But the grand and essential doctrines of the Gospel - the supporting columns of the Christian edifice and not merely the pins of the tabernacle are what this man is now inquiring after. And concerning these he finds almost as many discordant opinions as he reads commentators. He perceives that each one of them endeavors to give every passage in the Bible meaning conformable to a preconceived and preestablished system. His prejudices are indeed in favor of some one of the systems and all others appeared to him absurd. Yet in forming his opinions he had never thoroughly and prayerfully consulted his bible: nor is he even acquainted with the opposing commentaries. He resolves now therefore to give up his prejudice and to give up with them all human exposition of Scripture. Should he resolve to wade through all these commentaries he would find truth encumbered with so much learned lumber that it would require more discernment and judgment to discover and to decide which was correct among so many clashing opinions that to form his conclusion from the unadulterated unexplained language of the Scriptures that was dictated by the Holy Spirit. It is the part of wisdom therefore and especially the part of sincerity to rid himself for the present of all the scriptural glosses and explanations of men and to sit down to a sober and impartial reading of the bible without note or comment.

Another mark of genuine sincerity is obtained when a man gives up all confidence in his own unaided powers of discernment in examining the bible.

We do not intend by these remarks to represent commentaries on the Bible as useless to every description of men. For they certainly do afford a valuable assistance in extensively and minutely examining the Scriptures. But we here speak of a man who is searching for the grand essential doctrines of the Gospel. And these we maintain are so clearly revealed that a man in reading the Scriptures with the feelings and Spirit of genuine sincerity can hardly fail of understanding them and until he be established in these commentaries rather bewilder than enlighten.

Even concerning the most ordinary subjects in common life he finds that he is extremely liable to form wrong conclusions and that too where he is most sincerely desirous of discovering the truth. And in the enquiries of human literature and science that are more difficult he finds it scarcely possible to avoid being led into error. When for instance he enquires into the powers and faculties and affections of his own mind how widely astray will the least defect in a definition or the least cloudiness of conception lead him! When therefore he approaches revealed religion - a subject so vast and so widely removed from his previous enquiries and a subject too that stirs up all his most deeply rooted prejudices because it aims a deadly blow against his pride and corrupt inclinations - shall he not tremble when he comes to the examination of such a subject under so many disadvantages lest he should not be able correctly to understand it? Nay will he not have every reason to suppose that if he rely on his unaided faculties he is almost certain of being led into error - and that too where an error must be everlastingly fatal? The man who is spoiled through philosophy and vain deceit and is propped up with science falsely so called will feel that he is sufficient in himself for this examination. But to such an one may the words of the Prophet be addressed – thy wisdom and thy knowledge it hath prevented them and now hast art said in thi8ne heart I am and none else beside me. Therefore shall evil come upon thee, thou shalt not know from whence it riseth: and mischief shall fall upon thee thou shalt not be able to put it off and desolation shall come upon thee suddenly which thou shalt not know.

The man of genuine sincerity however has not the hardihood to believe that he is safe in following the suggestions of his unassisted reason in looking into the vast and remote subjects revealed in the Bible. He does indeed believe that this Gospel is so plain that the wayfaring man need not err therein. But yet the history of the church shows him that thousands have erred - that is to say thousands have adopted sentiments directly opposite concerning the fundamental principles of the Gospel - and therefore the one or the other of these parties have believed a lie. Nor has this diversity been confined to the weak and ignorant but has been most marked and extensive among the great and the learned. And shall this man consider his own judgment and discernment and candor superior to that of all who have gone before him? If the spirit of genuine sincerity be within him rather will he feel that his own strength is weakness and that he is poor and blind and naked. Rather will he despair of ever being able to work his way through all the difficulties before him unless he can obtain assistance from abroad.

And when this man looked into the bible he finds that there is promised the Comforter the Spirit of truth who will guide men into all truth and teach them all things - and that this Spirit is given to those who ask him. He finds also that if any man lack wisdom he may ask it of God who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not and it shall be given him. Here then is precisely that assistance this man needs and it is the third mark of his sincerity, to place his entire dependance for understanding the doctrines of the Bible upon the teachings of the Holy Spirit. He does not indeed expect that he shall experience any supernatural irresistible impression to guide him: but he trusts that there will be a still small voice whispering to his soul – this is the way – walk thou in it. So plainly is there an enlightening as well as converting influence of the Spirit described in the Scriptures and so absolute is his need of such an influence that he can have no hesitancy in placing an unreserved dependance upon the promise of God that it will be given him.

But the doctrine of God should enlighten the human mind by a direct influence is also plain from reason alone. For if man's unaided faculties be indeed insufficient to direct his enquiries in spiritual subjects and if God be a just and merciful being he cannot withhold all needed light and direction to the sincere enquirer after truth. This man therefore in whom there is genuine sincerity will in his religious enquiries abandon every blind guide - every uncertain and imperfect source of light and look at once to the eternal unpolluted and overflowing fountain of truth even to his Father in heaven and realize that the way of man is not in himself and that it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps.

Under such a state of feeling as this what will be the next step this man of sincerity will take? Most surely he will read the scriptures with prayer. And this is a fourth and most important mark of his sincerity. Having given up all confidence in the opinions of fallible men and his own unaided discernment and being thoroughly convinced that if he ever do obtain a right understanding of the truth of the Bible it must be through the teachings of the Spirit of God there is but this only way that is by prayer in which he can hope to be guided from on high. And therefore most sincerely will he offer up the supplication of the Psalmist, Open those mine eyes that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law!

There is however such a thing as offering up this petition while the man is not praying in the Holy Ghost. These words may be repeated before God while the heart does not enter into their Spirit - nor feel the pressing need of an answer. There may still be clinging to the man some lurking sense of his own sufficiency: or perhaps he is willing to be assisted in understanding the bible provided he can have the credit of a part of the work himself. Prayers offered up with such feelings are a mere waste of breath and will rather provoke the Almighty to send down strong delusions than incline him to give light and direction. But the truly sincere man offers up no such mere lip service. It is the humble and earnest supplication of one who deeply realizes his need of Divine assistance and this prayer is not made merely once or twice: but it is presented before God when this man is reading the first chapter of Genesis - and when he is reading the second - and the third - and so on till he has reached the last of Revelations.

This man of sincerity is now reading the Scriptures in the proper and the only proper way. And he reads as for his life. For he is now searching for those truths on which are suspended his everlasting destiny. But he will not proceed far in this sincere diligent and prayerful examination before he will meet with many passages of the scripture that appear to him foolishness - that strike a deadly blow at his prejudices - and that rouse up his whole heart in opposition. Here then is the spot for discovering the last of the decided marks of his sincerity if it be genuine. It will lead him in defiance of all the opposition he feels within him to the reception and believe of every fact which he finds clearly revealed in the Bible. That bible he believes to be the words of that God who cannot lie and he also hopes that in answer to his prayers the same Spirit who dictated it is now guiding him into the right understanding of it. He is bound therefore to believe every fact clearly contained in it, however opposed to his corrupt heart - however mysterious and however mortifying. If he rejects any part of it he forfeits at once all claim to sincerity and proves himself to be guided not by the Spirit of God but by the spirit of a rebellious heart.

These my hearers are the five discriminating and we think we may add infallible marks by which genuine sincerity in religious enquiries is distinguished from false. Under the influence of this virtue in its priority we maintain that a man will give up all confidence in the scriptural expositions of man and his own powers of discernment and realize that the Holy Spirit can alone direct him aright and that he will habitually read the scriptures with prayer for his influences and receive as eternal truth every fact therein clearly revealed. And now in the conclusion let the enquiry come home individually to our hearts have we faithfully followed this course in forming our religious opinions? If the answer be that we have not then have we probably taken our religious system at second hand from fallible men or we have formed it by our own unaided erring and conceited faculties. And if that system be correct we are indebted not to our sincerity but a chance or the sovereign mercy of God. Our sincerity! If we have not followed this plain and simple course it is ostentation it is mockery to pretend to it. It is a sincerity which will not abide the scrutinizing eye of Omniscience and in the day of judgment its genuine character will be unfolded and it will then be found registered in the book of God under the name of self-conceit or hypocrisy.

Two inferences will close this discourse. And first genuine or godly sincerity is the gift of God.

My hearers, this virtue as we have described it approaches too near a religious feeling to be the natural product of a spot so barren of holiness as the human heart. So rooted in pride around every fibre of it - so dark and settled is its malignity and its hostility to heaven that we believe it would never give up all confidence in itself and humbly implore divine assistance unless there was exerted upon it an influence from heaven. Like regeneration true sincerity comes not of blood nor the will of the flesh nor the will of man but of God.

In the second place we perceive how little of the professed sincerity of the world is genuine.

Many will talk much of their sincerity who have not only not read the bible with prayer but who had formed their religious system without consulting this volume at all unless it were afterwards to discover texts for the support of their preconceived opinions. Ask them if they suppose their unaided reason to be sufficient to guide them in the examination of the Scriptures. They will reply that this is precisely the purpose for which reason was given us. Ask them if they do not feel any need of the enlightening influences of the Spirit and their answers will show that they do not believe in His existence. Ask them if they read the bible with prayer and they will be silent. Yet these men really suppose themselves to be sincere in their religious enquiries and depend upon this more than atonement of Christ for salvation. But certain it is that true sincerity will lead a man to seize upon any means in his power for attaining to a correct system of religious beliefs. The bible was in their power as through the mercy of God the influences of his Spirit were offered them and yet they have made no proper use of these only means by which correct views of religion truth are to be obtained. Their professed sincerity therefore is a mere delusion of sin and Satan to lull asleep their conscience. And when the flames of the last day shall lay bare their bosoms they will for the first time perceive that they carry within them unhumiliated unconverted hypocritical hearts.

Sermon 42 The Final Judgment a Test of Our Conduct

[Sermon No. 42, "The Final Judgment a Test of Our Conduct," II Peter 3:11-12, 1821 Jul,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 6]

II Peter 3:11–12

Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness. Looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved and the elements shall melt with fervent heat.

We are persuaded my hearers that if you do not this day have an impressive and alarming view of the final judgment fastened upon your imagination and hearts it will not be because we have not called your attention to the picture. We may fail in making it striking and abiding but we shall not fail in the frequency of our attempts. Did the call that was made in the morning to bring your opinions to the standard of that tribunal revolt any of our feelings? Then probably they will be still more revolted at this time. For we now call upon you to bring to the test of the same fiery ordeal your practice. Once more would we lift the veil that hangs between time and eternity and bid you look at that scene which will soon - how soon we know not - burst upon our astonished senses when we shall break from the prison house of the tomb and mounting amid the burnings and the thunderings of the dissolving universe shall find ourselves conducted before the everlasting throne of justice and hear the voice of Omniscience calling us to account for the deeds done in the body. O guilty man! do you not see that eye now turning full upon you which has witnessed every thought and every desire of your head and every action of your life? And do you not see that book of judgment opening wherein are registered with the pen of iron every sin you have committed small or great jubilant public or private? If you have indeed any impressive sense of all this you will not be unwilling now to take a review of your conduct with an eye fixed on this day of the final communication of all things.

And first let those of us who are of professors of religion reexamine our hearts.

Many of us it is to be feared are left to crucify the Lord afresh and wound him in the house of his friends. When first we named the name of Christ before man we came with all our faculties of body and soul and made a solemn free will offering to them to his service for time and for eternity. Then did we promise that the cause of Christ should be the first and the controlling object of life and that every other pursuit should be regulated by and be subordinate to this. So that whether we should eat or drink or whatsoever we should do we would do all to the glory of God. And now when this Redeemer is before us in all the glories of an universal judge do we feel that we have kept this covenant unbroken? Can we now meet his omniscient eye and not feel guilty? Oh, that look recalls to mind the little interest we have taken in his cause. Though we have lived in a world lying in wickedness – though the God of the world the prince of the power of the air has been increasingly active on our right hand and on our left in building upon his kingdom and though many of our friends and acquaintances perhaps even our own families have given evidence that they were his subjects and were hastening to everlasting burnings - yet many of us have witnessed all this with apparent unconcern - and have not as good soldiers of Jesus Christ neared the standard of allegiance among the rebellious. Nay so conformed have we been to this world's practices that even our nearest neighbors would never know that we were enlisted on the Lord's side did they not see us at intervals come around his table. Yes the greatest external distinction between us and the world has been the drinking of a little wine and the eating of a little bread! O tell it not in Gath - publish it not in the streets of Ashkelon lest the uncircumcised triumph.

And is this statement an exaggeration? Answer this question professor of religion with one eye fixed upon your covenant and the other fixed upon your Redeemer whom you now see face to face. Oh though art guilty my soul - guilty of breaking they vows - guilty of the blood of souls - guilty of the crucifixion of Christ.

And O backsliding Christian what if the chamber where you offer up your secret devotions were to be viewed by light of the judgment day? Oh what if after you had seen that day communing you were permitted once more to enter that chamber and make your last prayer! Would this resemble those prayers which you now daily (if indeed it be not rather weekly) put up in that place? Do you believe that you should not wrestle more earnestly then you none do for your own soul and the souls of others? Give your eye upon those miserable beings once your neighbors who are now on the left hand of judgment and whom your prayers had they been fervent and effectual might have saved from eternal woe - with your eye fixed on the distorted and agonizing countenances of these persons give an answer to this enquiry and let that answer dwell upon your mind when you this day enter that chamber of devotion.

We address next the man who neglects the instruction of those in religion whom Providence has committed to his care and guardianship. We mean the man who is the head of the family and also neglects to bring up his children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Though commanded to talk of these things of religion to his children when he lies down and when he rises up and teach them diligently yet he neglects it - and if his family were to depend upon his lips alone for religious information they would never know that there is a God and a Saviour - a soul to share to save or lose - a hell to shun and a heaven to win. With this man we are by no means going to attempt a labored argument to persuade him to adopt a different course. We merely ask him to enquire whether the reasons that now prevent him from following the scriptural direction on the subject will not fail him and appear groundless should the scene we have so often described this day prove real. Should his God and judge demand of him these reasons is he satisfied they are such as he shall then dare to give - and such as will convince the Almighty and all wise God that he has given laws to his creatures that are unreasonable?

Many men who neglect prayer when addressed on the subject give us their reasons for the omission. We will suppose such an one in the day of judgment to be enquired of by his judge in the presence of the universe why he had omitted to pray unto him in his family? Perhaps the first answer would be that he did not suppose himself a Christian - and that the prayers of the wicked are an abomination unto the Lord. Will that Judge think ye accept this apology and acknowledge himself culpable for not giving his grace to convert this man? Or perhaps he will reply that he had not confidence to pray for the presence of his household. But my hearers do you suppose that in the day of judgment he would hesitate to pray before an assembled universe if it could save him from going away into everlasting punishment?

We call next upon the person who never prays - we mean never to any purpose never in the Holy Ghost. Who lies down at night without commending himself to the care and wakes in the morning without acknowledging the protection of God - and who never felt the need of imploring the forgiveness of his maker and Redeemer. We call upon such an one look steadily at the terrors of the last day when not all the universe can prevent his being arraigned at the bar of God and say O prayerless man do you not feel as if at such a season you should call upon your God for mercy? O you may read in the Scriptures the answer that will be given to your supplication - when ye spread forth your hands I will hide my eyes from you - yea when ye make many prayers I will not hear - ye have set at naught all my counsel and would none of my reproof - therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own way and be filled with their own devices.

There are a few in persons in almost every place and (we should rejoice if there were many more of the like sincerity) who have become convinced that it is their duty to make a public profession of their faith in the Gospel, but who delay the duty month after month and year after year through a fear that their hearts are not in a proper state and that they shall eat and drink damnation to themselves. We would by no means address to such the language of severity. For this hesitancy and fearfulness evinces that sincerity which we believe does not go unrewarded and it is a more favorable mark in a new convert than a great degree of assurance. And besides we believe that every man who takes the vows of the Lord upon him should have a prevailing evidence that he is a Christian: For unto the wicked God saith what hast thou to do to declare my statutes or that thou shouldst take my covenant in thy mouth? Still however there is great danger when we look too exclusively at one of the Divine requirements that we shall overrate its comparative importance and undervalue others. Thus a man may be so fearful that he shall commit an unpardonable sin by eating and drinking the emblems of Christ's body and blood unworthily that he may forget that while he neglects this ordinance he is living in habitual violation of a command of his Redeemer too plain to be mistaken this do in remembrance of me. And he may also neglect to estimate how great is the influence of his example upon sinners who are ever ready to seize upon anything that will set at rest their consciences. And furthermore though it is not surprising that the real Christian should for a time be perplexed concerning the duty of publicly professing Christ yet if the question remains for years unsettled does it not evince an alarming indifference concerning it? And does not every month's delay render the decision more difficult? We presume that every man in such a condition will allow that he and he alone is blamable for remaining in it. And our object in bringing forward the subject in this place is to endeavor to an awakening motive to such to an immediate and more earnest attention to the solemn and interesting enquiry. Whether the grand difficulty with such an one be a fear that he is not a Christian or whether the faults of those who are already professors of religion be the stumbling block - we shall not now enquire. But we invite him for one moment to look upon the realities of the judgment day and having fixed his eye steadily upon his judge and Redeemer we want him to respect the following language of that Redeemer when on earth: Whosoever shall confess before men him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven. And whosoever shall deny me before men him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven.

We proceed to address those who violate the Sabbath. This may be done by spending the day in amusements - by needlessly neglecting the public worship of God - or the reading of the Scriptures and in their stead attending to works of a merely secular character or by idleness and sleep - or by performing unnecessary journeys or in fine in any way in which we do our own ways, find our own pleasure and speak our own words. And many of those who thus break in upon the sacredness of the Lord's day are ready to justify themselves and to plead some excuse for their apparent disregard of the Divine commandments - It was a works day they of necessity or of mercy. Very well, we hope it was - but men are very apt to stretch these terms till their true definition were it given would be self interest. We by no means however wish at this time to decide that all such apologies for the apparent violation of God's day have no foundation. But we ask all who find such apologies necessary to come up with us and take their stand before the tribunal of Christ. And now suppose that the Lord of the Sabbath were to demand of this man the reason why he neglected public worship on such a Sabbath - or of that man why he spent the day in laying plans of worldly business - or a third why he visited his neighbor instead of his closet - or of a fourth why he journeyed on such a Lord's day - or of a fifth why he strolled about the fields? And now suppose that before these men should proceed with their apologies the same voice that once issued from the thunderings and lightnings of Sinai should now repeat from the midst of the tribunal of God - remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work: but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates: for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth and all that in them is and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it. Now without condemning this man we would merely ask whether some of them after this solemn declaration would not hesitate to present their excuses and become sensible they were guilty? We leave it to their consciences to answer.

Shall we now address those who are careless and unconcerned about the state of their souls and bid them look to the great day of accounts and view themselves on the left hand of the judge guilty and self condemned? Already have they been called to look at the scene of a voice more powerful than mine by the voice of prophets, apostles, Christ and God - As I live saith the Lord God I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked but that the wicked turn from his way and live: turn ye turn ye from your evil ways: for why will ye die I O house of Israel? And an apostle saith unto such - awake thou that sleepest and arise from the dead and Christ shall give thee light. And who ever read it can forget that impressive and solemn description the Lord Jesus has given of the judgment day of the fate of the impenitent? If then the careless sinner is not alarmed at the call of God and Christ and inspired men can we hope to awaken him with our feeble voice? O he is fastened in the slumbers of Spiritual death and we leave him to sleep on now and take his rest - assured that he cannot resist the shout of the archangel and the trump of God.

But there is a probability that we shall be able to arrest the attention of the next description of men whom we address. These are such as have given to the acquisition of the world the undivided empire of their hearts. They are those who have joined field to field and house to house till there is no place and they are left alone in the earth. Any thing then that relates to their possessions will arouse their attention. And we are going to communicate to them an important fact concerning their silver and gold their houses and lands. We do not ask them to look at the judgment seat of Christ but let them gaze on a burning and a dissolving world. And where now are their treasures? Where those dear possessions they have so often gazed upon with the delight? Alas they are mingling in the common ruin. And when now shall they turn their eyes. Oh the tribunal of God is the only object in the Universe save the world in flames. And what if in that hour when they are compelled to abandon the world on which they have doted and relied, what if the words of Christ should rear to their minds, it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. Oh this sentence would fall upon their ears with a deafening emphasis!

We might proceed to call upon these men who are openly corrupt to direct their eyes for a moment to the tremendous realities of the day of God. We might say to the profane sinner - look up now to that almighty jealous God on his throne of judgment whom you have so often blasphemed look steadily upon him and then then vent forth those oaths and curses to which your tongue has become familiar! Why is it that you hide your head? Why is your soul smitten with horror? The eye of that God is no more turned upon you now than at any period of your life.

Or we might address the impenitent man in the language of the prophet, Awake ye drunkard and weep and howl all ye drinkers of wine because of the new wine for it is cut off from your mouth. We might challenge him to hold the intoxicating cup in his hand and at the same time look full upon the realities of judgment. And so might we call upon a host of characters who work wickedness greedily. But we should call in vain like the deaf adder they would stop their ears. We leave them then to fill up the measure of their iniquity. Yes we leave them in the hands of an angry God.

And now in concluding this subject it is natural to enquire what will be the effect of the effort that has been made this day to bring our opinions and practices to the ordeal of the judgment day. And we are constrained to say that probably the impression of the solemn scene of the judgment will be offered from our hearts ere another morning sun shall enlighten us and that whatever erroneous opinions we have espoused and corrupt practices we have followed we shall still retain them - and follow on the same beaten track from which the terrors of the Lord cannot turn us. I have reason to fear that such will be the effect or rather the failure of effect of these sermons on my own part and do you imagine my hearers that it will be different upon your own? O then if this subject does not awaken us what is there under heaven that can?

Did I say that these discourses have been read in vain? No - feeble and imperfect as they are they will have one effect - they will harden our hearts. They will render our conscience more invulnerable than ever. They will weaken the strings of God's Spirit and render it more difficult to awaken us hereafter. And though they may be forgotten on earth they will be remembered in the day of judgment.

Sermon 43 General View of the Gospel

[Sermon No. 43, "General View of the Gospel," John 18:38, 1821 Mar,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 7]

John 18:38

What is truth?

[Interesting comments on total depravity, page 4, and of Calvinism near end.]

You will some of you recollect my brethren that I preached a sermon some time since containing a general view of what I consider to be the system of religious truth found in the bible. The unfavorableness of the weather caused the meeting at that time to be thinly attended and it has been repeatedly suggested to me by individuals since that time that a repetition of the sermon would not be unacceptable. If ever it be proper to preach it again the present is the most proper period and I have concluded this morning to give it hoping that it may not prove wholly uninteresting.

Our faculties are so limited and the system of natural and revealed religion is so vast involving so many particulars and dependant upon so many arguments for its establishment that it is in general most profitable to confine our attention in a single sermon to a single link of the chain. Yet that we may not lose sight of the relation of one religious truth to another and that we may determine whether our opinions harmonize with one another or are contradictory, it is well also on some occasions to take a general view of religious truth and to recall to mind the leading arguments by which the great fundamental doctrines of faith are supported. And in considering the words of our text such is our object at this time. We have endeavoured to show you this morning that preparation of heart necessary for understanding the Scriptures aright - and now we mean to hold up before you that system of religious belief which in our opinion a man of genuine sincerity reading the bible in the manner we have described will find in it. We mean that he will embrace the great leading truths we are about to exhibit: not perhaps every article for we are not disposed to say that all of them are essential to salvation. For there are strict obstructions and difficulties in religious enquiries as well as moral and metaphysical and men may have different views of them and various modes of reconciling them while they coincide in those deep laid and eternal principles which are interwoven with the very texture of the Bible and concerning which the wayfaring man though a fool need not err.

We would be by no means be thought to be advocating that dangerous and cold hearted scepticism which under the terms abstrusity and speculation include the very essence of the Christian system - and which represents it as a matter of little importance what are a man's particular sentiments in religion. But though we do most sincerely remonstrate against such a principle yet we would not therefore rush into the other extreme and maintain that real Christians perfectly council in every opinion - because this is contrary to the experience of a world.

But from this digression we return to consider the question of Pilate What is truth? Christ did not then condescend to give an answer to so important an enquiry. But we have it in his word - to which we shall do well to take heed.

And the first grand foundation doctrine of the Bible and reason is the existence of one only God. The Scriptures assert his existence and refer us for proof to his works. That proof is overwhelming and indisputable. And from chance too we learn that the natural attributes of God are Eternity, Immutability, Omnipresence, Omnipotence, Omniscience, and Independence and that His moral attributes are Benevolence, Justice, Truth, Mercy, and Wisdom.

The next article of religious belief is that this God exercises a moral government over all the worlds and creatures he has made.

And the first thing implied in this government is that it extends to every action and event. This is clearly manifest from the declarations of Scripture, He doeth according to his will in the the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth. Not a sparrow falls to the ground without his notice and the very hairs of your head are all numbered.

The next thing implied in a moral government is that the accountable rational subjects of it are free agents. By this is meant that they possess either naturally or by communication those powers that render them capable of obeying or disobeying the command of God. Without such a power certainly no being could be accountable for his conduct. And we know of no description of persons who have formally denied that men are free agents.

The third thing implied in God's moral government is that he rules as a sovereign. By this is not meant that he governs arbitrarily, capriciously and without reason. But simply that he orders all things according to the counsel of his own will. In other words that he directs all beings and events in conformity to one fixed plan and so as to produce a certain end. This constituent of his government is what is usually termed the doctrine of God's decrees. * See def next page

And the views which in our apprehension are taught by reason and scripture on this subject are embraced in the following propositions:

1. God decrees independantly and irresistibly and gives no reason for his conduct any further than he pleases.

* Def. The decrees of God are that eternal and unchangeable choice or purpose by which all things are brought into being.

2. All his decrees are for founded on the best reasons and intended to promote his own glory and the best good of the creature.

3. Foreknowledge and determination or decree exist simultaneously in the Divine Mind and one cannot be said to proceed and follow the other in the order of time.

4. All beings and events exist in exact accordance with the purpose or decrees of God. In other words God hath foreordained whatsoever comes to pass.

5. This doctrine of the craze is not to be understood in such a sense that it shall make God the efficient author of sin - nor infringe the least upon the free agency of man; nor discourage human efforts.

This view of the most difficult subject of God's decrees is essentially that given by the late Dr. Dwight. And with him do we agree that, if the doctrine is true if it is a doctrine revealed in the Scriptures; it cannot fail to be a proper subject of thought conversation and preaching. With him also do we coincide in the opinion that, perhaps it is unnecessary and would not be useful to make it a subject of very frequent discussion in the pulpit.

And we also believe that some language has been used on the subject and some views taken of it that are unwarranted by scripture and whose tendency has been to perplex and irritate rather than convince. Thus God's decrees are said to be general and special – the special decrees being those that relate to the acceptance or rejection of mankind and the general decrees such as respect other things. Now we cannot see any ground for such a distinction. We see no difference in the decrees of God except that one respects this object and another that - that is the conversion and salvation of a man is decreed in just the same sense and manner as the fall of a sparrow or the descent of rain. (See Dwight's System of Theology Vol. 2)

Again God is said to will or decree because he wills. We object to this language because men are too apt to conclude from it that such a decree is arbitrary and tyrannical.

Further God is sometimes said to have elected a certain number to everlasting life without any foresight or faith and good works. Is God then omniscient and yet ignorant of the good works of the elect?

But we hasten to a third important doctrine of revelation – one indeed that in our opinion lies at the very foundation of the Gospel plan of salvation. We mean the doctrine of human depravity. The Bible represents the fall of our first parents as that fatal event by which the barriers between Earth and hell were broken down and the poison of sin was introduced into the veins of our first father to mingle with the heart's blood of his posterity. By one man sin entered into the world and death by sin and so death passed upon all men for that all have sinned. The threatened penalty was this In the day man eatest thereof thou shalt surely die. Oh the infatuation of the woman!

*Forth reach to the fruit
She plucked she ate, Earth felt the wound
And nature from her seat, sighing through all her works
Gave signs of woe that all was lost.*

[Source: Milton's Paradise Lost]

All would indeed be lost forever had it not been possessed that, the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head. And as it is we have all lost much. We have lost the image of God. We come into the world without any love of him or any tendency to love him. Nay more with dispositions that are opposite to his will. We go astray as soon as we be born - in the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil.

The doctrine of human depravity as we understand it is this - that in consequence of Adam's Sin we derive from him a corrupt nature - that is a nature in which there is no holiness nor even a seed of holiness - but one which inclines us universally to break the commandments of God as soon as we are capable of moral action - a nature indeed so alienated from God that it never will love him unless there be an influence exerted upon it from heaven.

We do not however mean by this view of the subject that we are guilty of Adams sin or that we shall be punished for his sin. For we are taught in the Scriptures that, the son shall not bear the iniquity of the father. We are guilty only for indulging that corrupt nature derived from him and for our own sins shall we be punished: because God sets before us sufficient motives and promises of assistance to enable us to overcome our natural propensities. If then we indulge them we are without excuse and can cast no blame upon Adam or upon God.

Neither do we mean that man is depraved to the full extent of his powers. For then all would be equally bad. And we are ready to allow that some natural characteristics in man such as hunger thirst fear of suffering and desire of happiness are innocent and that others such as natural affections compassion generosity modesty and natural conscience are amiable. Being possessed of these men are capable of performing many kind and benevolent deeds to their fellow men that are praiseworthy in relation to this world may be styled good. But these things we contend no more prove holiness in men than do the same qualities and actions in the brute creation. Notwithstanding these man may be an enemy of God - dead in trespasses and sins and by nature a child of wrath. These epithets derive from the word of God we do most fearlessly applied to him who is unconverted. And so in our own feelings we have no objections to the term total depravity: but as this is not found in the Bible and sometimes conveys more to the mind than is intended we think it best to use it if at all but sparingly and reservedly.

If then men be this naturally and incorrigibly alienated from God if we involuntarily enquire in what way he can be reconciled? And Paul gives us the answer that, we are saved by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost. There our attention is directed to the agent and his operation. And first who is the Holy Ghost?

We reply that he is God. And Peter said unto Ananias why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie unto the Holy Ghost - thou hast not lied unto man but unto God. Yet between God the father and the eternal Spirit there is a distinction not only nominal but real. Baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost.

In the second place in what does regeneration consist? We have seen that man by sin has lost the image of God that is he is void of holiness and of all relish for it. Regeneration then consists in restoring this image of the soul and in giving man relish for spiritual objects. And have put on the new man says Paul which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him.

This renovation of the sinner is termed in Scripture, being born again - becoming a new creature - passing from death unto life, and it is described as absolutely essential to salvation. Except a man be born of water and the Spirit he cannot drink he entered into the Kingdom of heaven. This same passage shows us also that the Spirit is the agent.

But here an interesting enquiry may be started. If man be naturally so depraved that nothing but the special influences of the Spirit can turn the current of his affections to love God, how can anyone from whom those influences are withheld be punishable for not doing that which is beyond his power? It is usual in this country to answer this question by saying that the sinner labors under no natural inability of becoming holy - that is he is not in the condition of a man who is commanded to walk without limbs: but his inability is a moral inability - in other words it consists wholly in the want of a disposition. And that he has all those natural powers that are necessary to enable him to serve and love his maker and Redeemer - and for the want of a disposition he is culpable. I did not say that this distinction between moral and natural inability furnishes no answer to this enquiry. But to say the least it is a metaphysical answer and whether it be in reality satisfactory or not we believe that common minds are rather puzzled than satisfied with that. That man's inability to love God is merely moral that is merely the want of a disposition I readily grant: but when it is added that this disinclination is natural derived from Adam and that no man ever by his own strength overcomes it I feel in doubt whether it does not amount to the same thing as a natural inability - and therefore sense as some excuse for the sinner. Now in my apprehension it is the first importance that the impenitent man be made forcibly to feel that he is entirely and infinitely to be blamed for not loving God and therefore with my present views in addressing sinners I should in the first place show them as above that their inability is merely the want of a disposition and in the second place endeavor to prove the bible in conformity with the opinion of Baxter, Doddridge, Watts, Chalmers, Cooper and others that the Spirit of God had been striving with them during most of their lives and that if they had not resisted his influence they would have been converted.

And that Christ is now standing at the door of their hearts and knocking for admittance and that if they will but open the door he will come into them and be found in them the hope of glory. I have not inclined to this opinion because the distinguished men just named have adopted it: for I am sensible that others equally great have rejected it: but because I thought it was taught in the bible long before I knew what were the the sentiments of others. But whatever be the truth in regard to this point most firmly do I maintain that man and he alone is chargeable with the whole blame in not loving his maker and that his regeneration which is absolutely essential to salvation from beginning to end from the first conviction to the moment when the new heart is given is entirely the work of the Spirit.

But does the act of regeneration alone secure the pardon of sin and a title to heaven? Let the Apostle answer – We are justified freely by grace through the redemption there is in Christ Jesus. In this sentence we have the essence of the Gospel. And we inquire first who is Christ Jesus? This same Apostle replies - that he is overall over all God blessed forever. And unless we reject a great number of scriptures that are plain and explicit we must believe that, He is the true God and eternal life. But we read also of the man Christ Jesus and this also must we believe or throw aside much of the bible - and the necessity of Christ's being God and man will appear.

Secondly from the fact that he came into this world to make an atonement for the sins of men. Had he been a creature all his services would have been dear to God as his subject: and if he had not been man he could not have been touched with the feeling of our infirmities. Only as God and man was he capable of making a propitiation for the sins of the whole world - and of redeeming us from the curse of the law being made a curse for us. This has he done and one of the first acts of the regenerated heart is to exercise faith in his blood. And this leads us to state

Thirdly that the sinner is justified in the sight of God by his faith alone. The moment he exercises this looking to the righteousness of Christ as his only hope his sins are forgiven given - he is adopted into the family of God – the sanctifying influences of the Spirit are vouchsafed to him and he becomes, an heir to an inheritance incorruptible undefiled and unfailing. This is the doctrine so often and so ably argued by Paul particularly in Romans and Galatians - where he frequently draws this inference - Therefore a man is justified by faith without works of love.

But is it certain that the man who once exercises his faith and is regenerated will persevere to the end of life in a justified state? In other words has God promised that no one shall ever fall from a state of grace? This is a question concerning which there has been much and bitter contention. We do not however feel disposed to attach so much importance to this subject as many have done. And for this plain reason - it is not a point that has much bearing upon Christian practice. We know of but one practical use to which the doctrine of the Saints perseverance can be applied - and that is to comfort the feeble-minded who are real believers. And even with such their distress generally originates in a doubt whether they were ever converted. Besides those who believe this doctrine and those who do not agree in this that men never will persevere unless they use the means appointed by God and that therefore it is the duty of every preacher of the Gospel to address Christians as the Apostles have done as if they were every moment in danger of losing the favor of God as to warn him, he thinketh he standeth to take heed lest he fall, and furthermore we presume that every believer in this doctrine will acknowledge that the Bible is not so full and clear on this subject as concerning some others and that some texts seem rather opposed to it. Still however after comparing scripture with scripture I am prepared to express my conviction that the doctrine is true, being confident with the Apostle of this very thing that He which hath begun a good work in Christians will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ.

We have now followed the believer to the close of life. And it is another important point of religious belief that after death cometh the judgment. In that Day will the dispensations of God to this world be finally closed when he Shall separate the righteous from the wicked as a shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats and shall say to those on his right hand come ye being of my Father inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. And also to those on the left hand depart ye into everlasting fire. And these shall go away into endless and everlasting punishment but the righteous into life eternal.

Does my hearers have we given an outline of that grand system of religious truth contained in the Bible. We know indeed that many systems very different from this have been professedly derived from the same source. What evidence then have I that I do not with a multitude believe a lie? There is no proof to the contrary but the sincere and decided convictions of my own heart. And though it may perhaps be thought somewhat Pharisaical yet I can hardly avoid stating that as far as I know myself the religious truth that have been just held before you were derived from the Bible in the manner that was exhibited to you in the former part of this day. This manner you will recollect consisted in giving up all confidence in the scriptural expositions of men of every name and nation and also in one's own unaided powers of discernment and in relying on the teachings of the Holy Spirit - and in reading the Scriptures with prayer and in receiving every fact clearly revealed. Perhaps however after all my sincerity was not genuine and I was given up to strong delusions. God only knoweth: and if such be the fact may He have mercy upon me and open my eyes before they sleep the sleep of death.

But which among the doctrines at this time exhibited are absolutely essential to salvation and without a belief of which no man will ever obtain it? Perhaps there is not a more difficult enquiry in theology. And indeed probably no answer can be given that will apply to every individual case: because the articles of belief will be more or less numerous according according to the degree of light enjoyed. But when men enjoy the unclouded light of the Gospel and its ordinances cannot every article of that system of doctrines which is absolutely essential to their salvation be marked out? We reply that where men have an opportunity to read and understand the bible they are bound to embrace every doctrine therein contained and have no promise of salvation without it. But you will reply that this does not answer the question proposed: because in explaining the language of the scriptures men differ radically and essentially. Now which of these exclamations shall we adopt? We have already shown you what is in our opinion the proper course to be pursued in order rightly to understand the Scriptures and have also exhibited the doctrines which we believe to be contained in them. But how widely men may differ in their sentiment and yet be Christians - to what extent the heart may be right while the head is wrong - and how great allowances are to be made for the influence of education. These points the bible does not determine and we dare not attempt their decision. If called to act on any particular case we can and ought to decide whether we can hold communication with a man who denies this or that doctrine of the Gospel. But it is one thing to withdraw from the fellowship of a man and quite a different thing to decide that such an one cannot be a Christian. To judge the heart is the prerogative of God only - There is one lawgiver who is able to save and to destroy. Who art thou that judgeth another?

Still however do we believe that there are certain grand essentials of religion in which good Christians of all ages have in reality if not in so many words agreed. Many attempts have been made to mark out these essentials. And we shall now present you with the opinions of two very eminent servants of God on the subject in their own words leaving it to you your own feelings to judge of their correctness. The first is an extract from the writings of the Reverend John Newton

I set no value upon any doctrinal truth says he farther than it has a tendency to promote practical godliness. If others should think those things hindrances which I judge to be helps in this respect I am content they should go on in their own way according to the light God has given them, provided only they will agree with me and εν τω επαναγνεις [by our repentance]. If it should be asked which are necessary things I answer those in which the Spiritual worshippers of all ages and countries have been agreed. Those on the contrary are men subordinate matters in which the best men those who have been most eminent for faith prayers and humility and nearness to God always have been and still are divided in their judgments. Upon this plan I should think it no hard matter to draw up a form of sound words (whether dignified with the name of creed or no I care not) to which true believers of all sorts and wood unanimously subscribe. Suppose it ran something in the following manner: I believe that sin is the most hateful thing in the world that I and all men are by nature in a state of wrath and depravity utterly unable to sustain the penalty or to fulfill the commands of God's holy law and that we have no sufficiency of ourselves to think a good thought. I believe that Jesus Christ is the chief among ten thousands: that he came into the world to save the chief of sinners by making a propitiation for sin by his death by paying a perfect obedience to the law in our behalf and that he is now exalted on high to give repentance and remission of sins to all that believe and that he ever liveth to make intercession for us. I believe that the Holy Spirit (the gift of God through Jesus Christ) is the son and only guide into all truth and the common privilege of all believers and under his influence I believe the holy Scriptures are able to make us wise unto salvation and to punish us thoroughly for every good work. I believe that love to God and to man for God's sake is the essence of religion and the fulfilling of the law: that without holiness no man shall be the Lord: that those who by a patient course in well doing seek glory honor and immortality shall receive eternal life: and I believe that this second is not of death but of grace ever to the praise and glory of that grace whereby he has made us accepted in the Beloved. Amen. (Newton's Works, vol. 2, page 233)

The other extract is from the writings of Dr. Thomas Scott. Having spoken of the Lutheran Helvetian Gallick Scotch and Belgick confessions of faith he thus adds Numbers in these kingdoms (Great Britain) classed in general among the Calvinists almost exactly in these respects answer the description above given of the Lutherans etc. The foundation of their religion is laid un humiliation as fallen sinners: this prepares them for receiving the gospel: they agree with their more Calvinistick brethren in almost every thing except election and final perseverance concerning which many of them are rather negative than positive opponents: and we feel no repugnance to associate with them as our beloved fellow Christians: which we cannot do with those who approximate to Pelagianism; and who favor the opinion of salvation in any way except by the living faith in Christ and by the regeneration and sanctification of the Holy Spirit. (Reply to Tomline, vol. 2, p. 501)

We shall close this discourse with this one inference – The gospel plan of salvation is purely a system of grace.

This whole system is described by Paul in a single sentence. And a more grand and comprehensive sentence we know not in human language. Standing on the isthmus of this world and having the secret counsels of the eternal mind laid open to view the apostle by one vigorous stretch of intellect traces out the chains of the Divine dispensations through that eternity which is past and that eternity to come. Whom he did foreknow them he did predestinate and whom he did predestinate them he also called them he also justified and whom he justified them he also glorified.

Here do we perceive the whole works of man's salvation to flow from unmerited grace. This first moved God to determine from eternity that some should be saved. This awakened his sword against the man that was his fellow. This sent down the special influences of the Holy Spirit to call the sinner from among the spiritually dead. This applied to his pollutions the blood of Christ and declared him justified through his righteousness and this will hereafter add joy to joy and glory to glory through eternity.

And do we indeed see the beauty and the grandeur of the Christian system and admire it? And is this administration merely intellectual? Or are we delighted with the plan of salvation because we hope to be made partakers of it? Oh if we stop short of an actual conformity of heart and life to this system in vain do we assent to the doctrines of the cross - in vain do we gaze on their grandeur and harmony – We have neither part nor lot in the matter and it will be our aggravated misery to behold and wonder and perish!

Sermon 48 Motives to Reconciliation with God

[Sermon No. 48, "Motives to Reconciliation With God," II Corinthians 5:20, 1821 Mar, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 7]

II Corinthians 5:20

Now then we are ambassadors for Christ as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God.

But there is no quarrel between me and God. I have never disbelieved his existence nor his attributes nor disputed his right to govern the universe he has made and upholds. Nay nor I believe in the scriptures this God has given us and have been instructed in them from my earliest years. And I receive as truth that, God gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him might not perish but have eternal everlasting life. God - He is my father and is doing everything for my best good. I must be a monster of gratitude then to fight against him. But this language be reconciled to God implies that I am at enmity with him. So far from this that I feel as sacred reverence in contemplating his character and I am filled with admiration when looking at the magnitude symmetry and harmony of his works. Instead of hating this God how is it possible to avoid loving him - and indeed I always have had a love for his characters since I became acquainted with it. I am sensible indeed that I sometimes abuse the blessings he has bestowed upon me. But he has given me my appetites and passions and will not be excessively strict and punishing any little excesses to which they may drive us. And these excesses do not by any means proven an enmity against God: For in indulging them I never once thought of opposing him - nay at such times perhaps the idea of God does not enter my mind. And it is most absurd to say that a man is fighting a battle when he does not even think of his enemy.

This my hearers is the language of the natural heart when it is caviling against the Scriptures. And if any one find such feelings rising within him on reading our text he may rest assured that he is the person to whom the Apostle speaks. The fact that God calls upon men to be reconciled to him implies as every one will acknowledge that there is a warfare between Him and them. Some we would hope indeed have listened to the overtures of reconciliation that have been made to them and are at peace with their maker. But we pass no hard judgment when we say that the great majority in every land still maintain a resolute and bitter contest with the God that made them. And most of these as resolutely deny the existence of any such controversy. We shall therefore in the first place present some of the arguments by which this fact, which is implied in the text, is made out - and secondly present some motives for becoming reconciled unto God.

Let it however be premised that we shall not convince an individual of the hostility of his heart to God's nor persuade one to make his peace with God unless the Spirit render and our word impressive and effectual.

We are first to show that the heart of man by nature is in a state of enmity against God. By this we do not mean that there is at all times a perceptible contrast between the heart of man and his Maker. The inhabitants of the different countries may be the most bitter enemies to each other and yet while both parties remain at home no battle will be fought. But whenever they meet there will be a collision. So it is in the case of man. By his enmity against God we mean that the bent of his inclination is directly opposite to God's will – God's will chooses one thing and man's inclination another. Now it is obvious that if God's will be kept out of sight and man be left to follow his chosen way he will not perceive the opposition and hence conclude there is none. But if God manifests himself to the sinner - if he stands in his path as did once his Angel before Balaam with a drawn sword - then will there be a visible conflict. And such a manifestation of God's will is made to man whenever his conscience is made to see the extent the inflexible demands and the purity of his law. Then will he muster up all his energies and strive with his Maker.

The first proof of the natural enmity of man's heart to God is the direct assertions of Scripture. We thus quote from the first part of the second chapter of Ephesians, But now in Christ Jesus, ye who sometimes were afar off are made nigh by the blood of Christ. For he is our peace who hath made both one (that is both Jews and Gentiles) and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us; having abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances; for to make in himself of twain one new man, so making peace (that is between Jews and Gentiles) and that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby. Here it seems was an enmity not only between Jews and Gentiles but also between them both and God and to slay this enmity Christ died.

We have already stated that the text supposes a natural enmity in the heart of God. In the context it is said God is in Christ reconciling the world unto himself not imputing their trespasses onto them. Here we perceive the Apostle makes no exception: but in the term world includes all mankind. And so in his Epistle to the Colossians he says, And you that were sometimes alienated and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled. Not an individual in that church is freed from the heavy charge of being once an enemy of God. And if as some assert this phrase enemy of God was applied by Paul only to those who were formerly given up to the grossest abominations and not to those who were morally amiable - if this be correct is it not a little strange that in the whole Colossians Church and also in the Corinthian and Ephesian churches to whom Paul addresses the same indiscriminate language - among all these is it not singular that every member that had formerly been notoriously corrupt - while among the moral and amiable not one became a Christian?

In the Epistle of James we have this assertion: Whosoever will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God. Now is it not a notorious fact that every man does by nature love the world and is therefore its friend? Did you ever hear of one who found it contrary to his natural inclination to indulge in the pleasures of the world or to except of its possessions or its honors? Do not all men on the contrary through a natural impulse pursue these things ardently?

Paul in his Epistle to the Romans says, The carnal mind is enmity against God - is not subject to his law neither indeed can be. In other words, the fleshly mind is enmity against God. Some cavil concerning this most decided passage and say that by the term flesh the Apostle does not include the whole man but merely the animal nature. In the fifth chapter of Galatians the same Apostle puts down the works of the flesh among which are adultery, fornication, murders, and lasciviousness. Now in the seventh chapter of Mark Christ says, For from within out of the heart proceed adulteries fornications, murders, lasciviousness. Paul then includes the heart in the term flesh or else we must suppose Christ to be mistaken.

We shall close this argument from the assertion of scriptures on this point (though numberless passages might be given) by the words of Christ to his disciples, If the world hate you you know that it hated me before it hated you – He that hateth me, hateth my Father also.

The second argument in support of the position that man naturally is in a state of enmity with God is derived from the fact that while regenerate he does not perform what God requires of him.

The first great commandment given to men is that, they love the Lord their God with all their hearts and mind and strength. Without such a love no man will pretend that he acts conformably to God's will. And that unregenerate men have it not is evident from the following considerations.

Supreme love to God will lead a man to seek communion with him by prayer. This is the only method in which flesh and blood can have any intercourse with that Being who is an eternal Spirit. Now whatever object a man ardently loves whether it be houses or lands or wife or children - the presence of that object will be sought after and enjoyed. Therefore if he loves God above everything besides he will delightfully and habitually pray unto Him in public in the family and above all in his closet. And besides prayer is repeatedly commanded by God. He will be enquired of - he will be wrestled with - he will be prayed unto without ceasing; and here is an additional motive to bring the man who loves Him before his mercy seat. But it is a well known fact that unregenerate men do not thus habitually and fervently pray to God. Their own consciences tell them that they do not go into their closets and pray unto their Father who seeth in secret unless in times of danger and distress and they know also that they feel an aversion to the practice. Is not this then a decisive evidence that they do not love God?

Another natural effect of supreme love to God is repentance. We have a friend whom we sincerely and ardently love: but in a fit of anger we have cruelly wounded his feelings and injured his reputation. At length we perceive our error and what man is there whose heart is not harder than the very adamant who will not weep over his ingratitude and cruelty? Now every man will acknowledge that he has committed many sins against his Father and Friend in heaven and that he has been in some things ungrateful towards Him whose tender mercies have been over him all his life. How then can he refrain from smiting upon his breast and saying I have sinned - What shall I do unto thee O thou preserver of men? Yet the majority of men have no such feelings as these. They are not sensible that they have injured God so deeply as to require this repentance: but on the other hand conceive that they have done nearly as well as they could. What does this insensibility prove? Most surely it proves that these persons do not supremely love God.

A third material effect of supreme love to God is that, whether we eat or drink whatsoever we do we should do all to his glory. This principle again may be partially illustrated by the case of an earthly friendship. If a friend be very dear to us we feel tender of his reputation and shall refrain from everything that would injure it and be willing to do much to promote it especially if thereby we advance our own interest. And these same feelings may be transferred to God. In promoting his glory man promotes his own happiness and in dishonoring him he injures his own peace. If then his affections be supremely fixed on God the man will be continually enquiring of himself whether his actions be for God's glory. In whatever enterprise he is about to engage he will first enquire whether it will promote God's glory. If it will not he will abandon it. In short he will endeavor to glorify God in his body and in his Spirit. And in doing this he is merely following the example set him by the whole creation every part of which contributes to display the glory of its Creator.

But we venture to affirm that unregenerate men do not act upon this principle at all. They do not when engaging in business have any reference to God's glory - but to their own convenience and interest. We ask such men to look back upon their lives and see if amid their many enterprises for the acquisition of the world they have ever in a single instance paused at its commencement and enquired whether that pursuit would be for the glory of God. O I read in that fallen countenance the answer conscience gives to this enquiry. And indeed it is a most solemnly yet certain truth that if you have not acted on this Apostolic principle you have not love God.

We think these three considerations establish the fact that unregenerate men do not love God - supremely. When they know their Lord and Master's will they are not careful to perform it. They disregard the most solemn the most pressing commands of their rightful Sovereign. And now let me ask what stronger evidence can be given that they have rebelled against his government - that their inclinations are opposite to his will and that therefore they are in a state of enmity to him?

We shall just mention a third argument to prove the natural enmity of the heart to God. It is derived from the fact that Christians readily acknowledge such an enmity while those who give no evidence of piety resolutely deny it.

It is acknowledged on all hands that real believers are the friends of God. They are possessed of certain feelings that give evidence of this. Now it would seem a very easy matter for such men to determine whether they possess these feelings all their lives or whether they were once the reverse. While on the other hand the unregenerate do not as we have shown under our second argument possess these evidences of their love to God. They have no such feelings - they cannot form any idea of them and therefore will be disposed to doubt their existence. And hence will they form a more favorable opinion of their hearts than Christians do of their own - because they are ignorant of them. Now is Now is not a fact that those believers of every age of the world who have been most eminent for piety and humility have most firmly believed that they were once enemies of God and that the cross of Christ alone could subdue that enmity. And is it not also the fact that those who have made no pretensions to personal religion from the most amiable and moral to the most notoriously corrupt have almost uniformly opposed the doctrine with violence? The fact is most true and most striking.

The reality of a settled enmity of the heart of man by nature to God is then most unquestionably established. Man is at war with his Maker and Redeemer. Yet this God who might by a single blast of his mouth sweep his foes and of annihilation condescends to beseech them to give over the content to submit to his easy terms and be reconciled to him. And we shall now proceed to present some motives to sinners to comply with these proposals and to terminate the unequal and shameful contest between their hearts and their God.

And the first motive is that the terms God offers are easy and reasonable

When there has been a contest between two nations the conquering party often and very reasonably reasonably demand as a condition of peace that their antagonist shall make them amends for the mischief they have caused. But widely different is the requirement of God from man. Man has indeed in the contest brought misery and ruin upon one of the noblest works of God, the immortal soul - and he has made an effort to rob God of his glory and rightful authority - and he has set a most pernicious example to the Universe and leagued himself with the roaring lion - the eternal enemy of God. Most righteously then is an atonement due from man to his God. But this Being who is infinite in condescension and mercy makes no such demand but has himself provided the atonement by sending his Eternal Son to suffer and die. And all that is required of man is to believe in him. He that believes on the Son hath everlasting life.

Again it is often demanded of one nation by another that some pledge be given to ensure sincerity and good will. But God dispenses with the requirement and offers his Holy Spirit to produce in man a love to his character and to seal the believer unto the day of redemption.

Thus does God in his overtures to rebellious man take upon himself to perform the hardest conditions of reconciliation and all that he demands of man may be summed up in one short sentence, repent and believe in the Lord Jesus Christ.

But is it enough to say that these conditions are easy and reasonable? Are they not glorious? They do not offer merely a reconciliation to the favour of God but the everlasting enjoyment of him. He who accepts them obtains thereby an heirship to an inheritance incompatible undefined and unfeeling.

The second motive that urges sinners to an immediate reconciliation with God is that the present is the most favorable time.

It is certain that God will never offer any easier terms. God is not man that he should lie neither the Son of Man that he should repent. Hath he said and shall he not do it? Or hath he spoken and shall he not make it good? This God has declared that he that believeth not the Son shall not see life: but the wrath of God abideth on him. Behold now is the accepted time: behold now is the day of salvation. Heaven earth shall pass away: but his word shall not pass away. It is then madness the enemy of God to cherish the faintest hope that he will ever alter one jot or tittle those conditions contained in his Word. He has already conceded every thing consistent with his attributes and having once promulgated the articles of reconciliation they will remain as unchangeable as the dawn of the Medes and Persians.

But there is another more alarming consideration. The man who is God's enemy today if unreconciled will be more his enemy tomorrow. It is the case with every natural feeling that if not checked it will become stronger with age. The more rooted the love of sin in the heart the more opposed will be that heart to God's will. And we know that sin becomes stronger and stronger in every unregenerate heart with every new day. So that the man who has resisted the strivings of God's Spirit this year will resist a more powerful influence the next if it be upon him. He who finds the terms of reconciliation with God unpleasant this week will find them more disgusting the next. And thus is it evident that every hour's delay will widen the already fearful breach between him and God and render his reconciliation more arduous and uncertain.

We urge the enemy of God in the third place to an immediate reconciliation because the time granted him for effecting this work is short.

When a truce is agreed upon between two armies and the one proposes terms of peace to the other a certain time is given them for taking the articles into consideration. And so God has granted to man a day of grace. With all men this term is ended with life - with some it terminates sooner. Life however is uncertain in the extreme and no man can say that he shall have another hour for making his peace with God. The period then which God gives to men for determining whether they are will submit to his terms of reconciliation does not extend beyond the present moment. That is there is no promise no security that the next moment may not be too late. God may withdraw the strivings of his Spirit or he may cut the thread of life. Every promise of mercy in the Bible to the impenitent is confined to the passing day. Not one reaches to the morrow. How dreadfully uncertain man is it whether the enemy of God if he neglect the present moment ever have an opportunity of being restored to the favor of his Creator. Unknown to him the inexorable sentence may even now be passed. Let him alone - he is joined to his idols – thou fool this night thy soul shall be required of thee.

The last motive urging the enemy of God to an immediate reconciliation with him is that this God will certainly be ultimately and everlastingly conqueror.

The history of the world has exhibited many examples when, one has chased a thousand and two put ten thousand to flight. And many a Goliath is has fallen beneath the sword of a David. But what a picture have we before us when we contemplate man striving with his Maker! Many a creature of yesterday - consumed before the moth - not able to protect his life against the slightest accident - and whose strength is weakness - this mushroom being O the infatuation of men! This being presumes to sear the standard of rebellion against heaven and to stand out in stubborn defiance of the eternal omnipotent God - God who made heaven and earth - God who rides upon the wings of the wind and shakes the world with his thunder - God before whom the nations are driven asunder - the everlasting mountains are scattered and the perpetual hills do bow. Yes and this weak deluded being man obstinately persists in this contest - the struggling of the clay against the potter - and yields up his life rather than submit. And not only this life but the eternal life to come. For when once his sword bathed in heaven falls upon his enemies the contest is terminated at once and forever. Reserved in chains under darkness they will wait the judgment of the last day when these chains will be [????].

Sermon 49 Efficacy of the Cross

[Sermon No. 49, "Efficacy of the Cross," Ephesians 2:16, 1821 Mar,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 7]

Ephesians 2:16

Having slain the enmity thereby.

This is the enmity that exists in the hearts both of Jews and Gentiles that is in all men naturally against God – And the instrument by which it is slain is the Cross of Christ. Paul is here addressing Gentiles and in the context he says – Wherefore remember that ye being in times past Gentiles in the flesh who are called uncircumcision by that which is called the circumcision in the flesh made by hands - That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and strangers from the covenant of promise, having no hope and without God in the world: But now in Christ Jesus ye who sometimes were afar off are more nigh by the blood of Christ. For he is our peace who hath made both one and hath broken down the middle wall of partitions between us (that is the wall between Jews and Gentiles). Having abided in his flesh the enmity even the law of commandments contained in ordinances for to make in himself of twain one new man so making peace: And that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross having slain the enmity thereby. Here are described an enmity between Jews and Gentiles and also between both these and God. And it seems this double hatred was destroyed by the cross. That there was a bitter hostility between Jews and Gentiles no man will dispute, because the united voice of history declares it. But that men are by nature the enemies of God is a doctrine which the unrenewed heart regards as extravagant and untrue. And when it is added that the cross of Christ is the only instrument by which this enmity can be dissolved this appears to such a man to be adding mystery to mystery and absurdity to absurdity.

Supposing the affections of man's heart to be utterly alienated from God and that a repugnance is felt against this character so strong that the unaided powers of nature will never compensate it becomes indeed an interesting enquiry by what means God can bring back to his love and obedience a creature so refractory and hostile. And we presume that man without revelation could form no opinion what this mode would be – Indeed we are told that into this subject even the angels desire to look. Man being a free agent it is impossible that he could even be compelled to love his Maker – God might indeed force his obedience but it would be the service of a slave – not that free will submission He seeks. Or God might hold over the hearts of men his terrors and thus bring them to fear him: but such an enigma could never work love in an alienated heart. Yet God takes neither of these courses. But he presents a plan for reconciling his creatures entirely new – and on the first view apparently inefficacious but in reality wonderfully powerful. He exhibits his only Son bleeding upon the cross and bids man look to him that the enmity of his heart may be slain and his feelings become reconciled to God.

To the Jews however the cross of Christ is a stumbling block and to the Greek foolishness. They do not perceive its efficacy and believe that it can have none. Let us then investigate the manner in which this cross slays the enmity of man's heart to God.

In devising a plan for reconciling a rebellious world unto himself there appears to have been an obstruction on the part of God and an obstruction on the part of of man. Now should God indicate the honor of his violated law so that he could consistently pardon the rebel. And how could he move the affections of that rebel to love him? The cross was the grand remedy that would resolve both these difficulties.

This in the first place under it consistent with the attributes of God to pardon his enemies. This in the second place processes for those enemies the reconciling and converting influences of the Holy Spirit. This in the third place melts the hearts of these enemies to love God by exhibiting most conspicuously this good news.

By the cross of Christ we mean all the suffering of body and mind that he endured while incarnate. We mean the hardships of his friendless shelterless condition – the persecutions, insults and reproaches of his enemies – the overpowering agony of his soul in Gethsemane and his conflict with death upon the cross. We mean also his active obedience – his incessant efforts to glorify his Father in heaven – to do good to the bodies and souls of men – his triumphing over the temptation of Satan and his submission to a cruel death. All these things are comprehended in the phrase cross of Christ. And these sufferings and this obedience rendered it consistent for God to propose conditions of reconciliation to his enemies.

God gave laws to the angels and the power to observe them. A pair of these angels violated those laws and God secured them in chains under darkness for the judgement of the great day. God placed men in Paradise and gave him a like law and a like power to keep it. But man too violated it - and the Universe the innumerable armies of holy beings that surmount the throne of God waited to see him also reserved in chains under darkness – or rather they waited to see him swept from existence: for the penalty of the law he had broken was, in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die. Yet God had purposes of mercy for this criminal. But his holy law had been broken that law which had been promulgated before the universe and for the honor of which all holy beings were jealous. What if God then had published an act of pardon to man merely on condition of his repentance without making any satisfaction to a violated law (so plain and unqualified). What think ye would have been the effect of such a proposal upon the universe of beings? They had seen the singing angels cast off to suffer the interminable (and unyielding) penalty of the law they had broken – while man sinning against a law equally strict and being equally guilty - is restored to Divine favour without making any satisfaction for his offence. What is become of the unchangeableness of God's word which declared without qualification that if man ate of the forbidden fruit he should surely die? And why this greater severity toward Devils than men?

Such we may suppose would be the reasonings of the universe had God demanded no satisfaction of man for a violated law. And what might have been the influence of such thoughts upon even holy beings we cannot say. An atonement therefore must be made or man must be punished. But this was beyond the power of a creature whose most perfect services would all be due to his Creator. Therefore it was necessary that the sword of God should be awakened, against the man that was his fellow. And therefore Christ explained, Lo I came to do thy will O God.

When this mystery of redemption began to be developed no doubt the angels of God waited in suspense to see its completion. For it was a deed before unheard of in the universe - it was a mystery of love. And when they saw the only begotten Son of God the brightness of his Father's glory and the express anger of his person leave his throne in heavenly glory and assuming the garb of a criminal voluntarily present his sinless head to the shafts of injured justice as a substitute for man - and actually bear our sins in his own body on the tree - and be made a curse for us. When they saw him subjected to the power of Satan and led by him into the wilderness to be tempted when they saw the arrows of God's fierce displeasure against him penetrating his very soul in Gethsemane and when amid the bloody inflictions of crucifixion they saw his greatest agony to be because his God had forsaken him – O then would with these holy kings reiterate his last words, It is finished! Yes it is finished! The broken law of God is satisfied – it is finished - the penalty due man has fallen on the Son of God – It is finished. God can now be just while he justifies the believer in Jesus. Let now the scepter of mercy be extended to man. Let him be saved if his will be saved and all the universe shall rejoice - and once more with a lower and a sweeter harmony than that which a multitude of the heavenly host raise on the plains of Bethlehem would the angels of God repeat, Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace goodwill towards men.

From this representation my hearers you will doubtless perceive in what manner the cross of Christ renders it consistent with the attributes of God to propose terms to reconciliation to his enemies. While the violations of his law remained unatoned for God could manifest himself to man and no other view than as a consuming fire: but now that this atonement is made - now that the universe have seen God's displeasure against sin spending its fury upon the head of a substitute - God can look through this Saviour upon rebels and propose to them conditions of pardon. Nay so complete is the atonement that he can even condescend to beseech them to a reconciliation.

Nor does he stop here. For in the second place this cross of Christ renders it consistent for God to send into the hearts of his enemies the reconciling and converting influences of the Holy Spirit.

Men are not the enemies of God because there is anything odious in his character or because he has done anything that ought to excite their resentment. What is his character? An assemblage of perfections (or rather the perfection of perfections) containing every thing in its highest degree that can be can awaken the love of an uninitiated taste. And what has been his conduct towards men? A constant stream of mercies - a constant series of miracles of long suffering ever since he said, Let us make man in our own image. Why then is man the enemy of God? Because our tastes are uninitiated and we cannot discern nor relish and put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter spiritual beauty nor proportion. Because we love darkness rather than light and because our hearts are dead to the emotions of gratitude towards God.

It is evident then that even after an atonement is wrought out by the Son of God and this is made known to man with the offers of mercy through this one sacrifice it is evident that man's heart will remain the same alienated thing as before unsubdued by this miracle of grace. If then some other step be not taken to work a revolution in that heart Christ has died in vain. And it is no ordinary instrument that can effect this. For the whole current of the affections running counter to the will of God and bearing along with it the whole soul, this must be checked stopped and made to flow in the opposite direction. It is indeed what the Scriptures call a new creation and therefore demands the same Almighty agent as the original creation for its accomplishment. How shall it be obtained from man? He certainly can do nothing to merit it. Merit it! He whose attitude towards God is that of rebellion – he who does not wish it - he who would resist it if offered. Here again the wisdom of the plan of redemption through the cross is manifested. In the life and death of Christ - in his humiliation suffering and active obedience there is enough of merit not only to render the pardon of God's enemies consistent with his glory and the the good of the universe but to prove also the Holy Spirit, to convince the world of sin of righteousness and of judgment to come, to enter the heart of the rebel and implant the image of the Lord God to subdue its resistance - to dwell in it and sanctify it and to seal the elect of God unto the day of redemption. He it is who casts a light into the mind of the sinner by which God is manifested to his heart in the purity of untarnished holiness hating iniquity and preparing for his obstinate enemies an insupportable retribution – And He it is also who holds up before the eye of the humbled convicted sinner the cross of Christ as the only anchor of his hope. Without this agent indeed man's unrelenting heart would forever remain hardened in defiance of its Maker.

But it is a decree of God that man shall be a free agent: and therefore in the work of conversion the Spirit operates upon the heart in such a manner as not to infringe the freedom of the will and treat the man as a machine. Love and obedience to God which are the result of his influences must be a willing love and obedience. It must be there chiefly by representing and enforcing motives that the citadel of man's heart is to be carried and connected to the services of God. What then is the motive which the Spirit urges most successfully upon the enemies of God? What is that aspect in which God must be viewed by the sinner that will dissolve his enmity? To lay upon us the demand of satisfaction for his violated law, says a late distinguished writer, could not do it. To press home the claims of justice upon any sense of authority within us, could not do it. To bring forward in threatening array the terrors of his judgment and of his power against us could not do it. To unveil the glories of that throne where he sitteth in equity and manifest to his guilty creatures the awful inflexibilities of his truth and righteousness could not do it. To look out over the cloud of vengeance and trouble our darkened souls as he did those of the Egyptians of old with the aspect of a menacing Deity could not do it. To spread the field of eternity before us all and tell us of those dreary abodes where each criminal hath his bed in hell and the centuries of despair which press over him are not counted because there are reasons role and the unhappy victims of the tribulation and the wrath and the anguish know that for the mighty burden of the sufferings which weigh upon them there is no end and no mitigation; this prospect appalling as it is and coming home upon the belief with all the characters of the most immaculate certainty could not do it. The affections of the inner man remain as unmoved as ever under the repeated and successive influence of all these dreadful applications. There is not one of them, which instead of conciliating does not stir up a principle of resistance and subject any human being to the treatment of them all and to nothing else and he may tremble at God and shrink from the contemplation of God and feel an overpowering awe at the thought of God when that thought visits him; but we maintain that not one particle of influence has been sent into the heart to make him love God. Under such application as these we can conceive the creature gathering in new energy from despair and mustering up a stouter defiance than ever to the God who threatens him. (Thomas Chalmers?)

But my brethren there is one aspect in which God presents himself to this alienated world which will soften the heart of the most obdurate when they pass and their eyes steadily upon him. It is God in Christ reconciling the world unto himself not imputing their trespasses unto them. This is the third mode in which the cross contributes to slay the enmity of the natural heart. And it has this effect because when God is looked at in the face of Jesus Christ it is an exhibition of the most astonishing kindness and benevolence. We there see him more purely by compassion for ungrateful aliens laying aside the terrors of vindictive majesty and putting on the garments of compassion that he may convince us that he earnestly desires our salvation and that he has made the way plain and easy for reconciliation. We see him in the attitude of entreaty stretching forth to us the arms of everlasting mercy - holding up to our view his only Son spared from his bosom and dying on the cross for our offenses - and tendering to us the the eternal Spirit to implant within us new dispositions. It is not possible to look on God thus presented us without a conviction that he loves us amid all our enmity and in gratitude towards him has loved us from eternity and that he has exhausted the riches of his benevolence to carry into execution a plan for our restoration to his favour. Amid all our wanderings he has followed us and guarded us as the apple of his eye and though we ungrateful acknowledge not his protection still he will not give over but follow us in as a suppliant and with the most winning tenderness entreats us to return to the bosom of his love - and to the internal enjoyment of his kingdom. O this is a view of God - a view that is presented only through the cross - which if it be exhibited to man's heart by the Spirit he cannot resist. No - hostile as he is to God and stuck as he is in an almost impenetrable shield of sin - this view he cannot resist. So much condescension - so much tenderness - so much forbearance - and that too in the Almighty God who is able to destroy the soul and body in hell. O this must melt as it does melt the stubbornness and the hardness and the enmity of the heart. That heart which not all the threatenings and the terrors of Omnipotence could move yields to the picture of a God of love.

And it is such a picture as this that the ministers of Christ are permitted and commanded to hold up before the meanest and most abandoned of Adam's race. No matter how long and debased - still there is a God of infinite mercy beseeking you in Christ to be reconciled to him with all the tenderness and earnestness of a kind father for his prodigal son the Lord feels towards you the yearnings of infinite compassion and you hear him exclaiming, How shall I give thee up Ephraim? How shall I deliver thee, Israel? How shall I make thee as Admah? How shall I set thee as Zeboim? Mine heart is turned within me, my repentings are mingled together.

But O man whoever thou art, presume not to approach this God in any other way than by the cross of Christ. Presume not to come unshielded by a Mediator and Intercessor into the audience chamber of that Being who is jealous for his holiness and whom no man can see and live. For the Spiritual purities of that place will flash upon thy naked soul like a consuming fire - and you will wither beneath the glance of an unreconciled God. It is by the cross only that your natural enmity to God can be slain and your soul be prepared for his presence. If the cross be to you foolishness or a stumbling block and you are resolved not to receive Jesus Christ and him crucified depend upon it that God never will be reconciled to you. There is but this only avenue into heaven. On every other side of the walls of the New Jerusalem you will find the flaming sword of God's justice turning every way to prevent the approach of all sin and impurity.

But my hearers is it not too true that to the great majority of man the cross is foolishness? Notwithstanding the miracles of Divine condescension and mercy that are displayed in this plan of redemption - notwithstanding Christ has removed every barrier on the part of God to their reconciliation and has purchased for them the influences of the Holy Spirit the Comforter and has taken away every terror that to the eye of sin appears in the character of God and closed his countenance with the kindness of mercy and they winning softness of pity - and notwithstanding the ministers of the Gospel are commanded to carry round this picture and hold it up before every son and daughter of Adam still do the great majority turn away from the sight with a contemptuous smile or with surprised indifference. Still in the heart of man unmelted and unsoftened nay there is stirred up in it a more determined hatred than ever.

But we will not therefore O sinners give over our own efforts. No - faithful to the command of our Redeemer we will again and again entreat you to look upon God in Jesus Christ though you flee from us we will follow you - though you spurn us from your presence still will we lay hold of the skirts of your garments and hold before you the picture of the cross - though you close the door of your dwellings upon us we will stay without and persist to use the glories of Christ. And when you lie upon the bed of death we will come to you and exhibit the fullness there is in Christ as the last sound you hear on earth shall be our voice beseeching you to believe in God.

[This may be the end of the original sermon. Two additional pages follow.]

And if such a sacrifice has been made then how deeply affected should those hearts be whose enmity has been slain by the cross every time it is brought distinctly before them by the emblems of the holy communion! Can the man who has been rescued from shipwreck or robbers or any extreme peril ever have the scene or the authors of his rescue brought before him without strong emotion? But however important any earthly deliverance compared with the redemption of your souls my brethren from the agonies of the second death? And now that the emblems of that great deliverance await your reception does not your heart burn within you when you come so near that Saviour who bore for you the curse of a violated law? Oh if no special emotion is awakened in your bosoms as Jesus Christ is set forth anew today crucified before you for you then your heart is not like those of the hundred forty and four thousand while on earth or on any other hearts indeed that have ever reached heaven. You are guilty of ingratitude that blackest of all sins: ingratitude not towards one who sacrificed all the riches and glories of heaven to save you. Oh if there be one sin that has no alienation or apology – one sin that fills all holy beings with horror and makes even devils tremble it is that of forgetfulness of Jesus Christ and ingratitude towards him among his professed friends. Is it cherished by one heart before me today? Then sackcloth wielding becomes us all for the curse of God rests upon us and nothing but the fear of penitence can take it away.

Sermon 51 Preaching the Gospel

[Sermon No. 51, "Preaching the Gospel," II Timothy 4:12, 1821 Jun,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 7]

II Timothy 4:1 - 2

I charge thee therefore before God and the Lord Jesus Christ who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his Kingdom: Preach the word, be instant in season, out of season; reprove rebuke exhort with all long - suffering and doctrine.

[Interesting thoughts on preaching; four days to prepare two sermons, etc. This sermon was delivered on Hitchcock's first sabbath as pastor of the Conway church.]

This is a solemn message and delivered too in a most solemn manner. In the ardor of the Apostle's feelings and amid the sunshine of an unhesitating faith he seems to forget the barrier between earth and heaven and introduces Timothy his son in the faith at once into the presence of God and Christ and the universe of angels and men and calling upon these as witnesses he presents to him a summary of his duties as a minister of the Gospel - reminding him that before this assembly at the termination of his office he must give an accounting of his stewardship. And before that same assembly does this Apostle charge every minister of the Gospel in the same manner and language. And the first article in this charge is preach the Word.

After that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe. This is the language of this same apostle in another place and we perceive from it that preaching is the grand instrument in the hands of God for the reconciliation of the world. The Jews in the primitive time did indeed require a sign and the Greeks sought after wisdom: but the Apostles still adhere to their command to preach Christ crucified although this was to the Jews a stumbling block and to the Greeks foolishness. For they had not yet forgotten the words of the Lord Jesus - go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature.

To preach the word and to preach the gospel are terms of the same import and they imply the faithful plain and earnest declaration of all revealed truth – of every doctrine and every precept contained in the Scriptures of the old and new testaments. Every part of these is given by inspiration of God and is profitable for doctrines for reproof for correction for instruction in righteousness. It is the command of God to Jeremiah, Stand in the court of the Lord's house and speak unto all the cities of Judah which come to worship in the Lord's house all the words that I command thee to speak unto them; diminish not a word. And it was the consolation of Paul that he could triumphantly appeal to the Ephesians at his final departure from them that he was, free from the blood of all men because he had not shunned to declare unto them all the counsel of God. The whole of revealed truth cannot indeed be preached in a single sermon – nor in a hundred sermons. But if a minister of the Gospel intentionally year after year passes over any part of the Gospel, he has not preached the gospel and especially if he omits any of the essential doctrines or precepts thereof he has probably helped more souls to perdition than to salvation and has injured more deeply the cause of religion than he could have done had he been an open champion for infidelity.

If then a minister of the Gospel would free himself from the blood of souls thus faithfully and particularly must he preach from the pulpit. And as the Israelites were commanded to bring oil olive that was beaten for light to cause the lamps in the tabernacle to burn continually - so should the preacher of the Gospel not bring before his people loose undigested discourses - but such as evince study and care. The great truths of religion are indeed so striking that even if presented in an obscene and repulsive manner they cannot be wholly inoperative. But if thrown into an inviting and elegant form and clothed with ancillary dress their effect will be tenfold greater. And many a man of taste and intelligence has been disgusted with religion itself because its principles were presented from the pulpit in so uncouth and homely a manner. It is true indeed that many hasty productions nay even mere ex tempore effusions are greatly admired and praised. But it is not always the sermon that pleases most during its delivery and concerning which most is said such a sermon is not generally of the most profitable kind. When a discourse carries conviction to the sinners conscience he will be too deeply occupied with his depravity and danger to dwell much upon the sermon. And hence it ought to be more gratifying to a gospel preacher to learn that his audience went away from public worship silent and solemn than to hear of their loud applauding of his performances. Now the more thoroughly a discourse is studied the more probability is there that such will be its effect. The object of this previous study is given the several parts of the sermon such a position that one shall enforce the other and that they shall all tend to the same point and to clear the arguments of all difficulty and objection so that they shall search the understanding without any counteracting influences. We all know that gold and silver separated from the ore are more bright and valuable. So divine truth if purified from the dross of human ignorance and speculation in the furnace of reflection will come forth more glorious and influential. And it is by no means an unimportant consideration that the preacher be particular about the style of his discourses. A word fitly spoken, says Solomon, is like apples of gold in pictures of silver. And this will apply to the manner of a sermon. The religious truth it contains is the apple of gold and no art can make it any thing else than gold yet its appearance is more interesting if placed in the midst of a picture of silver - that is if it be surrounded with an elegant and energetic style. It is a finished remark of an eminent man who being asked whether it was not beneath the dignity of a Christian to pay attention to the graces of composition replied - it is better to write so as to make a critic turn Christian than to write so as to make a Christian turn critic. [George Campbell?]

But although the minister of Christ has proclaimed the truth of revelation from the pulpit ever so extensively and faithfully yet this is by no means all that is implied in preaching the Gospel. It must be preached by him in his ordinary intercourse with his people. Men may sit quietly under the most alarming ministrations of the pulpit because they continue to evade a personal application. And therefore it is necessary to endeavor to win them to Christ by a familiar interview. Show men indeed have a more happy talent at which may be called parlor preaching than others: but it is believed that all maybe be useful in this way. And if men select and support a minister of the gospel committing to him the most important of all interests the care of their souls, they surely ought not to object if the minister shrinking under the weight of responsibility that lies upon him should sometimes in a tender winning manner make enquiries concerning the state of their souls. And is it criminal in him if he exhort them personally to accept of Christ? Is it unpardonable if he wish to communicate instruction to their families and their children? Will they not also feel confidence enough in their pastor to communicate to him their doubts and difficulties and to solicit his assistance for their removal? We know indeed that such parochial interviews should be as little formal as possible and we know also that there are seasons peculiarly favorable and others peculiarly unfavorable for these personal addresses. But to neglect them wholly how can a minister of Christ wash his hands from the blood of his people and how can his people answer at last for their neglect of the means they enjoy?

But in vain does a man preach the Gospel in the pulpit and in the social circle unless he also preach it in his life. No matter how eloquently and ably he defends and enforces the doctrines of Christianity if there be not correspondent conduct - if the fruit of those doctrines be not displayed in his walk and conversation his words will fall upon the ears of his congregation like idle tales. They will perceive at once that he does not believe what he maintains and that notwithstanding his eloquence and zeal he carries within him an hypocritical heart. In the language of Paul will they address him, Thou which teachest another teachest not thyself? Thou that preacheth a man should not steal dost thou steal? Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery dost thou commit adultery? Thou that abhorrest idols dost thou commit sacrilege? Thou that makest thy boast of the law through breaking the law dishonoureth thou God?

But there is not probably much need of proving that a minister of the Gospel should exemplify his faith by his works. For all men are ready enough to acknowledge and to demand this. And is it not often the fact that they place the standard of the holiness of a preacher of righteousness much above what may reasonably be expected of human nature in its disordered fallen state? Do not people sometimes look for a degree of perfection in their teachers which the history of the church will not warrant? For alas! To assume the clerical dress will not conquer a corrupt nature: and after all their efforts ministers are feeble and sinful like other men - we mean even the best of them. And hence it is that a people are often disappointed in the man whom they select to watch for their souls: because they estimate too highly his acquirements in the divine life and in the order of enthusiastic attachment forget that he is a man subject to like passions as they are.

To preach the word then in the pulpit - in the ordinary intercourse between minister and people and in his daily conduct is his grand duty - the business of his life. The apostle in the next place directs Timothy and every other preacher of the Gospel to be instant in season out of season. That is he must preach not only at stated times but must seek opportunities and improve them for enforcing the truths of religion - before many or few - among friends or enemies - in public and in private. Whatever would tend to render his instruction more forcible and influential he must endeavor to acquire - and whatever institutions are favourable to religion he must promote. And in this work he must be instant that is must be in earnest and unwearied. So far as health will permit he must give himself wholly that his profiting may appear to all. The work is indeed a great one - great enough to occupy an hundred hands through all the years of life. Let us just take a view of the work that lies before a clergyman in ordinary station in the church.

A part of this labor that cannot be dispensed with is the preparation of the discourses for the Sabbath. As that is the day especially intended for the conversion and sanctification of the world the preacher should make peculiar preparations for it. In this employment some are much more expeditious than others. Were my own experience required I should say that four days constant study are necessary for me to compose two sermons even in a decent style and manner. The fact is the standard of public taste in this country is rapidly rising and although it imposes a severe application upon public speeches yet they ought to rejoice at it and encourage that appetite which will not be full with husks but demand something more substantial and nourishing. A man may throw together in a short time many pious and correct observations - but to select for a sermon a single point - and to bring every argument and remark to bear upon this point - and at the same time not to fall short of or exceed the standard of God's word - to select the most appropriate passages from the scripture and to put the whole into such language as shall overwhelm by its energy and delight - by its smoothness - to do all this must be the work of time and close reflection. And yet after all perhaps a sermon thus written might in many instances excite the attention of an audience less than one thrown hastily and incoherently together.

But we believe the ultimate effect of preaching is not to be estimated by the immediate effect. And though a sermon closely knit together in all its parts and pruned of its redundancies and defects might exert a calmer influence upon the mind than one dictated by the feelings of the moment; yet we believe that in general it would sink deeper into the memory and into the understanding and into the conscience and remain written upon the heart long after the effervescence produced by the other had subsided and every trace of it was obliterated.

Another thing generally regarded in this country as a part of a minister's duty is the preaching of occasional lectures. In seasons of peculiar attention to religion this is most certainly necessary and an imperious duty. And at other times if the preacher has health and leisure and a part of his people are necessarily detained from public ordinances the practice is a good one: but in our opinion there is some danger that in time of great trepidity in religion this course will encourage the neglect of the public worship of God in his sanctuary: and therefore we conceive the preaching are not preaching of these lectures should be left to the discretion of the pastor of the flock - according as he has time and help and perceives a necessity for the effort. And in regard to the practice of giving sermons on funeral occasions we believe it to be an unreasonable requirement - and one with which the gospel minister cannot in general comply consistently with the faithful performance of his other duties. Not but that cases may sometimes occur where it would be proper: but in general we conceive it to be better to make the application of such providences on the succeeding Sabbath and this is the course which in the present state of my health I feel constrained to follow.

But in the preparation of so many discourses how shall the preacher avoid a tedious repetition? Repetition is indeed necessary in order to reach the hearts of those who love the world more than they love God: but too much of it should be avoided. Says Christ, every scribe which is instructed unto the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is an householder which bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old. Now the fact is that the stock of almost every man's ideas if not replenished will soon become exhausted and then although he may bring forth things old he cannot produce things new. It is necessary therefore for him to collect new information by reading. The study of the Scriptures should engage his first attention and he should strive to become master of the whole science of theology and ethics. But if he do not devote some time also to other departments of knowledge there is danger that his mind will become bigoted and contracted. Indeed it is no matter how extensive the knowledge of a clergyman provided he can obtain it without interfering with other duties for the greater his information the greater may be his usefulness. Ignorance has been the matter of most of the fanaticism and corruption of the church since the beginning: and thanks to God the day has gone by when learning is regarded as an enemy to Christianity and a dangerous qualification in a gospel minister nay it is now required in such an one - and we rejoice that these requirements are yearly increasing and that religion and learning are once more united after having been so long so unnaturally separated.

On the principle that knowledge is eminently friendly to religion it becomes the duty of a gospel minister to encourage its diffusion among his people by schools - by libraries and other methods prudence and wisdom may dictate. He ought not to be deterred from this by the probability that many of his people will outstrip him in intellectual pursuits and thus become uncomfortable critics upon his performances: for if such should be the case it will serve to rouse him to greater exertion and prevent him from sinking into a state of apathy concerning literature and science. Indeed except the interests of religion none should lie nearer his heart than those of knowledge. For the direct tendency of this is to render people better men and better Christians.

Have we not already exhibited duties enough and more than enough to occupy the whole time of the minister of the Gospel? Several days devoted to preparation for the pulpit and of the remainder a part occupied in improving and strengthening the mind by studying and occasional lectures funerals and in advancing the interest of learning to say nothing of the relaxation and exercise necessary to the health of all men - these various duties it would seem might fill up the week. And yet another important requirement remains to be mentioned viz. parochial visits. These ought not to be neglected and therefore in the first place such visits should be short. Suppose a parish to contain two hundred families. Should the pastor of such a place with the little time he has to spare indulge in protracted visits scarcely would he be able during the course of his ministry even if of a medium duration to become acquainted with those committed to his charge. And besides it does not require but a short time to effect the objects of a ministerial visit. To enquire for one another's welfare - to ascertain the probable conditions of a man or a family toward God and to leave a word of exhortation or consolation - this is a business that may be terminated in a short period and in ordinary cases there is not much beyond this that is profitable.

Another ingredient in parochial visits is that they should not be formal. The Gospel minister does not go to the habitations of his people that he may be served with luxurious living and fare sumptuously. It is not his wish that they should waste their time and property in pampering his appetite. He visits them expecting to find them engaged in their ordinary pursuits. And much more pleasant to him is it to hear them express a cordial welcome than to listen to a train of excuses for what needs none. A people ought to have confidence enough in their pastor to believe that he does not visit them with a view to make criticisms upon their appearance but to benefit their souls - and if these be found in health more reviving is it to his Spirit than all the feasting of Dives.

Thus you have a summary of the more arduous and weekly returning duties of a minister among his people. Many incidental engagements besides those named above might be added to this list: but we pass them by at this time and we shall omit also to remark on the concluding part of the text - reproach, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and doctrines, first because these particulars would give scope for another sermon and secondly because we wish at this time rather to recapitulate the duties of the minister than to attempt an explanation of the manner in which they should be performed.

And now in conclusion of this discourse we would remark we have not given this summary of a faithful minister's duties because we wished to magnify their number and their difficulty and therein find an excuse for neglecting them: but our object has been in the first place to show what in our opinion is the standard of ministerial service to which every one placed in the sacred office should aim. Few of us indeed can ever reach it. The duties are so multitudinous and arduous - our zeal is so far below what it should be - our bodily constitutions are often so debilitated and our sins are so manifold that we are too apt to rest in a very imperfect performance. Even the indefatigable Paul in view of the magnitude of his labors was forced to exclaim, who is sufficient for these things? And ten thousand have been the voices that have been repeated the enquiry with a desponding emphasis. Notwithstanding it is well that the standard is so high for were it lowered we should probably sink proportionably in our exertions.

The second object of this discourse is to show how liable people are to be disappointed by forming too high expectations of the services of their minister. When they look at detached parts of these services they appear to require but little exertion for their performance and hence will a people be very likely to conclude him capable of a greater multiplicity of duties than it is in his power be he ever so faithful to perform. But if they will only take a general view of ministerial labors - in a study in his pulpit and among his people the view will tend to moderate their expectations and thus prevent the mutual mortification of a disappointment.

The third object of this discourse is to show how necessary it is for people to give to their pastor their support and assistance. We speak not here of that support which ministers to his temporal necessities but of that which enables him the more acceptably to God to feed them with the bread of eternal life.

And first the minister needs the cooperation of his people. If they resist every plan for improvement - if they feel no interest in the promotion of the Redeemer's kingdom he will find this resistance and indifference hanging like the deadweight upon his exertions - and he will probably soon sink in the unequal conflict. But if they lend their assistance and strive to second everything that will promote God's glory and really desire a revival of vital godliness then will the empire of darkness tremble before the united exertion.

Secondly the minister needs the counsel of his people. In the multitude of counselors there is safety. And an individual will surely go forward with firmer confidence with in the prosecution of any benevolent enterprise if the pious and well-informed among his people coincide with him in judgment - and if they dissent from him perhaps he may thereby be induced to abandon many an effort that would prove abortive.

Thirdly the minister must have the prayers of his people. Paul felt himself better qualified for the work of the ministry upon the occasion of every new convert to Christianity because he knew that another righteous man would offer up fervent effectual prayer for his success. The hands of the minister like the hands of Moses in the battle between Israel and Amalek will often become heavy - and the intercessions of his people can alone support them. While thus sustained Israel will prevail: but if these prayers cease his hands will fail and Amalek - yea a worse than Amalek - will triumph.

Sermon 52 A Glance at the Future

[Sermon No. 52, "A Glance at the Future," Genesis 49:1, 1821 Jun,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 8]

Genesis 49:1

Gather yourselves together that I may tell you that which shall befall you in the last days.

[This was Hitchcock's first sermon after installation as pastor of the Conway church. It contains interesting comments on the relationship between pastor and parish and the duties of a minister of God. Also see Sermon 51 delivered that afternoon.]

There is not a stronger passion in the heart of man than the desire of penetrating into futurity and learning his own destinies. And it must have afforded a high gratification to the Jew that he could resort to the prophet and hear from his lips as from the mouth of God a development of the events that would afterwards come to pass. There was it is true in some instances an obscurity resting upon their predictions until they were actually accomplished - but this uncertainty served only to awaken to a more lively exercise the imagination and give an additional interest to the prophecy.

Of this kind was the prediction of Jacob to his twelve sons. This venerable patriarch over whose head nearly a century and an half of eventful years had passed had now laid himself down to die. And he called unto his sons and said, gather yourselves together that I may tell you that which shall befall you in the last days. Gather yourselves together and hear ye sons of Jacob and hearken unto Israel your Father. He then proceeded in the figurative language of prophecy to unfold the fortunes of his twelve sons to the end of time and then gathering up his feet into the bed he yielded up the Ghost and was gathered unto his people.

Most of the predictions of Jacob concerning his sons have already been fulfilled and we can bear testimony that he spoke as he was moved by the Holy Ghost. It was not therefore presumption in him to lay claim to the Spirit of prophecy and to declare the destinies of his sons to the latest generation with unhesitating assurance. But at this age of the world where is the man on whom the mantle of prophecy has fallen? Who is there that can establish his claim to such an influence of the Holy Spirit as amounts to inspiration? Long is it since the vision and the prophecy have been sealed and who art thou that presumest to say to the people, gather yourselves together that I may tell you that which shall befall you in the last days? What propriety then is there selecting such a passage for a text?

We lay no claims my hearers to any degree of inspiration. We confess that futurity is as impenetrable to us as to you. Still however there are certain general probabilities in human events whereby we may judge with some degree of assurance what will be from what is passed. The thing that hath been says Solomon is that what shall be: and that which is done is that what shall be done: and there is no new thing under the sun. Hence there may we conclude that there is a certain analogy running through the natural and moral world and that every event is so connected with and dependant upon preceding events that it might with certainty be foretold by a mind that could understand and examine every link of the vast chain of the Divine government. Now we suppose that none but the divine mind care and have taken such a comprehensive view and therefore none but Jehovah can with absolute certainty predict anything future. Yet created minds - even the mind of man can discern a few of the links of the connecting chain of the universe and therefore man uninspired is able to discern a little way and with an obvious vision into futurity so that he can calculate with a good degree of probability upon many of the occurrences of the time to come. Indeed we all of us act almost daily upon this semi-prophetic principle. The husbandman when he sows the ground - the merchant when he advertises his property abroad - the operator when he lays his gainful plans and risks his all at the outset - the scholar when he submits to the painful drudgery of a rudimental education - and all of us indeed when we make any provision for the future for mind or body - rely confidently on this insight into futurity. And though from the causes already named everyone of us and everyone of our plans is liable to be disappointed yet in the majority of instances these plans either wholly or partially succeed and therefore it is that we are willing to act on the principle.

But in addition to this kind of insight into futurity which may be called natural prophecy men are able to either from experience or revelation to foretell some grand and important events with absolute certainty. Experience teaches them that they must all endure pain - that all must submit to death - and therefore that every connection on earth must be dissolved. Experience however stops at the grave: but revelation has fixed beyond this on the ocean of eternity one prominent mark which every eye can see. It is the day of judgment. And though on every side of the final tribunal there is a darkness impenetrable to mortal vision yet this is declared by the God of unerring truth to be unmovably fixed and all the inspired men of old unitedly point man to the day of judgment and the throne of judgment.

It being the fact then that some future events are probable and others certain to man - the preacher of truth at the present day may with propriety address his people with the words of our text with the alteration of a single word - Gather yourself together that I may tell you that which may befall you in the last days. And since many of these events which either analogy renders probable or experience or revelation finds are highly momentous and important to us all and since a steady contemplation of them tends to prepare us to meet them it may be profitable on some occasions to direct our eyes forward to the scenes through which we may or must pass.

The events of the past week my brethren remind us that we have entered into a relation to one another whose solemnity and interest and consequences the records of eternity can alone develop. And now standing on the threshold of so momentous and responsible an office you will permit me to pause for a few moments and casting an eye along the stream of time and viewing ourselves as minister and people carried down this stream you will indulge me in endeavoring to point out some of the scenes through which we may pass and some of the scenes through which we must pass.

First what are the scenes that may be before us? I do not wish to awaken any unnecessary fears - nor look with a melancholy foreboding upon the future. I would not wish to distrust the power or faithfulness of God. But we know that in this chequered state of existence changes and trials are eminently essential to our spiritual health and therefore it is that God often suffers the fairest prospects to be darkened and destroyed even while we are yet gazing upon them with the enthusiasm of novelty. Hence then it may be that the present harmony and peace that exist among us may be speedily succeeded by division and contentions.

Union my hearers is the work of God - division is the work of Satan. If the Holy Spirit be poured out upon the hearts of men, inclining them, to follow the things that make for peace no root of bitterness springing up will be allowed to trouble them. Every apprehended difficulty will vanish and there will exist a mutual disposition and effort to make every concession necessary to harmony. But if the Spirit of God be grieved to depart from the people the prince of darkness whose governing principle is divide and conquer will set at work all his engines of falsehood malice and evil speaking and soon will the Father be divided against the son and the son against the Father; the mother against the daughter and the daughter against the mother; the mother in law against her daughter in law and the daughter in law against the mother in law.

What then are the means by which the influence of God's Spirit can be continued to a people that are necessary to secure them six from the assaults of the great enemy of all peace and harmony? The prayers of Christians we reply is amply the great medium through which cometh down every good gift and every perfect gift. If these prayers be withheld if the professed children of God forget their dependance upon him they do in fact pray to the Prince of the power of the air and invite his cooperation.

And do you my brethren feel assured that you shall never relax in your humble prayers for the peace of Zion in this place? Remember that it is possible even for real Christians when they find unanimity and success to attend their every effort to impute their prosperity to their own unaided energies and to say, by the strength of my hand have I done it and by my wisdom; for I am prudent. There is such a thing as a believer forgetting to pray for the continuance of peace when he is in possession of it and can discern no signs of any approaching storm. And then it is that Satan is most active. It was while the husbandman slept that the enemy sowed tares among his wheat. Now is there not a deep slumber upon the eyes of the Christians when he no longer prays? And will not the great adversary seize upon such a moment to cast into the human heart the seeds of discord?

Christian brethren although you may have prayed much and fervently for this peace of our Zion and for the union of our hearts yet it would be no new thing under the sun were a spiritual sleep to come upon your souls and before you are aware of it the roots of bitterness be so firmly and thickly planted among you that every plant of peace and love will be eradicated. If this deep slumber should in judgment fail upon you already do I see the heart of Christian steeled against Christian - brother against brother and neighbor against neighbor. I see the hand that should be raised unitedly in prayer lifted up for shameful strife - I hear those voices that now unite in hallelujahs to God venting forth mutual execrations secretions and blasphemies and loading the air with reproach and poisonous calumny. I see the Spirit of God Weening wearied out with so much perverseness withdrawing his influences from this people and leaving them to the iron dominion of the Prince of darkness. God in mercy grant that this may prove a false vision and I a false prophet!

Another evil that may come upon the people is my own unfaithfulness. What if the fear of man should prove a snare to me and I should therefore neglect an exhibition of the grand fundamentals of the Gospel and the sins that most easily beset you? What if I should stop short of a full development of the truth and continually prophecy smooth things? Or what of through the withdrawal of the Spirit I should be left to make shipwrecks of the faith and to disgrace the cause of truth by an unholy life? All these things have happened to men and may happen to me. Nay if they have not already come upon me it is imputable merely to the preventing grace of God. For my sins richly deserve such an abandonment. And what security have I that in time to come this will not be the case? Do I depend upon the sincerity or firmness of my heart? A heart that is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked - a heart whose sin and treacheries in the sight of God are more than can be numbered? No brethren there is no security that I shall not with a multitude of others become unfaithful and apostate. And should such be the case it needs but little of the spirit of prophecy to foretell that I shall drag down some of you with myself to the bottomless pit. O what a picture of ingratitude is this! That the man whose temporal wants are supplied by the generosity of a people and who look to him to guide them to heaven should with a cruel indifference conduct them to the very brink of eternal misery! And yet however mortifying the thought there is doubtless depravity enough in this heart to urge to such an abomination if the grace of God do not check its tendencies. And the picture just exhibited may be but a prophetic delineation of my future apostasy and of your misery. Your earnest prayers therefore are once more entreated to save me and yourselves from such a catastrophe.

Another gloomy vision of futurity presents itself to my imagination as prophetic of what my hearers my one day witness. I see this church having denied the faith once delivered to the saints and the Lord that bought them possessing indeed the form of godliness but denying the power itself. I see them a body without a soul - no longer signalized by faithful prayer or holiness - no longer separated from the world by anything but a name - the receptacle of all contradictory opinions and charitable to each other's errors in doctrine and defects in practice because mutually criminal - in short a church whose bond of union is scepticism and whose end is to be burned. I see you my brethren no longer able to bear the truth - no longer decisions of that preaching which searches and tries the heart but determined that the cry of peace shall be perpetually sounded in your ears and that the minister shall blind the eyes of the people and the people those of the minister till both stumble on the dark mountains.

Do you repel my brethren the idea that such may hereafter be your state? O have you forgotten Ephesus and Smyrna and Pergamum and Thyatira and Philadelphia and Laodicea where once the church of God was pure in faith and pure in practice? Yet it has pleased God to remove these candlesticks from their places and the darkness of idolatry and superstition has succeeded. Think nothing that you are secure against the flood of error and corruption. Do you feel that you are undermining such a grievous chastisement? Alas where is the church not deserving it? In heaven only is it to be found. Watch therefore brethren unto prayer and repent and do the first works lest your candlestick be removed out of its place.

But these dark scenes have passed from my imagination and a brighter vision visits my mind. Is it fancy or do I really see this church rising in the strength of the Most High, her light being come and the glory of the Lord being risen upon her? Do I not see her members with one heart and one mine compassing the altar of the Lord of Hosts and pouring out the fervent effectual prayers for that Holy Spirit to be given them who can alone open the blind eyes and unstop the death ears? Does there not sound a voice in my ears, So the sinners in Zion are afraid - fearfulness hath surprised hypocrites? Do I not see the house of God filled with an anxious and a weeping multitude hungering and thirsting for the bread of eternal life? Is it fancy or do I hear in this habitation a convicted soul crying out, what shall I do to be saved? and in another dwelling the soul that has cast itself upon the Lord triumphing in redeeming love? O I will believe it is not fancy that now presents to my mind many of the congregation before me coming forward to take the vow of the Lord upon them and to confess before men the Redeemer of their souls - yes it must be real - it cannot be that all these youth and all these middle age and all these of riper years who have hitherto lived without hope - it cannot be that all these will be finally lost. No though I prove a false prophet I cannot avoid predicting that we shall be blessed with revival of religion. O Lord fulfill this prediction and we will show grace grace unto it.

We proceed to develop some of those scenes through which we must pass. Of these we shall select only two. And the first of these is the scene of death. We know not indeed in what place or in what hour that grim messenger will meet us. And it is possible that none of you will witness my exit and I that I shall witness none of yours. Perhaps it will please God to call me home the first and to dissolve the connection that now exists between us in its very outset. But should my life be lengthened out and should no unforeseen blow cut asunder the pastoral relation it will probably be my painful duty to visit many of you on the bed of death and their endeavor to administer the law of consolations the consolations of religion. And O my hearers how it will in that hour mitigate the pain of a final separation if I can see the countenance of death spread over with the calmness of resignation and the soul reposing on the righteousness of Christ meeting composedly the king of terrors! And it may be my lot to hear some of you in that hour of untold agony and fearful emotion having obtained the conquest over every fear and already permitted to see heaven open - there perhaps shall I hear your voice gathering a more than earthly energy breaking forth in the conquerors song, O death where is thy sting O grave where is thy victory! Thanks be to God who giveth me the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

But alas I may be called to to the dying bed of some who now hear me only to witness the agony and despair of a soul forsaken of God on the very limit of existence and shrinking from the dark world into which he is about to enter to spend eternity. Oh in that hour what consolation must we give you - what ray of hope can we turn in upon your sinking soul? We can weep with you and we can pray with you – but who can forgive sins but God only? Even in that hour we must be faithful and shrink not from exhibiting to you your lost condition by nature and the necessity of being born again - of repentance and faith and holiness. And in that hour when it occurs to you have resisted the loudest warnings all your life feeble will be the consolation of saying that it is merely possible that God may yet have mercy on you. Oh, in despite of your prayers and tears most probably must we see you in the agonies of death turning us the eye of despair and sinking at once into the invisible world bearing no hope and no evidence that you are gone to a better world but on the contrary evincing by the delirious and distress of your last moments that your eternal misery has commenced even on this side of the tomb.

The last scene that awaits us my hearers and awaits us all and it awaits us infallibly is the final judgment. Whether the pastoral relation between us be long or short - whether we be united or undivided - whether we remain steadfast in the faith and practice of the Gospel or apostatize - whether the Gospel I preached to you be received or rejected one thing is certain that we must together realize the scenes of the final judgment. We shall not attempt to paint before you the terrors and solemnities of that day - the burning universe - the opening graves - the shout of the archangel - the Son of man coming in the clouds with power and great glory - the tribunal of God rising on the ruins of the world - God himself ascending the judgment seat - the book of life opening wherein is registered the character and the fate of every individual - the universe of beings crowding with trembling solicitude around their Judge - nor the joy on the one side or the agony painted in the countenances of those on the other side as this Judge separates the righteous from the wicked. In vain should we attempt any adequate description of such solemnities as these. But there is one fact on this subject which we can comprehend. In the midst of all the sublimities and terrors and confusion of that day must we be brought face to face and in the presence of God and angels and men shall I be asked what were my motives in taking oversight of this church and people and you will be asked what were your motives in inviting me to the charge. And should the union continue another solemn question will be urged upon us and I shall be asked what I have preached and how I've preached and you will be asked how you have received and how you have improved that preaching.

Sermon 53 Proper Mode of Exhibiting Divine Truth

[Sermon No. 53, "Proper Mode of Exhibiting Divine Truth," Ephesians 4:15, 1821 Jun,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 8]

Ephesians 4:15

Speaking the truth in love.

This exhortation is addressed to all believers: but it is peculiarly applicable to the minister of the Gospel and we shall proceed in discoursing from these words to consider what manner of preaching the Gospel is most promotive of the glory of God and the salvation of men. For the truth of religion may be declared in the pulpit in so uncouth disgusting or irritating a mode that even if immersed with error they will lose their proper influence and serve to harden men in sin. It is therefore of no small importance that correct views be entertained manner as well as a matter of preaching. And we shall remark, First upon certain modes of exhibiting the truths of religion that are improper; and Secondly upon those modes best calculated to win souls to Christ.

In introducing the first head of the discourse it may be remarked that in accordance with the text the grand principle that ought to inspire every minister of Christ in his public discourses is love - love to God and man. If he speak the truth in love - with this principle urging him onwards - he can scarcely fail of preaching properly and acceptably to his conscience and his God. And therefore if any other feeling than love governs his mind in the composition of his sermons his manner will be improper.

The first thing that will render if so is a partial or unequal exhibition of the truth. Some men perhaps in the course of a long ministry never bring into the pulpit any but certain favorite doctrines or precepts. Some insist chiefly on the moral duties - others upon the duties of piety - others upon the threatenings of the bible - others upon the promises and consolations and others upon the doctrines. Some feed their flocks with strong meat continually without milk - others administer milk without meat. In all such cases there is if I may so speak an unwarrantable favoritism - a giving to some parts of revelation an undue importance and a detraction from the rest. But where is the authority for exalting one part of revelation above another? All Scripture, says Paul, is profitable for doctrine for reproof for conduct for correction for instruction in righteousness. Hence then the preacher of the Gospel is bound to adopt this plain rule - to give to every subject that space and importance that are given to it in the bible. In that volume the various doctrines duties threatenings promises and precepts are arranged and proportioned by an Omniscient God and let not man presume to be wise about which is written. It is difficult indeed if not impossible to follow this rule in every case: for there may be instances in which a minister should press more forcibly particular parts of inspiration than others or attack particular vices. But a general conformity to the rule may be expected to meet with a divine blessing. At any rate he cannot expect that blessing upon the labors of him through a long course of years intentionally omits any part of Scripture truth - nor upon him who touches so seldom upon many of the fundamentals of religion that his people look upon them as of no consequence - nor upon him who brings forward only those subjects that are popular and continually prophesize smooth things. Says the Lord to Ezekiel, stand in the court of the Lord's house and speak words to all the cities of Judah that come to worship in the Lord's house all the words that I command thee to speak unto them- diminish not a word. And we know not that any reason can be given why this command is not applicable to every minister of the Gospel.

Another method of preaching the Gospel that is improper is the giving to the truths of religion a controversial form. What doctrine of the Christian system has not been disputed? Nay is not now disputed in some region of the earth? If we except perhaps the being of a God we know of none. But this is no reason for exhibiting to an audience the great fundamentals of Christianity as if they were matters of doubtful disputation. What though a man should endeavor formally to prove (as some have attempted to prove) that nothing of material nature exists except in imagination? Would it therefore be necessary for a public teacher to come forward gravely and attempt by a lengthy argument to show that the sun does actually shine that what appears to us as a tree or a rock or a mountain is actually such? thus conveying to the minds of his hearers that it is indeed a doubtful point whether the sun really shines or a tree or rock or mountains actually exist. So in regard to the essential doctrines of Christianity a minister ought not to exhibit them as doubtful by holding them up in a controversial aspect. For a great part of the objections made to them in the world are just idle and just as ridiculous as objections against material existence and therefore do not need any formal refutation. We speak here only of such as acknowledgment the authority of the bible. And however sceptical even these maybe we believe their consciences bear witness stronger than a host of arguments to the reality the reasonableness and the power of the doctrines of the cross. In the pride of philosophical speculation they may endeavor to show that certain truths are not taught in the bible and they may even array a multitude of ingenious emendations and alterations and arguments to overturn these truths and perhaps exult over their downfall. But still in the returning hour of serious reflection the voice of conscience will again be lifted up and bear testimony to these very truths. There are seasons when the vainest Gospel sceptics on earth will feel that men are lost sinners in the sight of God - that they must be born again to prepare for heaven - that their own goodness cannot justify them before God and that therefore their salvation must be wholly of grace through the redemption there is in Christ Jesus. The preacher of righteousness therefore may address the truths of the Gospel to the consciences of men with an assurance that this infallible monitor will add her voice to the voice of revelation. And if men resist the truth they resist also conscience. Hence then it is not wise nor is it doing justice to Christianity to search the records of the church for all the strange opinions of eccentric man and all the fanciful objections of scepticism that these may be held up to the contemplation of an audience. And we know not a more needless waste of time and talents than for a minister of the Gospel to spend that hour which should be devoted to winning his hearers to Christ in doing away objections to divine truth and in refuting heresies which till his sermon were sleeping in forgetfulness and would never have been heard of by his audience had not his zeal dragged them forth from their graves.

But what if there be existing controversies concerning the essential doctrines of the Gospel in the region where the lot is cast. Shall he exclude these from his pulpit and leave his people to be led away from the simplicity there is in Christ? It is an excellent remark of a wise man that the best way to refute error is to establish the truth. Let therefore the minister of Christ preach Christ and him crucified. Let him enforce all the grand doctrines dependant on the cross - and he will be thus most likely to secure his people from delusion and error. But if even in the case supposed he bring forward the truth of the bible in dress and with the aim of controversy - if he seem to be aiming his shafts against an adversary he will infallibly urge his people to espouse different sides - while the skepticks and the weak minded looking at the surface of the subject will be satisfied that there is nothing permanent and real in religion.

In the third place it is improper to preach the Gospel in a disgusting or imitating mode.

There is such a thing as man's being disgusted and irritated with the truth alone. Indeed how can it be otherwise than offensive to a man of graceful morality and self exalted feelings to be told of the utter Alienation of his heart from God and of the mighty revolution that must be undergone even by him ever he can be in favour with God - and that until this radical change be wrought upon him he is a child of wrath even as others. But this disgust and imitation which results from the naked truth and which the faithful minister will often find excited - this is not the disgust and imitation which we now mean. We refer to a certain offensive manner whereby the natural opposition of men to the truth is increased. This mode of preaching derives its chief odiousness from the use of certain strong human terms that have become unpalatable from an exaggerated meaning that has been fastened upon them. Now if these words and phrases are of human invention we see no reason for being very tenacious in using them if by their omission we can give an equally good view of any doctrine and thereby remove some of the deepest prejudice of the heart.

Again Gospel truth may be rendered disgusting by making too much use of the engine of fear in its exhibition - by holding up the threatenings of God's law so frequently and so prominently that they lose their proper influence and beget in the hearers an impression that the preacher is endeavoring not to draw them but drive them to Christ - not to attach them to holiness by its beauty and loveliness but to keep them in awe and subjection by its terrors. Now though the threatenings of God's law should often be held over the heads of the unregenerate yet some other engine must be brought to bear upon their hearts before they will love him and if they hear little else from our lips but terrors they will soon learn not to fear but to nauseate more strongly than ever the whole plan of Gospel truth. It is therefore the duty and the wisdom of the preacher of righteousness to give to the threatenings of the bible that place only in their ministrations which Christ and the Apostles gave to them.

We have shown in what manner the Gospel is not to be preached. Let us in the second place endeavor to trace in what manner it should be preached.

And first it should be preached plainly.

If the trumpet give an uncertain sound, says Paul, who shall prepare himself to the battle? So likewise you except ye utter by the tongue words easy to be understood how shall it be known what is spoken? For ye shall speak into the air. If I know not the meaning of the voice I shall be unto him that speak a barbarian and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me. I had rather speak five words with my understanding that by my voice I might teach others also than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue.

But we scarcely need the pen of inspiration to inform us that plainness and precision are absolutely essential in the exhibition of divine truth. We know it to be something more than useless for a watchman on the walls of Zion to frame his public interactions in a language of style or idiom which his flock are not able to understand. Whether the obscurity lie in the selection of unusual and ambiguous words - or in their improper position - or in metaphysical disquisition it alike retards the progress of truth. Some subjects may indeed require a metaphysical mode of discussion - but to present every part of divine truth in such a dress as to render obscure what before was very plain. A discourse fitted up in this manner will have the appearance of research and learning but ordinary minds will go away from hearing as unsatisfied and hungry for the bread of eternal life as they came: and for the plain reason that they did not comprehend the sermon. It is an accurate remark by a distinguished man that had the province of common sense never been invaded by the subtleties of scholastic argument there might have been no use for the science of metaphysics. But when an acute metaphysician appears to darken the suggestions of this universal and infallible guide he must be fought with his own weapons and another metaphysician must rise to meet and to overmatch him. Thus he - it would appear then that unless a man were called to preach to an audience of metaphysicians he cannot be justified in adopting the metaphysical mode of sermonizing. Since such a mode is unnecessary - useless - nay is injurious.

There is also a mode of preaching adopted sometimes the opposite to plainness but which it is no easy matter to describe. It consists generally of a certain ambiguity of expression whereby men of very different sentiments and religions suppose the preacher to be of their respective tenets. This mode although it may render a man popular for time is apt to produce at length a suspicion among his people that he is a time server destitute of fixed principles and indifferent about the opinions of those he is appointed to guide to heaven. It is therefore better in the end even in a worldly view for the minister of the Gospel to declare and define his sentiments in the plainest possible manner. And especially in this frankness and discrimination important when the man looks forward to that great day in which before the universe he must give an account of the matter and manner of his preaching. And we are inclined to believe that even those who object to the particular doctrinal sentiments of a man will notwithstanding have a better opinion of him if he sincerely and plainly and without personalities avow and defend his opinions than if he should endeavor to conceal them and use such an ambiguous language as could have no definite meaning affixed to it. And indeed we do not see how it can possibly be a reasonable cause of offence for man honestly and fairly to maintain those doctrines which after much prayer and research he sincerely believes to be found in the Scriptures and to be essential to salvation.

The second ingredient in the manner of preaching the Gospel is that it be preached boldly.

It is said of Paul that, he spake boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus and that he went into the synagogue and spake boldly for the space of three months disputing and dissuading the things concerning the kingdom of God. And this fearless manner of preaching did God bless. For it is said of Paul and Barnabas that, long time there abode they (in Ionium) speaking boldly in the Lord which gave testimony unto the word of his grace and granted signs and wonders to be done by their hands. Paul also directs the Ephesians, to pray always with all prayer that he might speak boldly, as he ought to speak. And there is not on record a more independent awakening address to the consciences of men than is to be found in the exhortations and reproofs of Our Saviour - With these preachers then was no fear of man that bringeth a snare. And then and there was with them a faithfulness to God and to the souls of their fellow man well worthy of imitation. And what powerful motives urge every preacher of the Gospel to the like boldness and faithfulness! By his timidity by omitting fully to develop the truth he may be the means of conducting some one of his hearers to everlasting perdition and by rigid faithfulness perhaps he may awaken some conscience lead in trespasses and sins to the possession of light, peace, and joy and eternal glory. And let him look forward to that day when he will be confronted before his audience as the bar of God when his unfaithfulness will be blazing forth in sight of the universe without any concealment evasion or palliation.

In the third place the Gospel should be preached earnestly.

What! Can a man be animated in discoursing upon the things of time and be unanimated when he is developing the joys and glories of eternity? Can he be earnest and urgent in striving to deliver his neighbor from temporal evil and shall he be stupid when endeavoring to shield him from everlasting burnings? Let the ambassador of Christ as he ascends the pulpit look around upon his audience and what does he see! every one of them in danger of sinking into everlasting perdition. What every one?

Yes – the Christian in danger because he lives no more conformably to the Gospel - the sinner in danger on the very brink of ruin because he has never taken one steps toward a reconciliation with God. And perhaps the everlasting fate of his whole audience depends upon that single sermon the minister is about to deliver - and that fate may be happy if he appears in earnest but miserable if he seems insensible to his subject.

The themes discussed in the pulpit too are great enough one would think to drive away from the speaker all dullness and lightness of manner. That nature of God and of the Redeemer - the depravity and the condemnation of men - the glorious yet mysterious plan of redemption for their restoration - the value of the soul - the judgment of heaven and hell - these are the some subjects entering into the elements of the preachers discourses. And can be unmoved - can he be insensible to their deep solemnity - and with such sublimities and responsibilities before him can he be satisfied with unimpressive or theatrical or ludicrous exhibition of the Gospel!

*He that negotiates between God and man
As God's ambassador, the great concerns
Of judgment and of mercy, should beware
Of lightness in his speech. Tis pitiful
To court a gain, when you should win a soul
To break a jest, when pity would inspire
Pathetic exhortation; and to address
The skittish fancy with facetious tales,
When sent with God's commissions to the heart. [Cowper]*

In the fourth place the Gospel should be preached experimentally.

We mean by this that the man who preaches it should be one who has felt the power of religion on his own heart. And he must in experimental piety make his experience the groundwork of his sermons. For though there be ten thousand minor diversities between different Christians yet there are certain grand and substantial processes of feeling and sentiment in which they agree. But as far as these essentials are concerned may he preach experimentally. He must however by no means make his own experiences the infallible standard for others in every respect. So far as the depravity of the heart and the reality of regeneration are concerned he may follow his own remembrance and feelings: but as to the intensity with which this depravity is experienced and as to the manner in which this regeneration takes place he must not make his own heart a criterion. And so in regard to spiritual joys he must not deny that others feel them more because his joys are few and feeble.

In the last place the Gospel must be preached affectionately.

Who is this weeping over apostate and bloodthirsty Jerusalem? It is the great preacher of righteousness Christ? Who is this wishing himself accused for his brethren? It is the great Apostle of the Gentiles. And though he preached the Gospel plainly and boldly and earnestly and experimentally yet he also preached affectionately. He felt most deeply for those whom he saw wandering in the broad road to eternal misery. He did not warn them because he wished to display his authority or acquire dominion over them: but because he felt for them the yearnings of a compassion too strong to be resisted. Though he spoke the truth undisguisedly yet he spoke it in love. And thus speaks and thus feels every genuine minister of Christ. Even when compelled to hold before his people their sins and their danger he does it with a solemn tenderness and with an anxious wish to rescue them from the everlasting pit.

Such my hearers are the principal ingredients that should be found in the preaching of the Gospel. And if it be done plainly and boldly and earnestly and experimentally and affectionately we may hope for a demonstration of the Spirit and of power to accompany it. It will prove the hour of God and the wisdom of God to the salvation of many who hear it. God grant that each one of us who have taken it upon us to preach the everlasting gospel may thus proclaim the truth as it is in Jesus that we may not labor in vain nor spend our strength for naught - but be instrumental in bringing many sons and daughters unto glory. Amen.

Be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises.

[Includes a discussion of a parishioner who has recently died.]

The apostle in this text used the present time - that is he speaks of certain Christians who through faith and patience now inherit the promises. And hence may we infer that all departed believers in Christ enter immediately upon a state of enjoyment. Paul does not say who will inherit the promises but are are now inheriting the promises. While he was writing Abraham Moses Joshua Job and all others who while on earth had lived by faith were there in the presence of God, where is fullness of joy and pleasures for evermore. They were not doomed to lie in a state of insensibility until the day of final judgment: but the moment they were loosened from the fetters of mortality their Spirits ascended to God who gave them there to unite in the song of the redeemed. The day of judgment will indeed manifest them righteous characters to the universe and then too will they be endued with Spiritual bodies but we have no evidence that their happiness will then be augmented. Already do they see as they are seen and know as they are known and the Lamb feeds them and leads them to living fountains of water.

The history of many of these glorified believers is on record - and though dead they yet speak in their example. It is this example of which Paul exhorts the Hebrews and through them all the family on earth name by the name of Christ to be imitators. When Christians are called to tread in the footsteps of Christ we believe a comparison of his sinless and divine nature with their corrupt and earthly hearts often produces in them so deep an impression of the difficulty of the effort that they shrink from it and despair of ever living like him who knew no sin. But here are men presented before them for imitation subject to like passions as they are - who had the same corrupt native dispositions to struggle against - and who nevertheless with less of light in the mysteries of the cross were enabled to come off more than conquerors. Here then are examples set before the believers of every generation which ought not to seem above his imitation and he is without excuse if he do not at least endeavor to live as they lived and to die as they died.

But who are the men whose sentiments and practices we are exhorted to follow? You have heard of Abel, of Enoch, of Noah, of Abraham, of Isaac, of Jacob, of Joseph, of Moses - and time would fail us as it did the Apostle to tell of Barak and of Samson and of Jephthah of David also and Samuel out of the prophets. Nor should the apostles evangelist and martyrs of the Gospel dispensation be forgotten. Nay because they at least lived and believed and acted under the same dispensation we enjoy the example of Paul and Peter and John and James and Matthew and Mark and Luke and Stephen and a host of contemporaries is in peculiar propriety for our attempted imitation. And since the days of these pioneers of Christianity the history of the church disgusting and bloody as it is presents many a noble instance of Christian fortitude and triumph. Amid all the corruption of the faith - the delirium of fanaticism - the fury of contending sects and the massacres of intolerance - amid all this - O there might be named a glorious company whose garments we never defiled by these abominations and whose ardent and unconquerable faith whose humility and love and sacrifices in the cause of Christ present models for our imitation.

You are aware of Christian hearer that we cannot on this occasion enter into a particular detail of the character of the several believers that have been named. But there are certain general characteristics shining brighter in some than others which we would now proceed to hold up for imitation to all those who are desirous of inheriting the promises. We shall name four particulars in which these eminent servants of God have left a shining example.

Let it not be thought however that we imagine these men to have been sinless and therefore worthy of imitation in everything. Alas the pen of inspiration has delineated with unalleviated faithfulness their many and sometimes most shocking apostasies. And far be it from us to propose these transgressions for examples worthy to be followed or to suggest that they afford for the shadow of an excuse for the sinning Christian. No - to the character of every one of these men and of every other Christians there is always reason for adding this painful exception. Be ye followers of this man so far and only so far as he was a follower of Christ.

Still however when we look at the characters of the patriarchs prophets apostles and martyrs of the Scriptures as a whole we perceive certain predominant features worthy to be held up to the view of every eye and to be enforced upon every heart. And the first of these characteristics we shall name was an unwavering faith in God.

In order rightly to estimate the force of this remark in regard to these believers who lived previous to the coming of Christ it ought to be remembered that the object of faith were much more feebly presented to their minds then to those who enjoy the unclouded light of the gospel. Yet amid all the dimness with which God and the Redeemer and heaven were beheld did they most fearlessly rely upon their reality and excellence. How resolutely does David exclaim, I will trust in the mercy of God forever and ever. Job too groping in the double darkness that hung over him exclaimed, though he slay me yet will I trust in him. Blessed is the man, said Jeremiah, that trusteth in the Lord and whose hope the Lord is. And Isaiah says, Who is among you that feareth the Lord? Let him trust in the name of the Lord and stay upon his God. It was faith that brought down the fiery chariot and carried Elijah up to heaven. And he might we quote the whole of the 11th chapter of Hebrews as a most elegant and forcible demonstration of the strength of the faith of the saints under the old dispensation. Doubtless you remember how we are there told that by faith Enoch was translated that he would not see death - how Noah By faith prepared an ark to the saving of his house - how by faith Abraham went fearlessly out not knowing whither he went and how by faith he raised the deadly knife over the bosom of his innocent Son - how By faith Isaac blessed Esau and Jacob blessed the sons of Joseph - how by faith, Moses refused to be called the Son of Pharaoh's daughter - choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season - how he forsook Egypt passed through the Red Sea and the forty years wilderness - and how by faith many others, subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions - quenched the violence of fire - out of weakness were made strong waxed valiant in fight turned to flight fight the armies of alienation. And this same Apostle who so forcibly describes the faith of the ancients was himself a triumphant instance of it. Under its full influence you hear him exclaiming, I know in whom I have believed - I have fought a good fight - I have finished my course - henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord the righteous judge will give me in that day. The apostle John also what an assurance of faith does he exhibit when he says- this is the victory that overcometh the world even our faith. We know that we have passed from death onto life because we came we love the brethren. And what was it but faith that gave to the other Apostles and the evangelists and the mighty army of martyrs - the triumph over their passions - over the temptations before them - over the assaults of the adversary and finally cry over the agonies of an untimely and agonizing [cruel] death? O it was a faith that could remove mountains - a faith of which the world was not worthy - of faith which is now most gloriously rewarded in heaven. (see last page, Asterisk *)

The second distinguishing feature in the character of those who inherit the promises was a trust for salvation in the Lord Jesus Christ. To the ancient saints there was a darkness hanging over the character of the redeemer yet feeling their need of some righteousness not their own they joyfully serve upon the obscure intimations given them of the one great sacrifice to come as the days man between God and their souls who should lay his hand upon them both. Said Jacob to his sons, The scepter shall not depart from Judah nor a lawgiver from between his feet until Shiloh come and unto him shall the gathering of the people be. Said Moses to the Israelites, The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet from the midst of thee of thy brethren like unto me unto him shall ye hearken. And we are told by Paul that Moses, esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt. Said Job, I know that my Redeemer liveth and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth. And we need not mention the descriptions of Christ in the Psalms and Prophets of which they are full. Is it not also unnecessary to say that the servants of the Gospel dispensation whether they lived - lived to Christ and whether they did die to Christ? It was not only the language of Paul but of every faithful preacher of the Gospel – I determined to know nothing among you save Jesus Christ and him crucified. This name indeed has been the believers support and trust and consolation and triumph in prosperity and adversity and his glory constitutes the everlasting song of the redeemer.

The sufferings and sacrifices of those who inherit the promises while on earth forms a third distinguishing feature of their character. The assertion of Paul that, all who live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution, will in some sense apply to all Christians but it applies eminently to those whose history is contained in the bible. Which of these was not forced to sacrifice his comfort (ease) or wealth or life to his religion. Moses esteemed the reproach of Christ greater than the treasures of Egypt and by adhering to his duty he lost a crown – and subjected himself to all the hardships of a forty years sojourning in the wilderness. Lot was compelled to abandon his possessions in Sodom and escape for his life. David complains repeatedly of those enemies who persecuted him without a cause. Zechariah was tortured to death – Micah slain unto the sword and Isaiah sawn asunder. The sufferings of these and many besides are described by Paul – And other, says he, had a trial of cruel mockings and scourgings, yea moreover of hovels and imprisonment. They were stoned they were sawn asunder; were tempted were slain with the sword: they walked about in sheep skins and goat skins being destitute afflicted tormented - they wandered in deserts and mountains and in dens and caves of the earth. And after the coming of Christ the firebrands of persecution seems to have been scattered anew. See you not the head of John the Baptist in that charger! See you not the blood of James streaming from the sword of Herod. See you not Stephen sinking beneath a throne of stones. Hear you not Paul in the name of the Christian church exclaiming - we are troubled on every side yet not distressed; we are perplexed but not in despair - persecuted but not forsaken - cast down but not destroyed - always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus. And if you cast your eyes along the history of the church for several centuries what is to be seen but Christians dragged to prison or smarting under the lash - or melting away at the stake. Yet brethren these are the men who now inherit the promises and whose example we are exhorted to follow.

We proceed to mention a fourth striking characteristic of these servants of God which deserves imitation. And that is their peculiar fortitude and resignation under the bereavements of Providence.

Take my brethren the prophets who have spoken in the name of the Lord for an example of suffering affliction and patience. These holy men were indeed subjected to the loss of all things and were often driven from among men - and yet they ceased not to warn their cruel countrymen of their danger.

You have heard also of the patience of Job. Deprived of ten children of many servants and of all his vast possessions in one day and cast from the pinnacle of earthly happiness and glory to the depths of poverty and wretchedness - yet did he acquiescingly say, Shall we receive good at the hand of the Lord and shall we not receive evil? The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away blessed be the name of the Lord. David too wandering a persecuted outcast from wilderness to wilderness could exclaim, when my father and mother forsake me then the Lord will take me up - I was dumb I opened not my mouth because thou didst it. And how many since the Psalmists have in the day of affliction taken his word as the index of their hearts. Oh could they address us from the world of light where they were now inheriting the promises no doubt they would add also the sentiment of the apostle, these light afflictions that were but for a moment have wrought out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

Such are the glorified believers and such the examples the voice of wisdom and the voice of an apostle exhorts us to imitate. And do not the funeral solemnities of this day remind us of another regenerated and sanctified spirit that has gone to join this happy company of the redeemed? Is it not within the bounds of an enlightened charity to believe that she whose mortal remains are before us has (is now) gone to inherit the promises? Perhaps it might be presumptuous of me to decide so important a question because my acquaintance with her has been so short and imperfect. But I appeal for the evidence to this temple of God which for more than thirty years has witnessed her commemoration of the dying love of her Saviour. I appeal to that angel of the Lord who expleth round about them that fear him and delivereth him. I appeal - no I will not call upon her departed spirit nor attempt to penetrate the veil that hangs between earth and heaven - but rather do I appeal to you my hearers - to these garments of mourning - to the tears of affection - and to that deep regret I see pictured on so many countenances. And say ye who have known her best - ye who have been nourished on her bosom and who now follow a fond mother to the grave. Oh do you not testify that she has brought you up for God - and that she has lived the life and died the death of a Christian? I appeal to you ye aged fathers and mothers who have for so many years been her companions - and I read in your countenances the answer - we sorrow not as those who are without hope. I appeal to this whole assembly and who is there that will not say a mother in Israel is fallen? I produce the testimony - the strongest that can be given - the testimony of her life for (more than forty) years among you and if evidence were still wanting I appeal to her firm confidence in the Lord Jesus Christ in her last days into that calmness and resignation she displayed in the hour when your soul lingered on the brink of time and burst away at length on the ocean of eternity.

Another name then Christian brethren is added to the cloud of witnesses with which you are compassed about. Again therefore may our text be repeated with a double emphasis - be ye followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises. This inheritance is theirs because they were faithful in praying faithful in watching faithful in struggling against sin - Go ye therefore and do likewise - Watch ye stand fast in the faith quit you like men be strong - Praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit.

Do you shrink from the thought of fighting always and watching always and praying always? Do you look upon the whole of life as too much to be spent in the work of preparation for eternity. What! Threescore years and ten too long a period to get the mastery over an evil heart - over a hostile world over principalities and powers and spiritual wickedness in high places? Too longer a period to labor for an inheritance whose possession and enjoyment millions of ages will find but just beginning! Three score years and ten did I say? And is this period insured to you? Are you certain of 50 years of 40 of 30 of 20 of 10 – nay of one?

Yet you say, Christian, or your conduct says that the whole of life is too much to spend in working out your salvation. Oh estimate the value of that prize you are striving to obtain. It is not the riches or honors or pleasures of this world. It is not an earthly crown or kingdom. It is not a position that will terminate with three score years and ten - no nor a million doubled and multiplied without end. Estimate the value of this prize did I say? No - never can it be done until you can look through eternity - until you can measure the height and depth the length and breadth of the law of God.

And yet this life - swifter than a weaver's shuttle a vapor that appeareth for a little time and then vanisheth away - a flower blooming in the morning and withering in night – a dream that passes away ere we awake - this life is too long to spend in laboring for that prize which numbers cannot measure nor thought estimate. O what think ye Christian brethren would be the language of your departed friend were her voice permitted once more to be heard. Would she comment that she had spent too much time in the service of God. Would she regret that the prize of immortal glory is too mean for so much watching and fighting and praying? Would she exhort you to be more devoted to this world and to relax in your exertions for heaven?

And what think ye would this departed friend now say to those of us who have not yet taken one step after the example of those who are inheriting the promises? What would she say? What has she said? What has she said in her example - what in her profession of faith in the Lord Jesus! What upon the bed of death!

A lesson silent but of sovereign power.

And methinks we can even now hear her voice blended with the voice of prophets and apostles the speaking to the impenitent - it is high time to awake out of sleep - Work while it is day - The night cometh wherein no man can work: For there is no work nor device nor knowledge nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest. Behold now in the accepted time, behold now is it is the day of salvation. We are ambassadors for Christ as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ that be ye reconciled to God.

Sermon 59 Connection Between the Moral Character of Parents and Children

[Sermon No. 59, "Connection Between the Moral Character of Parents and Children," Exodus, Ch. 20, 1821 Jul, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 8]

Exodus 20:5 – 6

For the Lord thy God am a jealous God visiting the iniquity of the Fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; and sharing mercy unto thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments.

Ezekiel 18:20

The Son shall not bear the iniquity of the Father neither shall the Father bear the iniquity of the Son; the righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him and the kindness of the wicked shall be upon him.

[Interesting discussion of parental influence on children.]

Both the texts we have read are represented by the sacred writers as coming from the mouth of God. The first was delivered amid the thunderings and lightnings of Sinai and last is communicated to us through the prophet Ezekiel. The first is the solemn enforcement God gives to the second commandment of the decalogue and the last is the decisive answer of God to those Israelites who complained that they were compelled to bear the sins of their Fathers.

The infidel would doubtless discover in these passages a plain and irreconcilable contradiction. For in one of them God declares that he will visit the iniquity of the Fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generations and in the other he as decidedly declares that the Son shall not bear the iniquity of the Father. These passages do indeed carry with them an apparent opposition and it may not be unprofitable to attempt their reconciliation especially as in thus doing we shall be called to examine some principles of great practical importance.

From a comparison of the two parts of our text with the general tenor of scripture and reason we think the two following propositions result which, if established, remove all appearance of contradiction or injustice.

First in a certain sense God deals with children according to the character of their parents.

Secondly - in a certain sense God does not visit the iniquity of the fathers upon the children nor reward the children for the righteousness of their parents.

In discussing the subject we shall however invert the order of these propositions and find endeavor to show in what sense is God does not think the children according to the character of their parents.

Although there is a close connection between the conduct and feelings of the parent and his child, yet the latter does not in all cases sustain the same moral character as the former. In this sense therefore God does not always visit the iniquities of the fathers upon the children nor cause the son of the believer to tread in his footsteps. The history of the church furnishes many cheering examples where a son or daughter have been saved from the contaminating influence of ungodly parents - and over whom a daily intoxicated parent - the continual blasphemy of a father - and the adulterous wantonness of a mother - has had no influence to bear lure them from the wraths of the destroyer and who have come forth from such a moral pollution bearing the cross of Christ and shining among the adopted of God as the star of the first magnitude. There was Moses who escaped unhurt from all the temptations and pollutions of an Egyptian court - one of whose inmates had adopted him as her child. There was Abijah the Son of Jeroboam who as the prophet Abijah he declared, had done evil above all that went before him, was alone of all that wicked family permitted to come to his grave in peace, because there was found in him some good thing towards the Lord God of Israel. Asa too one of the worthiest of princes of Judah was the son of the wicked Abijah and who does not remember Jonathan the amiable son of Saul. But experiences also even in these days exhibits many instances of the like character. We see many a Lot maintaining his principles and Christian practice in the midst of many a miniature Sodom like a vigorous plant flourishing in the region of the dead and sending forth a wholesome influence from an atmosphere poisoned with a mortal contagion.

On the other hand it is painful to see many a son in dispute of the example the counsels and the prayers of a pious father and mother bent upon ruining his own soul and breaking their hearts. In vain has he been nursed on the bosom of piety and from a child instructed in the holy scriptures. In vain does filial affection and all the admonitions and entreaties of pious and parental fondness urge him to fly from the path of destruction. And God also answers not the supplications with strong crying and tears that are made to him in behalf of this infatuated child. Instances of this character are to be met with in the history of all nations. The third human being on this earth you recollect was Cain. Abraham in the bitterness of a disappointed father cried out to God, O that Ishmael might live before thee! Thereby implying that he had forsaken God. And the man after God's own heart had his peace broken by the incest of his Amnon and his life pit in jeopardy by the rebellion and unhallowed ambition of Absalom.

We need not appeal any further history or experience to prove that God does not in all cases entail upon the children the moral character of their parents. Neither in the second place does he punish the child in this world or the next for the sins of his father nor reward the child in this or a future world for the virtues of his father.

We know that there has been in former days and by some even now a language is used implying that the posterity of Adam are not only punishable for his sin but are actually guilty of it. And if this were indeed true it might with equal force apply the same reasoning to the relation between any parent and his child. But we have not so harmed Christ if so be that we have been taught of him. The idea that one man can consistently with justice be punished for the doings of another which is implied in the declaration that we are punishable for Adam's sin must be denied either from reason or the bible - let us see from which?.

It is a principal in casuistry too plain almost to need a labored argument in its support that no moral action is or can be transferable from one free agent to another. For the very definition of such a being implies that it is only for his own voluntary deeds and motives that he is accountable - or rewardable. He may indeed suffer consequences for the sins of another or be benefitted by the virtues of another. But there is a wide difference between suffering and punishment. The first may come upon a being in consequence of his necessary connection with another being and does not by any means imply any displeasure on the part of God towards the sufferer. Much less does it imply that the guilt of the guilty is literally imputed to the innocent so that God inflicts upon innocent beings the punishment of another sin. Now the connection between Adam and his posterity is such that in consequence of his sin they suffer (death for instance) yet we have no evidence that this suffering comes upon them as a punishment for his sin and until there be found some such evidence we have a right to infer the contrary: because the supposition is irreconcilable with our ideas of perfect justice. It may indeed be said that had every individual of Adam's posterity been placed in his situation they would all have been guilty of the like offense and therefore it is right that all should be punished for that sin. But let such a principle be brought down to the affairs of common life and see to what extravagances it will lead! We see many who manifest a most decided disposition to steal to defraud and murder and whom mere local circumstances prevents from the commission of such crimes. Would it therefore be just to cast these men into prison as thieves and defrauders and murderers? Precisely as just my hearers as it would be to punish children for the crimes of their parents because they inherit from them similar dispositions and might therefore in like circumstances commit similar crimes.

On the other hand it is as absurd to suppose that in justice any one being will be rewarded strictly for the virtues of another. What if the virtues of another cannot be regarded as his virtues - God may show favour to one being in consequence of what another has done - as he has in fact done to man in consequence of the merits of Christ but in this case there is no real transfer of righteousness from the one to the other. Adam is pardoned through Christ's sufferings and obedience: but throughout the scriptures we find it uniformly kept in view that Christ's righteousness still remains his own righteousness and is not actually taken from him and implanted in the soul of man as his own individual rightful property. For if such were the case man might claim salvation as a debt due from God.

Reason then my hearers decides unequivocally that God does not in this or another world punish the children for the crimes nor reward them for their virtues of their fathers. And to determine what the Bible decides upon this point we need only refer to the last part of our text. During the Babylonian captivity the Jews had a proverb whose import was that they were suffering for the sins of their fathers. God therefore sent Ezekiel unto them to vindicate his justice and the language of this prophet to his countrymen it might seem should forever set at rest the question whether men are punished for the sins of their fathers. What mean ye that ye use this proverb concerning the land of Israel saying the fathers have eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth are set on edge? As I live saith the Lord ye shall not have occasion any more to use this proverb in Israel. Behold all souls are mine; as a soul the father so also the soul of the Son is mine: the soul that sinneth it shall die. Yet to this decided declaration of the prophet the Israelites reply by an allusion to the former part of our text which is a part of the second commandment of the decalogue. Why? say they does not the son bear the iniquity of the Father. To this the prophet again replies, When the son hath done that which is lawful and right and hath kept all my statutes and hath done them he shall surely live. The soul that sinneth it shall die. The son shall bear the iniquity of the father neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son. The righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him. The tenor of the whole bible evinces that a wicked man will be punished for his own sins and for his own sins only and that a righteous man will be rewarded for his own righteousness and not for that of his progenitors.

But this remark shows us that we have reached the second division of this discourse in which we are to enquire in what sense God deals with children according to the characters of their parents. We have already remarked that the former part of our text implies that in some way or other God does thus deal with children. And in the first place He inflicts upon the offspring of irreligious parents many temporal judgments and bestows upon the children of pious parents many temporal mercies.

Who has not heard of those diseases which sometimes are hereditary in a family to the third and fourth generation? And many of these are originated by the ungodly conduct of the first father in the series. Thus a man may have indulged till it has become a second nature a passionate and unkind disposition and it is by no means improbable that his son or daughter may have towards this sin a strong constitutional tendency. And not to add any more to the disgusting list the man of habitual intemperance after often entails upon his children an almost unconquerable inclination towards the same brutal indulgence so that those children may be called natural drunkards.

But these are not the only judgments of God experienced by the descendants of the irreligious. Want and Infamy almost inevitably attach to the intemperate the profligate and idle man and in these evils his children almost necessarily share. It may be wrong but it is difficult to look upon the son of a thief or liar or robber or gangster or drunkard or blasphemer or adulterer without remembering his father and having a suspicion exciting within us that the son may follow in the same course of perdition. Some of this clan do indeed by their conduct manifest so permanent and decided deterioration of the habits of their parents that we have no such fears: but where we know little of the child there is in truth much reason to fear that through the influence of example he may imbibe the like poisonous principles and follow in the same track to hell.

But this picture is entirely sincere in the case of religious parents. Their children inherit the firm constitutions and the healthful habits of their fathers and share in the well-earned fame that follows virtue in its most retired walks. We mean that these things usually take place not inevitably and while they manifest in the exceptions the sovereignty of God they also exhibit the complacency with which he witnesses parental piety.

In the second place God deals with children according to the character of their parents by giving them in most though not in all cases the same moral character as their parents. He has so constituted the human mind that it almost inevitably endeavors to imitate those to whom it is most nearly allied. Natural reverence therefore - natural affection every thing indeed conspires to make the child endeavor to imitate its parents. Why therefore should not the temperate industrious and amiable parent find growing up around him temperate industrious and amiable children? And on the other hand why should not the profane sneerer expect to his children inheriting from him the tongue of blasphemy? And why should the covetous man calculate upon any other than a niggardly pennywise spirit in his children? Why should the hardhearted man look in his children for a feeling of sympathy and compassion? Why should not the progeny of a prayerless man cast off fear and restrain prayer? Why should not the descendants of the man who is ignorant of the bible remain as ignorant as himself? Why should not the idle man expect a responding cry from the mouths of his children, a little more sleep a little more slumber - there is a lion in the way.

And these evil habits which are thus imperceptibly and almost inevitably derived from parents very generally become firmer and firmer through life and conduct the miserable child to everlasting perdition. So that the father and the son having jointly sinned through life sink together into that world where the son will not cease through eternity to reproach the father and the father the son the one for his poisonous example the other for his blind imitation.

Yet let it not be said because a parent who is irreligious usually drags down with him his children to endless ruin that therefore they are punished for his sin. No they are free agents - they have had the warnings of conscience of reason of the bible and the Holy Spirit all conspiring to tell them that they are following down to the chambers of death. And if face they still persist unless righteously will they be eternally punished not for their fathers iniquity but for their own - and amid all the agony the reproaches and blasphemies of eternity never will they dare on this account to lisp a murmur against the justice of God.

Many solemn and interesting reflections crowd upon the mind in review of this subject my hearers: but we have room for dwelling only upon this one. What an awakening motive is here presented to parents to improve every opportunity in their power for bringing up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord!

We have shown you the close connection there is in the government of God between the exertions and examples of parents and the eternal welfare of their children. It is in vain to murmur that such a connection exists for it most certainly does exist - and who is there so devoid of sensibility as not to do that the utmost in his power to secure if not for himself yet for his children everlasting happiness? Who is there so devoid of the common feelings of humanity as to neglect those whom he may be the means of making blessed forever? Who is there so wanting in love for his own children as the lead them voluntarily into a misery no language can describe and no minutes estimate? O by all the tender feelings you possess for your offspring by the mercies of God of infinite compassion we conjure your parents whether you be Christian or not - let not your example be such - let not your neglect be such - let not your cruelty be such as to conduct these precious immortal souls committed to your care to that world where, hope never comes that comes to all.

And my brethren may we not regard as one of the means put into your hands for securing your children from eternal misery the institution of Sabbath schools? Certain it is that these have been blessed all the civilized world over. Certain it is that thousands in Europe and many in this and other lands have in those schools first felt the arrows of conviction fastening upon their consciences and making a wound none but the great physician of souls could cure. Certain it is that the praise of these institutions is in all the churches of Christ throughout the world and they have caused many a heart among the poor and ignorant - nay among the rich and learned also to sing for joy. And indeed why should not the study of the scriptures be one of the most powerful means God has put into our hands for repairing for heaven? For he is directed all men to search the Scriptures and commanded parents to track these things, to their delinquent children and to talk of them when they sit in their houses and when they walk by the way and when they lie down and when they rise up. God therefore will most assuredly bless those children who faithfully and diligently study his word and where can they study it to better advantage than in an institution like the one we are now contemplating.

And is it possible parents in view of this subject and in view of the subject we have this morning presented before you is it possible you should be indifferent? Is it possible you should neglect to bring forward your children to put them in the way of preparing for a blessed eternity? O beware lest these children reproach you on their dying beds. What if it should prove that these schools were the only means God in his providence would condescend to bless for their salvation! And what if you be first made acquainted with this fact in the day of judgment! O be wise in time. Beware parents of bringing upon you by neglect the eternal reproaches of your children. Beware ye children of misimproving the present precious opportunity. But beware ye instructors of offending by your recent unfaithfulness one of these little ones and thereby involving them and yourselves in everlasting and eternal woe.

Sermon 60 Consecration of All to God

[Sermon No. 60, "Consecration of All to God," Isaiah 52:1, 1821 Jul, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 9]

Isaiah 62:1

For Zion's sake I will not hold my peace and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.

[Reference to important Unitarian theologians of Hitchcock's day, Noah Worcester, Thomas Scott. The end of the sermon seems to be missing.]

This ardent and elevated resolution of the prophet must have had for its object not merely the temporal good of Jerusalem and Zion. Under those terms he unquestionably comprehended the Church of Christ and when in the visions of God his eye was carried along the stream of time to the latest generations of the earth and saw the gathering of all nations unto Shiloh that was to come - when among the rest his own brethren were flying to his standard as clouds and as doves to their windows - it is no wonder that he should feel an ardent desire to see these days of peace and joy hastened on. No wonder when he learnt that God would give bring about these glorious days through the prayers and labors of his children, he should within an holy love to the church resolve to set an example of resolution and perseverance in the use of means. And not only did he intercede himself for the prosperity of Zion but he exhorted others to do likewise - ye that make mention of the Lord keep not silence, and give him no rest till he establish and make Jerusalem a praise in the earth. Go through go through the gates, prepare you the way of the people, cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people.

From our text my hearers we may derive two very important principles which we shall endeavor to defend and illustrate.

- 1 - God is establishing his kingdom in the world for the instrumentality of men
- 2 - To the advancement of that cause men are bound to hold all their faculties and possessions devoted.

It was an act of the most glaring infatuation and impious rebellion in man to spurn away from him the authority and protection of heaven and to set up the standard of universal revolt throughout the race. To defy even in archangels who excel in strength be regarded by sober reason as unwarrantable presumption: but how does it magnify this perception to contemplate man as throwing the gauntlet of defiance against his Maker, man whose strength is weakness and who is crushed before the wrath! How then can we measure the length and breadth the height and depth of that love which could stoop from the throne of Omnipotence to extend the sceptre of mercy to this rebellious outcast! Yet God has thus stooped and has put in requisition the whole universe to secure him from misery. Need we tell you of that covenant between the Eternal Father and the Eternal Son? We refer you to the 53rd chapter of Isaiah. Need we tell you of an Holy Spirit Comforter sent down to regenerate and save the elect of God according to his knowledge? You will remember the first Pentecost after Christ's ascension. And then to is the Bible which is mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds casting down imaginations and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ.

Yes to all this preparation it was necessary to add the instrumentality of man in order that the kingdom of God might be set up in an alienated world. The church of God undoubtedly began with Adam: that is he was a member of the true spiritual church: but in the days of his son Seth the first declaration of the existence of the church seems to have been made - And to Seth to him also there was born a son: and he called his name Enos: then began men to call upon the name of the Lord, or as it is translated in the margin, to call themselves by the name of the Lord. That is evidently they took upon themselves the title of the Sons of God considering themselves as a peculiar people in distinction from wicked men who were then as now governed by the god of this world - the Prince of the power of the air. And ever since that early period there have never wanted a few to constitute the kingdom of God - to vindicate the honor of God and to form a rallying point for his friends in a world of enemies. To defend and enlarge this Zion - many a Moses and Savior many a king and many a prophet spent their strength and their lives among the Jews. And to give a deathblow to opposition - to destroy the works of the devil was the son of God manifested in the flesh - driven through the world shelterless and friendless insulted and crucified. And then are after him his company of disciples and evangelists whose hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob to fight the battles of faith. And though those were days of peril when all the opposing hosts of earth and hell were sallied to crush the church yet did these men wax valiant in fight and turn to flight the armies of the aliens. Though the enemy then came in like a flood yet did the Lord lift up a standard against him and the king of David prevailed over the giant sword of Goliath. How appalling to any but such men as the disciples of Christ must have been the prospect before them when commanded to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature - a world whose powers whose inclinations whose rulers whose practice was all arrayed against them - a world universally lying in wickedness - a world in which they were regarded as the offscouring of all things and the filth of the earth. Yet was it enough to render them unmoved in view of all these discouragements to have before them the example of the Master and to know that they were about to labor for the salvation of the souls of their fellow men - and for a crown of glory as their reward. Neither did these men consider personal exertions and sacrifices unnecessary because God must give the increase. They labored as if all depended upon themselves as they prayed as if the works depended wholly on God. But their record is on high as it is also in your hearts my hearers. And you ought never to forget that it was through the instrumentality of such men that the kingdom of God has come even unto us and has not been destroyed amid all the buffetings of Satan the devastations of progeny and the hostility of the human heart.

The kingdom of God on earth is compared in the prophecy of Daniel to a stone cut out without hands and becoming a great mountain and filling the whole earth. By the Psalmist the church is called a vine - Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt thou hast cast out the heathen and planted it. Thou preparest room for it and didst cause it to take deep root and it filled the land. The hills were covered with the shadow of it and the bows there were like the goodly cedars. She sent out her boughs unto the sea and her branches unto the river. We live in a day when this stone has already become a great mountain: but it does not yet fill the earth. That vine which has been so often wasted and burnt with fire since the days of Christ is in these days shooting forth new branches in every direction and already its fruit is scattered through many nations. But do you think that this stone would have thus enlarged or this vine thus extended without the culture of man? Experience shows that when men do not dig about it and prune it and water it it universally decays and where men are most unwearied in its cultivation there is this vine the most vigorous in its growth and most productive in its fruit. God has promised that he will cause this vine to spread out and its benefits to the humblest corners of the earth. Glorious things are spoken of thee O city of our God. I have shown by myself says Jehovah the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness and shall not return that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the seas. And is this mighty work to be accomplished by a miracle? Brethren do we believe that the tenor of the Scriptures and the dealings of God with this church for eighteen hundred years evince that the same means will be employed to the end of this great work that we are now employed. We believe that an increasing interest in the hearts of Christians in a tenfold greater effort than the world has just witnessed will be all the miracle by which God will because all nations which he has made to come and worship before him. God has commanded his followers to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. But had he intended to convert any by miracle this command would be superfluous and not binding upon men.

The second principle involved in the text in our apprehension is that men in Christian lands are bound to hold all their faculties and all their possessions devoted to the advancement of Christ's kingdom among men. For Jerusalem's sake, I will not rest till the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness and the salvation thereof as a lamp burneth. This expression implies that this prophet would exert himself to the very utmost of his abilities to bring about such a state of things in the Church. For had he stopped short of devoting himself and his time and possessions to the object he would have rested in a degree and left his resolution unperformed.

But what do we mean by saying that we are bound to hold our faculties and possessions devoted to the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom? We do not mean that every man must forsake his regular calling and become a minister of the Gospel or a missionary because every man has his own proper gift. We do not mean that man should bestow all the property upon benevolent objects when this would reduce them and their families to want and misery. For this would retard rather than advance the cause of religion because he that provides not for his own household hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel. We do not even mean that in ordinary cases men should neglect their regular employments to advance the cause of religion: because in general they will most promote that because by regular and industrious attention to their ordinary business. And yet there is little need of cautioning men against such an excess of zeal - for few are there who will voluntarily forsake houses and lands and wife and children for the cause of Christ and where one man neglects his secular business to attend to religion ten thousand neglect religion to attend to their secular business. But to return to the point -

By the phrase that we are bound to hold our faculties and possessions devoted to the cause of Christ we mean that we ought to look upon those faculties and those possessions as borrowed of God and that he has the right to demand them at any moment and for any purpose. Hence then if God has a particular object to effect say for instance to establish his kingdom on earth, and he has declared that this shall be done through the use of the faculties and possessions he has given to man we say should look upon himself and his property pledged to effect that object. And he should watch the indications of Providence to see just how much of his individual efforts and individual charities are necessary for accomplishing the work. It may be that the fingers of Providence will clearly point out to him that he should devote himself and his possessions exclusively to the work and devices of a missionary. It may be that a variety of considerations render such a course inexpedient and that a part of his services and possessions only are required to carry on the great works. This is in fact the case with the great majority of men and indeed some have so many other more imperious duties pressing upon them that their exertions and charities are necessarily much limited. And yet we can scarcely conceive of a man in such circumstances that he is not bound to do something to promote the most important object on earth - the advancement of religion. Certainly is he bound to yield his own heart to its influence and thus will he add one subject to God's kingdom.

We proceed to exhibit briefly the grounds of the right God has to claim our faculties and possessions for the advancement of his kingdom. And first he drives this right from our creation.

This argument to induce man to submit to the sovereignty of God was formerly put into the mouth of Jeremiah. Behold as the clay is in the potters hand so are ye in my hand O house of Israel. Paul too appeals to the same illustration. Hath not the potter power over the clay to make one vessel unto honor and another unto dishonor? We will suppose a potter to have dug clay from the earth with his own hands and to have formed it into such a vessel as he saw fit would you not say without hesitation that this man had a right to use that vessel in any way he wished? And if the mere molding of that clay gave this man an undisputed power over the vessel formed from it how much more unquestionable is the right of God over those creatures he has made to use them in whatever way his wisdom or will may choose?

God denies another right to the services of man from the redemption by his Son. Man long under the curse of a broken law and without that redemption must inevitably and eternally have perished. And besides God was under not the shadow of an obligation to send his Son to die for man's offences. Yet did he raise the sword against the man that was his fellow man was rescued and saved. A debt of gratitude therefore is imposed upon him which he cannot conceal though he devote every faculty and every moment and every possession to God's service.

Another ground of God's right to the services of his creatures is driven from his preserving them. What if his hand were withdrawn from beneath them for a moment? They must inevitably sink. And more than all this man for his sins deserves thus to be forsaken of God and to drop into annihilation. God's condescension and mercy therefore richly deserve the consecration of every faculty and possession to his will and to be disposed of for his glory.

We might add other grounds of God's right to employ the services of his creatures - but we have already established it by a triple argument and a threefold cord is not quickly broken. The only question that remains is whether God does in fact require his creatures to devote their faculties and possessions to the advancement of his kingdom in the world.

Have we not already shown my hearers that God has established that kingdom through the instrumentality of man? Does not the text imply this? Do not a host of texts calling upon Christians to come up to help the Lord against the mighty imply it? Does not the history of the church in all ages especially since the days of Christ irresistibly establish the fact? And if any more proof be wanting we refer to that most decisive command of Christ to his disciples go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. Here is a command reaching to every disciple of Christ and imperiously binding upon everyone so long as there is a human being on earth who has never heard the good news of a Saviour. For that this command was not confined to the first disciples is evident not only from the subjoined or promise that Christ would be with them always even to the end of the world but also because those apostles could not preach the Gospel to every creature even if they had been as unwearied as their master. If then the Disciples of Christ

If then the disciples of Christ in every age are commanded to preach the Gospel and if they cannot all go forth personally to do this as ministers or as missionaries must they not do it by their prayers by their mutual exhortations and by their possessions and is not every child of God born to regard himself and all that belong to him as pledges for the fulfillment of the command? And as all men are solemnly required to become the disciples of Christ we do not see why the same conservation of all they are and all they possess is not binding upon every son and daughter of Adam - where the Gospel has come.

We cannot dismiss this subject without making two enquiries. First, what have we done my hearers for the cause of Christ?

When we put this question to professors of religion we will not insult them in this day of exertion by asking whether they have done anything nor is the question whether they have done enough to silence the rebukes of conscience in this world - but have we done so much as we shall regard enough up at the bar of God? Have we done so much that we shall not be ashamed in that day to have an account of it held up before the Universe? Have we done so much that we shall not wish in that day we had done more? I charge a deficiency in these things upon no one but myself - yet it will not in any case be unprofitable to urge these enquiries upon our consciences, for if we should judge ourselves we should not be judged.

But are there not some before me who if asked what they have done for the cause of Christ, would be compelled to answer that they have not yet even given him their own hearts? What! live in a Gospel land with the Bible in our hands and have one day in seven set apart expressly for the purpose of making our peace with God - and have set before our eyes almost daily on the one hand the joys of heaven and on the other hand the pains of hell - and be told from the word of God that if we believe not the Son we are condemned already - and yet after all do resist this world of motives and persevere in holding back our hearts from Christ and in trampling under foot the son of God O this is an infatuation at which devils would be confounded and angels weep!

The second enquiry we have to propose my hearers is this - What do we intend to do in the future for the cause of Christ? Have your exertions Christian in behalf of your God and Redeemer been feeble. Have your prayers for the uncorrected moved and for the twice dead brethren been few and formal. Have your admonitions and exhortations and charities been checked or stunted by an insensible heart? Thus it is high time for us to awaken out of sleep. What think ye of the immortal souls around you dead in trespasses and sins and hurrying onward blindfold as fast as time can carry them to their final and eternal doom - whom perhaps your prayers were they fervent and effectual might secure? What think ye of that mighty empire the prince of darkness maintains over so many nations? Do you not see his many strongholds in this rebellious world - his towers and ramparts standing in the midst of us - overlooking the fortunes of Christianity and frowning upon them a proud defiance? And what think you of those dark places where this terrifick prince stretches a sceptre tremendous as his malice can make it over an unresisting multitude and every heart becomes as gloomy and hopeless as that world where this monster reigns upon a throne of fire and brimstone? And yet this black dominion stretches over many a heart, many a tribe and many an empire of our world.

But on the other hand the subjects of God's kingdom on earth are comparatively few and apart from his assistance their exertions are comparatively feeble. And in addition to this an alarming inroad has of late been made upon that kingdom. A voice has come from the east and the voice from the west a voice of us against Zion - a voice proclaiming that the strong pillars of the Church have fallen. Scott and Worcester are gone - men who for many years have stood in the forefront of the hottest battle with the enemies of God and hazarded their all for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ - men who were mighty in the Scriptures - men whose praise is in all the churches - men whose names the poor miserable outcasts of India and Africa and the islands of the sea and the natives of our own wilderness have often repeated in broken accents and with tears of gratitude - and who will weep in the unaffected simplicity of nature over their memories as for their fathers. Yet have these men fought a good fight - have they kept the faith and through now they have finished their course yet do we believe that there is laid up for them crowns of glory that will never fade away.

Servants of God! well done!

Rest from your loved employ

The battle fought the victory won

Enter your Master's joy. (Hymn by James Montgomery?)

No doubt at the fall of such men the prince of darkness and all his legions triumph and take fresh courage. But to every surviving Christian the loss of such eminent services speaks an awakening lesson. But that triumphing believers in Christ must be made short. Let every man who loves our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity at such a season fix firmer upon him the armour of the Gospel. Let him pray that the mantle of Elijah may fall upon some Elisha. Let him serve up his heart to a more resolute encounter than ever with the enemies of godliness. Let us all awake in the strength of the Lord - and in the strength of the Lord resolve that for Zion's sake we will yet know our peace and for Jerusalem's sake we will not rest until God's...

Sermon 61 Men by Nature Dead in Sin

[Sermon No. 61, "Men By Nature Dead in Sin," Exodus 12:33, 1821 Jul,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 9]

Exodus 12:33

We be all dead men.

The Egyptians in the days of Pharaoh and Moses saw one judgment after another come upon them so rapidly and heavily that they were at length aroused to the danger and urged the departure of the Israelites from the land. They had seen the turning of their rivers into blood followed by an inundation of frogs - nest of flies – then of lice - after this a deadly plague upon their cattle - then fiery boils on man and beast - then in Jerusalem the thunder and hail the locusts and a proverbial darkness. And at last God smote them in a tender point by slaying their first born. Alarmed and subdued at length by those evils that waxed more and more intolerable, the Egyptians were urgent upon the people that they might send them out of the land in haste for they said We be all dead men.

My hearers what if we should make use of the words of the text in a spiritual sense? What if in the face of all the tenderness and sensibility and amiableness and morality to be found among us I should bring forward and an undistinguished charge upon the whole human race and endeavor to maintain the by nature, We be all dead men? Dead in trespasses and sins - dead to our eternal interests – dead to all homage and love towards God? No doubt the man of many fine accomplishments will be disgusted at so sweeping a charge made upon him - a charge which stamps at once an entire worthlessness in the sight of God upon all his deeds of honor integrity and benevolence because they want that without which no action can be pleasing to him that is known to him as their motive – a charge in short which brands the forehead of every unregenerate man from the most openly corrupt to the most upright with the same odious inscription - an enemy of God. And yet severe and unfounded as this charge may seem to any we come forward fearlessly to make it. Let us appeal to the evidence. The assertion you recollect is that by nature in other words before regeneration in a spiritual sense, We be all dead men.

The final evidence we have to address in proof of this assertion is the Word of God.

If any charge us with illiberality and severity in making the charge of spiritual death upon every unregenerate son and daughter of Adam the Ephesian church had the right reason to regard Paul illiberal and severe when he tells them without exception, And you hath he (God) quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins. Wherein in time past ye walking according to the courage of this world according to the prince of the power of the air, the Spirit that none marketh in the children of disobedience. But Paul does not stop with the Ephesians. He applies the same character to every professor of religion that then existed. Among whom also says he that is among the children of disobedience, we all had our conversation in times past in the history of our flesh fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind. But neither does Paul stop here. Though he had charged every every professed Christian on earth whether Jew or Gentile with having been once dead in trespasses and sins yet now does he extend this charge to the whole human family. For he added And we were by nature the children of wrath even as others.

My hearers we beg you to look once more at this most decided and alarming text. Paul is here addressing the Gentile church. And he tells them indiscriminately that they were formerly dead in trespasses and sins. And what can this mean but that they were utterly alienated from God in their hearts and given over to work wickedness greedily and therefore enemies of God. We say therefore enemies of God because the carnal mind which they possessed is enmity against God. And the Apostle tells the Ephesians that in this state of Spiritual health they, in time past walked according to the course of this world according to the prince of the power of the air. The Spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience. According to the course of this world! What is that my hearers? Most certainly according to the customs fashions and maxims of the world. And with what does the Apostle couple the course of the world? According to the course of this world, says he, according to the prince of the powers of the air the Spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience. That is whoever lives according to the customs fashion and maxims of this world do in fact live according to the will of the Devil. And therefore you Ephesians formerly lived according to the will of the Devil. Yet certain it is however harsh this language may sound to our ears that Paul charged that whole church with having formerly lived according to the will of Satan. In that church undoubtedly were many who before regeneration had been amiable and respectable. And yet the Apostle makes no distinction nor does he tell them that they occasionally were under his influence but that they walked in the paths of the great adversary - that is their lives were devoted to the performance of his will.

In then directing the Ephesians to their original opposition to God, Paul was reminded of his own original state and he next proceeds to declare that the same charge of living under the influence of Satan might justly be fixed upon himself and indeed upon every Christian then living. The Jewish Christians having had the oracles of God and so many advantages might be thought to have been before conversion comparatively pure. But Paul applies the same language to Jews and Gentiles. Among whom or after the example of whom says he that is among the children of disobedience we all had our conversation in times past in the lust of our flesh fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind. These children of disobedience were those in whom Paul says, the Prince of the power of the air now worketh. And they lived according to the course of this world. Now the apostle declares that himself and all other Christians had followed their example and therefore he declares himself and all other Christians to have lived formerly under the influence of Satan and to have been dead in trespasses and sins.

But the Christian church at that time was small and perhaps all its members had formerly been of abandoned character. While among the better part of society among Jews and Gentiles many moral and amiable men might be found to whom Paul would never apply such sweeping and severe epithets. Listening then to the concluding member of the sentence and we were by nature children of wrath even as others. That is they were by the indulgence of their natural deprave dispositions exposed to and desiring of the wrath of God even as others. And whom does he mean by others unless it be the whole human race? What is there to limit the phrase to a few? We can perceive nothing. The same charge therefore that Paul fixed upon the Ephesians he fixes upon himself and upon all his fellow Christians and finally he fixes it upon the whole human family. The text we have been considering most certainly contains without stretching its meaning by one jot or tittle the following assertions. All men before their conversion whether Jews or Gentiles are dead in trespasses and sins. They live according to the course of this world according to its customs fashions and maxims. Nay they live according to the will of Satan and under his influence. They live to greatly gratify the lust of the flesh and the desire of the flesh and imagination. They live totally regardless of the will of God and therefore and by nature liable to suffer the eternal wrath of God.

Is not this my hearers the fair and evident meaning of the Apostle? Can you candidly affix any other to this passage without harming it? We had collected a number of texts from Scripture to establish this same point. We intended to repeat to you the declaration of the Lord Jesus when he said that even now the dead hear his voice and come forth alluding to the natural heart. And we could have held up before you the terrific description Paul gives in Romans both of the Jews and Gentiles while in a state of unregeneracy: and how he calls upon him, that sleeps to awake and arise from the dead that Christ might give him light. And how John describes the conversion of himself and others as a passage from death into life. But we think it but best upon the whole to let the doctrine at this time to rest solely on the text we have so fully explained for if that does not convince men that they are not really dead in trespasses and sins we know of no human language that can do it and if they will evade that text they will evade all language of the bible.

The second evidence we produce to show that men are naturally dead in trespasses and sins is the history of the human races.

Whoever believes the scriptures must believe that the knowledge of the one true God was communicated to the first inhabitants of the world. And yet how soon and universally man turned to idolatry! Now soon did he corrupt his way upon the earth, and change the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man and to birds and four-footed beasts and creeping things so that God can give them over to a reprobate mind! The Jews too could not be restrained from idolatry that sin of all others most hateful to God by a constant repetition of the most astonishing miracles. Even at the foot of Sinai all the glory of God rested upon its top like a devouring fire did this nation see a molten calf and fall down to worship it.

All these facts prove a strong inherited tendency in man to idolatry - and if this does not show a heart sunk in Spiritual death we know not that any proof can be given. What forget the being who made us and upholds us - the being who is alone worthy to be supremely loved and obeyed! Forget the most interesting fact that can possibly be revealed to man! Nay more not only to forget God but prefer to believe in and to trust in those idols which can neither see nor hear nor know - forsake the eternal all manifest God and trust in a stock or a stone! If this does not show that we are all by nature dead men we again ask how can it be proved?

But again - Ever since the days of Adam the earth has been filled with violence and blood - and all the vices and enemies that were ranked in the bosoms of devils have let loose to rage and riot among men. God looked down from heaven upon the children of men to see if there were any that did understand and seek God. They are all gone aside they are altogether become guilty; there is none that does good no not one. Where then in the whole earth could any thing be found that might be called spiritual life? O the sleep of death has been upon the eyelids of men ever since the days of Adam and would seal them in eternal slumber did not the Spirit of God give life to a few. Among the innumerable millions that have peopled this earth there has been indeed much that was amiable and upright and in the view of men really praiseworthy: but the eye of an omniscient God looked upon the hearts of all these millions of men in their natural state and pronounced of every one of them that in relation to him there was an utter alienation and the God who cannot die has declared that among them all there was none that did good - no not one.

The third proof the we be by nature Spiritually dead men is found in the fact that while in a natural state we are prone to disbelieve it.

It is a command of God to his creatures that they should love him with all their hearts and minds and strength and that in every one of their actions they should have a reference to his glory. Now it is a fact which every man must acknowledge that the great majority of men totally neglect this command and live in forgetfulness of God. But unregenerate men do not generally look upon this fact as evidence that men are Spiritually dead. On the contrary they are disposed to think well of the human heart and to excuse its sinfulness. This is just what we might expect from a man who was himself spiritually dead. We should presume that he would not realize his disorder: because he is sunk so low by it that he is in a state of almost as great insensibility as that of natural death. The history of the church too will show that these men who have been most eminent for their piety have had the deepest sense of their own innate depravity. While on the other hand it is a very common thing for those who will acknowledge themselves to be destitute of religion to look up on man's heart as containing some innate goodness and be offended at the heavy charges of Spiritual death in opposition to God that are made upon us by an hardhearted gloomy and unyielding orthodoxy. And as the different views of this subject by these different men is just what we might expect if these charges be true we think there is hence derived a presumptive argument that they are true. The man therefore does not view his heart as deceitful above all things and desperately wicked has reason to fear that the state of religion within his soul if he had any is at its lowest ebb.

We have a hand another evidence that by nature we be Spiritually dead. And that is the indifference and neglect with which men treat the offers of the Gospel.

Had the Gospel contained a system of the most rigorous and difficult requirements - had it for instance demanded man to love a cruel and malignant being had it demanded of him an atonement for his sins - had it made necessary the most severe penances and pilgrimages - had it proposed merely sensual rewards - we should not then think it strange if a rational being should disregard and neglect such a Gospel. But how contrary to all this is the Gospel of Christ! It exhibits a God of boundless compassion holding out a proclamation of pardon to those rebels who lay under his curse - nay it not only proclaims pardon but it exhibits God reaching out his almighty arm to draw these rebels from their prison. Man stands upon the brink of hell with his eyes closed and the Gospel is sent to warn him of his danger to open his eyes and to take him by the hand and lead him to heaven. It holds out salvation as a free gift purchased by the blood of the Son of God. And now man has nothing to do but to lay hold of the cross of Christ and he will surely be carried up to heaven. But if he will not seize upon this anchor he inevitably sinks into everlasting burnings.

And now my hearers what success has this Gospel met in the world? There have been many there have been thousands who have devoted their lives to the work of urging them to accept of it and be saved. And yet though the world itself the world itself would scarcely contain the books and sermons that have been written and preached on the subject during the last 1800 years yet in every age the church has consisted only of a very few - while the great the overwhelming majority have disregarded or despised the Gospel of Christ. If you do not regard this fact as proving men to be in a state of spiritual death account for the phenomena if you can. But depend upon it you will search heaven and earth in vain for any other explanation.

But my hearers let us bring this experiment this argument nearer home. Let us bring it within these walls. Yes we call these walls to witness that here the Gospel of Christ has been praised for more than half a century. We call them to witness that many of you have heard from this pulpit Sabbath after Sabbath month after month and year after year the calls and invitations the doctrines and precepts the promises and threatenings of the Gospel - that here you have had life and death set before you - that here the character of God and the character of man the requirements of God the duties of man have been exhibited that here you have been exhorted to repent and forsake your sins and make you a new heart and embrace Jesus Christ by faith. And now what has been the effect of all these appeals to your understandings and hearts and consciences? We will not doubt but that some of you have been in ordered to flee from the wrath to come. But let me ask with an earnest solicitude do not many of you remain unaffected by all these addresses we have made to you in the name of God? Have not many remained as insensible under our ministrations as if we had called upon the dead who sleep in their graves beneath the walls of this church? Are you not as far from the possession of religion as if you had never heard its invitations. And permit me to ask is there not a sleep upon your souls so deep and so lasting that it may wiser be called a spiritual death? For what else death could resist for so long the awakening calls of the Gospel? We speak not here of the manner of our preaching: for however feeble and imperfect that may have been: yet is the very subject itself proposed in ever so homely a dress enough to stir up all the energies of any being who is not sunken in a slumber deep as the grave? Why is it then that our voices have been sounding for so long a period with little more effect than if they had been sounded over a graveyard? Shall we say it is because you are dead in trespasses and sins? We do not say it - but yet what else can it be? O (in the name of God) by the value of your undying souls I beseech you let these questions into your consciences.

The last evidence we shall mention that by nature we are Spiritually dead is the stupidity of Christians.

If religion be indeed so invaluable a treasure if with it man is joint heir with Christ to an inheritance incorruptible undefiled and unfading and if without it he lies under the wrath and curse of God which will follow him and lie heavy upon him forever - then we say how can the man who possesses this religion remain unmoved by all its glorious hopes and promises how can he be insensible to the condition of those who have it not - how can he fail to use every method within his power for bringing his religious fellow men to embrace a Saviour. And yet is it not the fact that the great majority of Christians at least of professed Christians do not feel thus earnestly solicitous for the salvation of those around them with whom God is angry every day and upon whom the vials of his wrath are just ready to be poured out without mixture? Here then is a strong evidence that by nature men are spiritually dead. For if those who have tasted the Lord is glorious are so little affected with the dangers of their brethren and with their own glorious prospects it is a certain proof that they themselves are but a little way removed from a state of spiritual death.

But Christian brethren we will bring this argument also nearer home even within these walls. And here perhaps a false delicacy might urge me to pause but I should warn the feelings of many whom I esteem and respect and love: but no - away with all that delicacy which would draw a covering over the flames of hell which would not dare to tell the unregenerate man that he is treading over a lake of unquenchable fire. Look then around you and see how many of your companions neighbors and how many of your friends and how many of your children are in this very condition. How many are there whom you love as your own souls be because they are your children how many with whom you daily meet in the literary Social Circle and exchange the kind offices and intercourse of life - how many who have for years come with you to the same house of worship - how many whose amiableness and kindness you admire and love how many among these I say who with all their interesting qualities give no evidence that they are born of God on whom the preaching of the Gospel has had no abiding influence and who as you see them drop one after another into the grave you are compelled to believe must go down to a world of utter hopelessness and despair! And now Christians what have you done to snatch these immortal souls from that precipice on which they stand? God has appointed you to be the instruments of their salvation. But he will enquired of to do this for them. And have you prayed for them as earnestly and effectually as you might? Have you warned them as you ought? Have you exhorted them as you ought? Why then are they not brought into the fold of Christ? We know that the Spirit is always willing and that God is more ready to bestow his grace than men are to ask it. It must then be because Christians are not more faithful and thorough in their prayers and admonitions of expectations that so many among us are crowding the broad road of destruction. For experience shows that whenever the children of God are thus stirred up the Spirit of God is uniformly poured out upon the impenitent. What reason then have we my brethren in this place to hope that our friends and neighbors will be converted which there is such a death like insensibility among us towards their danger such a lukewarmness in our prayers and such a slothfulness in our exertions!

And what a conclusive argument does this low state of religious feeling and action among us afford. Shall I say that Christian professors are Spiritually dead? Rather would I say it is a proof how smothered and quenched is the spark of holiness within them by the remaining body of sin and death. And yet once more do we call upon you to look around you and see how many of your dearest friends are living under the wrath and curse of God. Are they not in relation to God all dead men? And how shall the bonds of death be unloosed unless by the Spirit of God through your prayers and exhortations? O by your love to these immortal souls - by the mercies of your God and Redeemer - by the bowels of Christian benevolence - and by the vows of this Lord that are upon you have pity have pity upon these your friends and neighbors and children who without a change of heart must be forever miserable. Brethren it is high time to awake out of sleep - it is high time because it will soon be too late to intercede for those around you who are dead in trespasses and sins. For soon will you be removed beyond the regions of prayer and they will be removed beyond the regions of Mercy. And this reflection leads to another solemn thought. On our communion Sabbath how few of the children appear with their parents at the table of the Lord! Yet these gray headed professors are sinking one after another into the grave; but no son comes forward to take the place of his father no daughter to take the place of her mother. A little time and these fathers and mothers will all have passed into eternity. And then who shall stand up in this place for the Lord? Who will be left even to tell the melancholy story of our much loved Zion and drop a tear of pious sorrow over her desolate ruins?

Sermon 63 Repentance

[Sermon No. 63, "Repentance," Luke 13:3, 1821 Jul,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 9]

Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish.

Here is an article of faith and an article of practice proposed to us which we fearlessly set down as essential to salvation. Whatever man who profess to receive the bible as a mediation from heaven may believe concerning other articles supposed some to be therein contained they cannot hesitate to regard in words at least repentance towards God as absolutely necessary to secure his favor. For here we have the doctrine from the mouth of Christ himself delivered with a plainness no man can obscure and with an emphasis that must mark every conscience. Christ had just finished a long discourse to his disciples and the multitude. And there were present at that season some that told him of the Galileans whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. And Jesus answering said unto them suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans because they suffered such things? I tell you nay, but except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish. Whoever these persons were they doubtless were conscience smitten by the awakening discourse they had just heard Christ deliver and thus directing his attention to these Galileans they endeavored to diminish their own sins which were less enormous. But Christ instantly stripped away this delusion with an alarming application replied to them as above. And to give his doctrine a deeper hold on their consciences he proceeds with the following addition and repetition - On these eighteen on whom the tower in Siloam fell and these them think ye that they were sinners alone all men that dwelt in Jerusalem? I tell you nay: but except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish. Thus did Christ couple these self - righteous pretenders who strove to exculpate themselves from blame merely because there were some other men in the world who were worse - these did he couple with this vilest offenders. Plainly declaring to them that all who did nothing did not repent of their sins reviewed by us righteous God as essentially the same because all were stamped with an order defection from the love and service of God.

If then the doctrine of repentance be universally acknowledged by all professed believers of the Bible – nay more by infidels themselves to be the very corner stone of every man's religion we hope that we shall obtain of you my audience a hearing while we attempt to enforce the words of Christ we have chosen for a text. For coming before you as we do with a doctrine which you believe equally with ourselves we need not spend a moment in proving its truth. Yet it may be well before we present the motives before you to an immediate repentance to explain the nature of repentance or in other words to show what is implied in that godly sorrow which Paul says, worketh repentance unto life.

In a general sense repentance signifies a real and genuine sorrow for sin. Yet as this sorrow may arise from a variety of causes and produce totally different effects the one of which says Paul is death and the other life it will be necessary to state some discriminating marks by which godly sorrow may be known from that of the world.

And first evangelical repentance implies just views of sin.

There are those among men whom Solomon calls, fools who make mock at sin, regarding it in the light of infirmity. But the greater part of men when asked will confess that sin is offensive to God. But still these views are shall I not say infinitely below the truth? They do not feel this to be, an evil and a bitter thing that they have forsaken the Lord their God.

But the true penitent no longer sleeps over such false hopes and views. Sin rises in enormity of magnitude in an accelerated proportion now that he is brought by Spirit of God to see against how holy and merciful a Being he has transgressed and how he has resisted, line upon line and precept upon precept. Nay more how he has resisted all the kindness that has been displayed to him by his long-suffering Father in heaven. And as he resolves this subject in his mind he is led at length to regard the least offense of his life as rising on the scale of moral turpitude till no numbers can estimate it and he is led to enquire with the Temanite of old - Is not my wickedness great and mine iniquities infinite?

But there is such a thing as a man having a distressing sense of sin and yet having no godly sorrow for it. In such a case the person is alarmed chiefly at the consequences of sin upon himself in the world of unquenchable fire. But the true penitent looks upon sin in itself an evil of untold magnitude. He regards its nature with a reference to the character of God and he cannot conceive why anything that is opposed to infinite purity should not be infinitely vile and why anything that thwarts the designs of infinite benevolence should not be disserving of eternal wrath. That such a thing as this is sin and therefore does this man now that he is taught of God fear to limit the evil of sin. And when he looks to its actual efforts upon devils and men and his own soul he finds this view of the subject substantiated.

The second thing implied in evangelical repentance is hatred of sin.

It is impossible that a man may hate sin merely because it is likely to involve him in future punishment. Let the penalty answered to its commission be taken away and perhaps he may love it. But the reverse is the fact with the real penitent. He hates sin for its very nature so that if there were no heaven nor hell still could he feel towards it an unconquerable aversion. And for this Judaic reason it is opposed to his taste. He dislikes it for the same reason a man does some kinds of food. He has acquired a relish holiness which is contrary to sin and to be pleased with both at the same time would be a contradiction.

Again the real penitent will hate sin because it is an injury done to God for whose character he has now a reverence and love. The purposes of that God appear to him to be alone productive of all the happiness of the Universe and he cannot therefore avoid feeling a settled aversion towards that which throws a bar in the way of a full accomplishment of the denying of infinite benevolence.

A hatred of sin will also be experienced by the real penitent on account of its effects. Now will all his better feelings rise up in opposition to that deadly evil which rendered it necessary for the Word of God to become incarnate - to suffer the protracted malice of man - the temptations and assaults of devils and to feel in the garden of Gethsemane and on the cross the intolerable curse of a broken law! And then when he looks at the stubborn and unprovoked malice of Satan and his angels manifested in his seduction of our first parents and in his unwearied efforts to distress the Saints and delude the sinners into the everlasting fire how will he loathe those abandoned outcasts who so far as he knows first made a break in a universe of happiness and introduced a confusion and distress which eternity will not see removed. When he looks on the world around him also and sees the wide wasting hand of sin and how it has enslaved the immortal mind of man and filled the earth with sighs and tears what desolation has been made by sin in that once beautiful habitation where but for this the image of the love of God might have rested forever. O there will be awakened in the in the penitent breast an unconquerable hatred to sin in devils and men - on earth and in hell.

A third thing implied in genuine repentance is a full and free confession of sin before God.

Never was there a more humble and sincere penitent than David when he perused the 51st Psalm and before God he exclaims, acknowledge my transgressions and my sin is ever before me. Job too when humbled at last by the power of God and made to see his sins and corruption cried out, I have heard of thee by the hearings of the ear but now my eyes seeth them. Wherefore I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes. Nehemiah also and the other captives who returned from Babylon devoted one fourth of the day to the confession of their sins and they said, Thou art just in all that is brought upon us: for more hast done right but we have done wickedly. Whoever therefore when burdened with a sense of his sins finds within him no disposition to confess his transgressions before God if he is rather disposed to flee from him, he may justly conclude that his repentance is that of the world which will wake death.

The fourth thing implied in genuine repentance is a reformation of the conduct.

It was the universal language of Christ and the Apostles repent and bring forth works meet for repentance. That is to say if you repent and then stop - if you do not abandon those evil courses over which you mourn your repentance is merely superficial. There may indeed be a sorrow for a particular sin but unless a decided effort be made at the same time unless for a reformation the penitent arouse like an armed man and cut off the right hand or pluck out the right eye which has offended he evinces that he is answering not for sin itself but merely for its consequences and that his sorrow is not deep enough to answer any other purpose than to seal up his eyes in a slumber which nothing but a miracle can break.

And it is the permanence my hearers it is the continuance month after month and year after year of those reformations begun in seasons of justice penitence that can alone prove us to be genuine followers of Christ. Every other proof of true repentance may fail us because there is a counterfeit penitence so nearly resembling the truth. But thus if it be attended with the same aversion toward sin we had in the beginning or rather with an increasing hatred of it furnishes a proof that will support us on a dying bed. We tremble therefore for the man whose repentance is only of a few days or weeks spanning - especially do we shudder for the fate of him who has put off the work till he is upon the bed of death - because he cannot have in this world any decisive evidence his sorrow for sin was not merely the sorrow of a Judas. And should he open his eyes in eternity and find this to be the case we ask you where is his remedy or his refuge?

Such are the distinguishing marks of that repentance which Christ calls upon every one of us in the text to exercise. Yes he calls upon every one of us my hearers who are now in this house of God to mourn over our sins this moment. And to neglect of this command there is a penalty annexed whose tremendous import the racking agonies of eternal fire can alone disclose. Can we not then my fellow sinners find some motives to persuade you to an immediate and thorough repentance?

In the first place what think you of the fact that repentance is solemnly and repeatedly commanded by God?

God says this the Apostle, now commandeth all men everywhere to repent. Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? Saith the Lord God; and not that he should return from his ways and live? As

I live saith the Lord God I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live: turn ye turn ye from your evil ways: for why will ye die? Come now and let us reason together saith the Lord: though your sins be as scarlet they shall be white as snow; though they be red like Crimson they shall be as wool. And what think you my hearers of such reasoning as this - and of such commands as these?

We might multiply the like extension exhortations from Scripture till the setting sun but would this persuade you to repent? Yes we repeat it does the solemn and reiterated command of the God who made you and, who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell - move you to repent. Do you not hear those commands and expectations and threatenings with as much concern as if they were mere idle tales?

Secondly - we ask you what think you of this motive? That without repentance your heaven will inevitably be lost.

Without holiness no man shall see the Lord. And repentance is just as necessary to go before holiness as the heat of summer is for the production of the first of the fruit of the earth. There is my hearers but one straight and narrow path to heaven for the rich and the poor the learned and unlearned - and in the very commencement of this path lies repentance. So that if a man refuse to submit to this depend upon it he is not in the road to happiness. For God has guarded it by a double flaming sword against all the those who have not turned unto him with all their hearts and with fasting and with weeping and with mourning. The sacrifices of God are a broken Spirit: a broken and contrite heart. O God thou wilt not despise. But the unbroken and unhumbled heart he will despise - and heaven will certainly be forever shut against the man who has not sorrowed after a godly manner for his sins.

Thirdly what think you of this motive that without repentance hell will infallibly be your portion.

We might soften this language and tell you that without repentance you are in danger of future misery. But why should we not speak plainly? If you are not prepared for heaven by repentance and if no man will ever enter there without repentance where do you expect to go if it not be a companion of the undying worm and a sufferer in the unquenchable fire? We long O impenitent sinner to tear away every thing that conceals that bottomless gulf and we long to direct your eyes steadily into its fiery cavern while yet you stand upon the world of hope. Once more then do I say to you with a solemn conviction of its truth that, except ye repent ye shall all perish.

We derive a fourth motive for immediate repentance from the fact that the works tomorrow will be more difficult than today.

If the path of the just be like the dawning light that shines more and more unto perfect day - on the other hand the path of the impenitent is like the evening twilight which lessens and lessens until it becomes perfect night. That is if Christians gradually progress in holiness - sinners gradually progress in wickedness. From the very nature of man - from the nature of habit there never was and there never can be any stationary point in a man's moral feelings. If he is not becoming better he is becoming worse. Apply this illustration to the case under consideration. A man neglects repentance until the morrow. In the meantime his habits become more firmly fixed and his sins become stronger. His habit has been to live impenitent and to overcome this a stronger effort will therefore be necessary tomorrow than today. Whereas the disposition to attend to it then will also be less and less. Under the circumstances what reason has a man to expect that he shall repent tomorrow unless God pour out upon him a more powerful influence by his Spirit? And is it a reason to presume that this will be the case because the man has resisted and slighted his influences today? Look at this subject my hearers in any light and you will find the conclusion forced upon you from every side that your insensibility and slavery to sin will be deeper tomorrow than it is today and that therefore there is a less probability that you will then repent. And yet this consideration does not alarm you.

A fifth motive urging men to repentance today is the fact that tomorrow it may be impossible.

This impossibility may arise in two ways. First you may not be in a world of repentance tomorrow. There is no work nor knowledge nor wisdom nor device in the grave whither thou goest. And is it certain that you will not like a multitude of those before you be called ere another another morning sun shall shine upon you into eternity? Hast thou made a covenant with death? O your covenant with death shall be disannulled and your agreement with hell shall not stand: when the overflowing scourge shall pass through there shall ye be trodden down by it. And what if it should pass through this night and you should awake not in a world of hope but in a world of despair? We tremble for the man who suspends his happiness on so brittle a thread as human life.

The second because that may render repentance tomorrow impossible is the fact that ere that time God may withdraw from you his Spirit. And why indeed should he not do this? What have you done impenitent sinner what have you done to retain his influences? Have you submitted to them or slighted them? Alas does not the fact that you remain impenitent show that you have always resisted the Holy Ghost? And yet you do not fear that His patience is exhausted and that the irrevocable sentence has gone forth against you. Let him alone he is joined to his idols. But what if indeed this should now be your condition? What if heaven were now to be opened and you should see the recording angel writing down that decree against yourself? Thank you that you should ever after have any godly sorrow for sin? Do you not know that Christ was exalted to give repentance and that without the Holy Spirit your heart will never feel anything unless it be the undying worm of despair? And yet if the close of day sees you impenitent you have certainly good reason to fear that another morning the Spirit of God will have withdrawn forever.

These in brief are the motives that urge men to immediate repentance. But we cannot dismiss the subject without a few remarks suggested by it.

And first every Being and event in the Universe calls upon men to repent.

The heavens above us and the earth beneath us and all the various animals in the air the water the ground serve to manifest the astonishing wisdom and benevolence of God and therefore do all these things exhibit the ingratitude of man in sinning against such a Being without contrition. Every event with which we are acquainted addresses to us directly or indirectly a call to repentance. Is it what we call a prosperous event? Surely the goodness of God to lead us to repentance. Is it what we call an adverse event? What louder call can a man have to humble himself before God than when he is rebuked by him? Holy angels also call aloud upon men to repent. For their sinless characters furnish such a contrast to our sinful ones that it exhibits in a striking light the bitter evil of sin. Devils too impenitent and obdurate as they are under the wrath of God address to man an awakening exhortation to repentance. For their example shows us precisely what will be our characters and sufferings a few thousand years hence if we do not humble ourselves and weep over our sins.

Yet secondly notwithstanding this universal call how many of mankind will remain deaf to it and risk eternity impenitent?

After so many awakening addresses and motives have been and continually are addressed to man from God and Christ and the universe - nothing but the melancholy fact would persuade us that they could resist them. But what shall we say to the distressing truth that thousands every year on their dying beds confess that they are strangers to repentance! And this too even in a Christian lands where the Scriptures are in every one's hand and whence from Sabbath the Sabbath the call to repentance is sounded from the pulpit. Where indeed is that congregation to be found in which the very many do not remain unconcerned about their eternal destiny. And what an heart rending thought is it that some of those now hear me will live and die without repentance! And yet is not this as probable as anything else that is not capable of demonstration? For as I said before where is that congregation in which there are not many who live and die impenitent? If then the case be different with this assembly it must be the result of a miracle and a miracle we have no right to expect. Yes dreadful as is the thought we have no reason to doubt but that a part of this audience notwithstanding the calls of God and Christ and the services to repentance will live and die impenitent. Would to God this thought might arouse us to enquire as did the disciples of Christ when he told them that, One of them should betray him. Lord is it I? O that the voice of the archangel and the trump of God might be sounded in this assembly to call you to repentance ere it sound over your graves to call you to the judgment.

In the last place can Christians take this view of the subject without weeping and praying over the impenitent? If it be true, would to God it were not true, but there are some in this house who will resist every call to repentance made by God or man even till they lie upon a bed of death. O Christian you need not look beyond your own neighborhood to find the most pitiable objects of compassion. And be assured that if there is a spark of true religion in your hearts you will feel for them – Be insured also that your tears if they be sincere will not be vain and your prayers if they be fervent and effectual will be heard in heaven and answered. If there be some who will withstand forever the stirrings of God's Spirit there are others in the same impenitent state who will at last yield. O weep for them who never weep for themselves. O pray for these who never pray for themselves and God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth - and you a reward unspeakable and full of glory.

Sermon 64 Efficacy of Prayer

[Sermon No. 64, "Efficacy of Prayer," James 5:16, 1821 Apr,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 9]

James 5:16

The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.

It must have afforded peculiar delight to the Church of God in primitive times to have been assured by an Apostle that their fervent and effectual prayers availed much. Living among those who regarded them as the filth and offscouring of the earth what a consolation to know that through prayer God would protect and comfort them. Living in the midst of a world lying in wickedness what an animating thought was it that they had within their hands an engine more powerful than all civil or philosophical institutions in the world for arresting the stream of corruption. And that they had only to go into the their closets and there offer the fervent effectual prayer and an influence would be drawn down from heaven that would bring sinners around them out of their double darkness and translate them into the kingdom of Christ.

And is not this same promise thus consoling and animating to the children of God? The offense of the cross has not yet ceased. And still is it true in an extreme view that not many wise men after the flesh not many mighty not many noble are called. Still it is in some sense true that they who live godly in Christ Jesus suffer persecution. And still is there the slumber of Spiritual death upon the eyes of millions so that without exaggeration it may still be said that the world lieth in wickedness. The Christian therefore needs and the devoted Christian realizes the promise of the text. And it was in the days of the Apostle so now we believe there are many fervent effectual prayers that avail much.

We propose at this time to show in what sense prayer does avail much - in other words to show the efficacy of prayer.

And first prayer has a most salutary influence on the heart of him who practices it.

Let us suppose a man who believes in the existence and attributes of God to kneel down before him in prayer. If he sincerely kneel there he must be solemn. There is no such thing as looking up and addressing holy almighty heart searching jealous God without feeling a reverence - a godly fear even if we are not Christians. Every thing indeed in his character and in our own - and the object for which we come before him to beseech mercy and forgiveness and deliverance from eternal miseries all these things conspire to produce a solemnity not to be found in any other transaction of life. And what state of mind can be more favorable than this to our eternal interests? The unholy passions within us are now calmed and and we can look at the character of God and the character of man without anything to warp the judgment and consequently see them in their true colors. Whereas amid the hurry and perturbations of the world if we look at these subjects and all it is through a preventing medium and the influence of such a view is too slight to awaken our exertions.

Prayer also tends to enlighten and quicken the conscience and plainly because we then see the character of God and our own in a clear light. The eyes of the understanding are then almost inevitably opened and this is the very avenue to the conscience. Some men for instance will attempt to justify themselves in conversation for a habit of gaming – or of a debauched life or for a break of the sabbath or for their neglect of religion. Yet we challenge any such men to go into their closets and kneeling before God to present these petitions. O God grant thy blessing upon the game of cards I am about to play! O God be with me and bless me in the drinking frolick I am engaging in! O God sanctify to me this day my violations of the sabbath which are necessary! O God bless to me my neglect and of thy holy word and of the religion of Christ! Now the reasons that men cannot present such petitions before God which they will justify themselves to man is because conscience is awakened like an armed man wherever a person seriously attempts to pray.

Another salutary influence of prayer is that it teaches us our dependence upon God.

The very fact that we come to supplicate the mercy and blessings of God will show us inevitably that this is the source from which alone we can receive those favors. And we cannot call to mind a single thing which we possess that did not come from God. A sense of unworthiness to receive these gifts from God will also unavoidably go along with a sense of dependance and thus will a proper state of mind be produced within us for the reception of God's mercies we mean a state when we realize that very good gift and very perfect gift is from above and that they are bestowed through to sovereign mercy. In a most special manner it would seem that a man bowing before such an holy and Almighty God must feel deeply that all spiritual blessings must flow to him from heaven or he must forever remain without God and without hope.

It may be well to mention another influence of prayer upon unregenerated persons who practice it - and that is it teaches them that so long as they continue in a state of unregeneracy see they cannot pray in the manner and with the feelings required by God.

Such men in general indeed very rarely pray - certainly not in their closets. Yet before making the attempt in earnest they perhaps universally believe that they can pray in a manner satisfactory to themselves and acceptable to God. And when they are afflicted with their sinfulness at length and with a solemn concern for their eternal destiny they always pray. Indeed in such a state of mind it is impossible to prevent them attempting this. Yet amid all the anxiety and nervousness of awakened sinners to pray they soon begin to doubt their own ability to pray as they ought and soon to believe firmly that their prayers are wholly destitute of evangelical worth. Such a mortifying lesson as this usually brings down the proud heart of the converted sinner into the dust to realize his absolute dependance on the righteousness of Christ if he is ever saved. And this state of mind state rarely acquired in any other way is that in which God usually sheds down a regenerating grace. The utter helplessness of his condition is thus discovered to him and he is brought to lie at the feet of sovereign mercy.

We proceed to consider a second mode in which effectual fervent prayer availeth much and that is its efficacy in processing blessings from God. That God does actually answer such prayers by the bestowal of some good temporal and spiritual we shall now endeavor to prove.

Prayer as has already been shown produces in men that humble dependent state of mind which it is proper for him to possess under the reception of mercy. And it would appear rational to suppose that God would be more likely to confer blessings upon the man who is humble and thankful than upon him who is proud and ungrateful. Yet it is sometimes objected to this view of the subject that it is absurd to suppose that the petitions or feelings of a creature so magnificent as man should change the councils of the Almighty and Omniscient God, with whom is no variableness neither shadow of turning. But the prophet Daniel that emphatically prayerful man did not look upon this difficulty as any obstruction to prayer. During the Babylonian captivity we find him thus speaking – In the first year of his (Darius') reign I Daniel understood by books the number of the years whereof the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah the prophet that he would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem. And I set my face unto the Lord God to seek by prayer and supplication with fasting and sackcloth and ashes. Here we perceive that though Daniel knew the exact year in which the captivity would terminate yet he set himself forthwith earnestly to pray for it. Doubtless he looked upon prayer as every man ought to regard it as the appointed means by which that event would be brought about and that if God had determined to release the Jews he had also determined that their prayers should be the instrument. And just so is it in regard to every answer we receive to prayer. If it be already determined in the divine council to bestow certain blessings upon any man it may be determined also with equal certainty that they shall be prayed for so that the prayers that are offered may still be said to be the means through which the blessings are obtained while the council of God is not thereby changed.

Having thus shown as we trust that the degree of God is no objection to prayer we proceed to the proof that God does actually bestow mercies upon men in answer to their effectual fervent prayers. And the difficulty in this case lies not in the want of texts in the scripture to establish the point but among so many to make a selection.

Christ in his inimitable sermon on the mount introduces this subject and says Ask and it shall be given you; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you: For everyone that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh fineth and to him that knocketh it shall be opened. If ye being evil know how to give good gifts unto your children how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him. This passage is not only proof of the principle we have advanced but furnishes the most animating encouragement to Christians to be instant in prayer. And the like unlimited promise of answering prayer was repeated again and again by Christ as you doubtless recollect. Vanity vanity, says he to his disciples. I ask unto you that whatever ye shall ask the Father in my name he will give it to you. And he spake a parable unto them to this end that men ought always to pray and not to faint. The parable is that of the unjust judge and the poor widow interceding with him and Christ's conclusion is - and shall not God avenge his own elect which cry day and night unto him though he bear long with them. I tell you that he will avenge them speedily. To this we might add the example of Christ in regard to prayer how he often spent the whole night engaged in it - and the exultations and example of Paul and also the declaration of Jehovah by Isaiah - I said not to the seed of Jacob seek ye my face in vain. And when God communicated to Ezekiel the glorious things that would happen to the Jews in future times he adds, yet for all this I will be enquired of by the house of Israel to do it for them.

But we leave this point which very few will dispute and proceed to state as a third mode in which the effectual fervent prayers of the righteous avail much that when the request be such as is not derogatory to the will of God nor injurious to man he will bestow upon the asker that very thing for which he prays. Is not this principle implied in the declaration of Christ to his disciples, And all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer believing you shall receive. Indeed this expression is more unlimited than the statement we have made and seems to imply that Christians might obtain any mercy of God they should ask for – though perhaps it might properly be said that the word believing implies that the exceptions above named since it would not - be possible for a Christian to believe that God would grant anything inconsistent with his own glory or the good of his creatures.

This same promise so unlimited and encouraging was made by Christ to his disciples on several occasions. But the one to which we would particularly direct your attention at this time is that in Matthew the 18th chapter: Verily I say unto you that if two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven. If this promise does not establish the position that Christians may expect to obtain from the specified thing prayed for if it be not opposed to the glory of their God we know of no language that could do it and to confine the promise to the Apostles or to interpret it of special miracles is to take an unwarrantable liberty with the bible.

Numerous examples recorded in scripture prove that this promise has often been realized not only in a miraculous but in an ordinary way. In the chapter of our text James is urging the use of prayer for the afflicted and the sick and he quotes the example of Elias who says he was a man, subject to like passions as we are and in he prays earnestly that it might not rain and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months. And he prayed again and the heavens gave rain and the earth brought forth her fruit. The frequent deliverances of the Israelites through the prayers of Moses were also miraculous - as was also the lengthening of the life of Hezekiah fifteen years and the appearance of Gabriel to Daniel to explain his distressing vision - and the destruction of the Philistines in answer to the prayers of Samuel. But it does not appear to have been any thing miraculous in sparing Abimelech and his family for the sake of Abraham's prayers nor in forgiving the sin of Job's three friends through his prayer and their sacrifice - and how often do the Apostles acknowledge the blessings they have received in an ordinary way through prayer - and continually urge this duty upon their converts as if the very life of their souls depended on (in pencil: Answer to prayer in revivals especially in literary institutions).

But it is only an effectual fervent prayer that availed much - and what kind of prayer is that? Those unfeeling lifeless petitions which too many of us offer up in our closets which scarcely occupy our thoughts while delivering them, these are not fervent nor effectual prayers. Those which we present with an unforgiving temper or while our hearts are agitated with passion or occupied with worldly thoughts these are neither effectual nor fervent. But such a prayer is offered up when, the Spirit itself makes intercessions for us with groaning that cannot be uttered. Indeed to pray in the Holy Ghost and to pray an effectual fervent prayer is the same thing. The Spirit must move upon the heart of the Christian to produce in him holy affections and believing expectations that his petitions will be granted and to excite him to the use of all those means it may contribute to the same end.

But if an effectual fervent prayer can come only through the Spirit how are Christians to acquire his influences and how are they blamable if they remain forever destitute of them! Certain it is hearers that you will never gain the Spirit's influences of this kind so long as you do not wish them - nor make the attempt. So long as you remain satisfied with your present lifeless prayers to God never will you pray effectually and fervently. But is not God more ready to give his Holy Spirit to them that ask him than earthly parents to give good gifts to their children? Where then is the difficulty? In your own heart Christian. And where is the blame if you have not a spirit of effectual fervent prayer? Where surely but in your negligence?

We close this discourse with a few inferences.

1. What a mighty engine is prayer!

God has used this for establishing his church in the world from the beginning. And that surely must be a mighty instrument which can give success to a religion against which there is a triple league of the world the flesh and the powers of darkness all of whom are exceedingly mad against it breathing forth against it threatenings and slaughter. And yet by the men of the world the idea that a few perhaps ignorant men calling themselves Christians can be kneeling down and calling for the assistance of an invisible God bring down from heaven and reforming and a renovating power that shall newly create their fellow man this is regarded by the irreligious is one of the wildest reveries of fanaticism. And yet many a rich many a powerful many a learned man has had a total change wrought in his feelings and views and actions through the secret prayers of those whom these very men perhaps have despised for their ignorance and ridiculed for their superstition. O what a struggle there must have been in the hearts of such men ere they have submitted! And how powerful must be those means through which such an energy of Almighty power is called forth! Yet that instrument is in the hearts of every Christian and it is merely effectual fervent prayer! O why do they not wield it more powerfully and successfully!

2. This subject shows us the folly and sin of those who neglect prayer.

Since the days of miracles there has been but one channel through which God communicates his mercies to man and that is by prayer. And if this can alone fit our hearts for receiving aright the mercies of heaven and if this be repeatedly commanded by God as the condition on which he will bless us is it not a gentle name to call that infatuation which neglects prayer folly. Is it not rather a blind madness? And what though we who neglect prayer may enjoy temporal mercies yet have we not every reason to fear that in more important concerns in our spiritual concerns God will leave us to leanness and ultimate death? If God pours out his fury upon the families that call not upon his name certainly he will upon individuals.

3. From the subject discussed we perceive that prayer in concert is peculiarly blessed.

We can not limit indeed the blessings God may grant to individual prayer: but when two or three are gathered together in the name of Christ he promises a peculiar presence in the midst of them as the text already adduced to show that the specified things prayed for will in general be granted to Christians limits the promise of social prayer - Verily I say unto you that if two of you shall agree on earth as touching any thing that they shall ask it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven.

4. This subject shows us that it is proper and important that Christians when two or three of them meet together should select some individual sinner and pray for him with strong crying in tears.

The text we have just repeated perfectly justifies and enforces this proceeding. And to pray for individuals appears from scripture to have been an Apostolic practice. Besides in our own times it has been ten thousand times blessed. In times of peculiar attention to religion among a people and one sinner after another is convicted and converted it has repeatedly been found after that those very persons had been the subjects of the united and fervent prayers of a few Christians.

And now Christian brethren what we want is that you should not stop with the mere acknowledgment of the correctness of this inference but that you should immediately and earnestly set about the practice of it. We want you not to make it a matter of ostentatious display and public conversation but whenever you meet with those of your Christian brethren who feel a love for the souls of their fellow men we want you should select someone of your families or acquaintance whom you have reason to believe does not love God and bring him in the arms of faith to the mercy seat of Jehovah and pray for his conversion again and again – and God peradventure will give him repentance unto life. But perhaps you reply that you cannot judge the heart and therefore cannot select any person to be the subject of your prayers because you know certainly not who are Christians and who are not. Suppose then that you should happen to mistake and pray for the conversion of one who is already converted. Would it be an unpardonable crime to have besought God as it were in secret that he would render this man eternally happy? No - if he be indeed a believer he will bless you for your kind intention - and if he be unregenerate he will bless you when he is converted. Brethren do you desire that your pure and undefiled religion should be renewed among us? Then will you select and pray for individuals as well as for all these people. And you will not give over those prayers until those individuals are brought to a saving knowledge of Jesus Christ and him crucified. O how can you avoid such prayers when you for many a dear friend hardening his heart in sin and hurrying onwards to the judgment seat unprepared! How can you avoid these prayers when you remember that, if two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask it shall be done for them of your Father which is in heaven!

Sermon 65 No Rest to the Wicked

[Sermon No. 65, "No Rest to the Wicked," Isaiah 57:20, 1821 Aug,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 10]

Isaiah 57:20

The wicked are like the troubled sea when it can not rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt.

The Scriptures regard all mankind in relation to God as divided into two and only two great classes. On the one hand of those called the just - the righteous - the saints - the elect - the children of God - the regenerate - the sanctified - the converted - the apostate sons of God, etc., all which terms are synonymous. On the other hand are the ungodly - the unholy - the transgressors - the sinners - the wicked - the enemies of God, etc., and which terms are also synonymous. The characters and the destinies of these different classes likewise are as different as the names. The one are spoken of as having peace of conscience and joy in the Holy Ghost - as being filled with the fullness of God - as dwelling in Christ and Christ in them - as being like Mt. Zion that cannot be removed but abideth forever - as joint heirs with Christ to an inheritance incompatible undefiled and that fadeth not away - as a chosen generation a royal priesthood an holy nation a peculiar people, and finally as destined to, go into the presence of God where in fullness of joy and to his right hand where are pleasures forever more. The other class she describes as being none of them righteous no not one - as dead in trespasses and sins as those with whom God is angry every day as by native children of wrath - as enemies to God - as loving darkness rather than light - as having the imagination of the thoughts of their hearts evil and only evil continually, as having hearts deceitful above all things and desperately wicked - as training up to themselves wrath against the day of wrath and as destined finally to feel except they repent the gnawing of the undying worm and the flames of the unquenchable fire.

It is the latter class that is described in the text and they are here called wicked. By this term is already remarked is represented all who have not been regenerated however amiable and upright their characters and however orthodox their principles. And of all such the prophet says they, are like the troubled sea when it cannot rest whose waters cast up mire and dirt. We propose to assign at this time some of the reasons why such persons cannot rest.

The prophet certainly does not mean to say that unregenerate men enjoy no comfort in this world for this would be in the face of all experience. But he here compares them with the righteous and in this view indeed their unsatisfying transitory pleasures are scarcely worth naming. The sinners rest is but for a moment if he obtain any (and like the laughter of the fool it is as the crackling of thorns under a pot.) He enjoys none of that settled rest none of that serene satisfaction none of that unmoved firmness of soul which is the lot and the blessing and the joy of the Christian and which will abide and increase through eternity.

It is true that in God he lives and moves and has his being but this is a special and wonderful act of long-suffering mercy - and does not imply that God has any complacency or delight in his character. For between God and all sin there is a wide and impassable gulf and it is the abominable thing which his soul hateth. He cannot look upon it but with the abhorrence and all the tremendous and unalleviated threatenings he has thundered against is in the Bible evince how unchangeable deep and universal is his hatred of sin. But the man of whom we are speaking being unregenerate is in a state of nature - in a state of sin and therefore having never been seen reconciled to God, God is not his friend.

How is it possible men should be at rest while a Being so great and good is utterly alienated from him and is continually frowning upon him and angry with him every day. This being is able to destroy both soul and body in hell holds this man's breath in his hands and yet he is not his friend. God cannot look upon him with any satisfaction or complacency. And what a state of racking uncertainty must that be in which this man lives. No wonder he is like the troubled sea when it cannot rest. The only wonder is that he should continue in that state voluntarily and brave the thunders of Omnipotence.

The second cause why the wicked cannot rest is that Christ is not his friend.

Christ is styled the friend of sinners: but he is not their friend unless they put their trust in him. And to such he will prove a sure defense against the fury of that vengeance which will be displayed against him. And he is indeed the only defense in the universe. God is to the wicked a consuming fire and he will not regard any man with complacency or love who has not secured the protection and friendship of Christ. But this man of whom we speak has most surely never secured that protection or friendship: for he remains unregenerate and therefore, an enemy of the cross of Christ. This man thus has no friend in heaven to plead for him and to shield him from the drowning vengeance of an holy God. Why therefore should he rest in so unguarded friendless a state? Why should he not rather despair?

In the third place this wicked man cannot rest because the Holy Spirit is not his friend.

He is emphatically called the Comforter because it is through his friendly influence alone that men can obtain any true or permanent comfort. He it is that must give the new heart and prepare a man for the friendship of God and Christ. To be without his friendship therefore is to be left without one ray of comfort from anything beyond this perishing world. (O who can bear the idea that in the sacred Trinity he has no friend!)

But in the fourth place the wicked man is not only bereft of the friendship of Jehovah but he is actually and constantly an enemy to God.

Whosoever will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God says the voice of inspiration - and to be a friend of the world is the very essence of an unconverted man's character. The carnal mind also says Paul, is enmity against God. And to have a carnal mind is the very essence of the unregenerate heart. Now a state of enmity implies a disposition to contend with Jehovah. (He presumes to send an arm of flesh to strive with omnipotence and thus bid defiance to the Lord God of hosts.) This language may sound harsh perhaps when applied to an amiable man who is unregenerate: but is it harsher than that used in the bible? Such a man God commands must peremptorily to annihilation. And there is no man who will not feel a distressing agitation when told by the voice of the Bible that in a few years or months or days all his comforts and all his hopes will be at an end - and that whether there be anything of misery for him in an untrodden eternity certain it is that there is nothing of happiness because he is not born again and therefore is never to see the kingdom of God. O no man we repeat it can look at a prospect so dark and cheerless without having his soul stirred up like the troubled sea when it cannot rest.

But when the unregenerate man in seasons of reflection perceives that his hopes and comforts are soon to terminate he would be comparatively a happy man were it possible for his views to stop here. Yet he has often been told most solemnly and he can scarcely read a page of the bible without being reminded of the same truth that there is no middle state in eternity between perfect happiness and perfect misery and that if he is not saved and fitted for heaven, by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost, his hopes and comforts will not merely terminate at death - they will be succeeded by a destruction no language can describe and by a series of miseries of which the great gnawing of an undying worm and the burning of unquenchable fire are faint emblems and whose duration eternity alone can measure. And here do we perceive an eighth cause why the wicked cannot rest. He fears eternal punishment. His views indeed of this subject are resting below the reality: otherwise they would arouse him to flee from the wrath to come. Still however when he reflects upon the subject and reads the scripture he knows that all the wicked - that is all the unregenerate must be turned into hell and as he is sensible that he has not been born of water in the Spirit he must perceive that this threatening includes himself.

And how it must harrow up all the fear and anguish of any person that is not insensible as death to see itself exposed to be plunged it knows not but the next moment into a lake of fire, where the beast and the false prophets are to be tormented day and night forever and ever. Did you ever see a man traveling carelessly on the very margin of a rocky precipice too high to measure and lined on its face with projecting crags? While at every few steps another person would spring from some covert endeavor to tumble him headlong? Then have you seen something that resembles the condition of the unconverted sinner treading carelessly on the very margins of hell whose bottomless caverns at every few steps disease and accidents starting from some ambush endeavor to precipitate him. And now the sinners foothold gives way and he beginning to sink is saved by some projecting crag or twig. Again he renews his foothold and again loses it and all this too on the very brink of hell and directly above the lakes of eternal fire. Can he rest in such a fearful jeopardy? There is no peace saith my God to the wicked.

We have now suggested some of the principal causes why the wicked or unregenerate man cannot rest. But there is a difficulty remaining than that is to make the unconverted man realize that he is destitute of the friendship of God and Christ and the Holy Spirit that he is the enemy of God and that he is under the influence of Satan. Opposed to all holy beings destitute of any hope or comfort beyond this world and a candidate for everlasting woe. That the man under genuine conviction for sin realizes all this yet he who is unawakened cries peace peace when there is no peace. And though he be in fact in this very condition and his heart like the troubled sea when its waters cat up mire and dirt - yet he is but slightly sensible of it because Satan deludes him into a belief that his state is much better than this and because he knows nothing of the holy calmness serenity peace and joy of the pious heart and therefore cannot form a comparison. Let us then take a brief review of the thoughts the feelings and the actions of a man who is unconverted and who in the text is said to have no rest because he has not any true rest. We shall say nothing here of the grosser vices which sometimes characterize the wicked - but only mention some thoughts and feelings and actions that are common to most men before regeneration. And yet we have not selected any individual as the pattern of this description except so far as our own experiences will carry us. Still would to God we might each one of us enquire, Lord is it I?

The unregenerate man walks in the morning and his first thoughts are occupied by some worldly object and do not rise in grateful acknowledgment to God for his preserving kindness. He soon begins to lay plans for the business of the day and is sagacious in adapting them so as shall promote most his temporal interest: but he does not enquire what shall I do this day for the glory of God - what shall I do for the advancement of my soul in holiness? Neither does the thought occur to him that the day now dawning upon him may be his last on earth and therefore it is wise to spend it as our last day should be spent. As soon as this man has risen there is enough in the objects of time and sense about him and in his necessary cares effectually to keep out of his mind the subject of religion. It may be however that he is called (by a pious head of the family) to listen to the reading of the Scriptures and prayer - and though decency requires him to attend yet it is an irksome employment and if his thoughts are not wholly occupied by the world but are directed to the reading of the bible or the voice of prayer he spends his time in caviling against such a text or he smiles at such an expression and he rejoices when he is liberated from his confinement. During the day this man finds employment enough in worldly avocations to occupy his whole time. And when his thoughts and desires are not confined to his particular business his imagination is filled with low or trifling images and his heart with sensual desires. His thoughts during the whole day do not rise to God in prayer nor does he ever meditate upon the glories of his God and Redeemer or upon the joys of heaven or upon the holy scriptures or upon the means of advancing himself in holiness or extending the kingdom of Christ among his brethren. He sits down to the table loaded with God's bounty and rises from it without feeling his dependance and obligations. In vain and worldly conversation he is interested and feels little difficulty in listening to that which is vulgar if it be witty and even if it be such as casts an indirect ridicule upon religion or its professors he does not reprove it. Perhaps too he will converse upon religion so long as the subject is some abstruse point that has little bearing upon practice. But if he chance to fall into the company of those who are eminently pious in the subjects of practical religion are introduced you will perceive at once by the countenance and conduct of this man that he is uneasy and when they speak of being born again - of living by faith and prayers - of their struggles with sin - of the joys in God and Christ and of the advancement of Christ's kingdom, he feels rising within him a strong disgust and he finds that he is among a people of a strange language which he has never learnt. Especially is such a man disgusted and irritated if these devoted Christians should put any questions to him relating to the state of his own heart. He considers this as interfering with that in which they have no concern and indeed we believe that this unwillingness to be questioned concerning their religious state is almost universal among unrenewed man and therefore it may afford something of a criterion for determining whether they are in that state.

But to proceed with the man we have undertaken to describe. After the worldly cares and amusements of the day are over he retires to rest without offering up his acknowledgments to God certainly not in his closet and without reviewing his thoughts and feelings and actions of the day that is past. And this description of one day will answer for most other days - perhaps in seasons of sickness or sorrow he may for a time have more seriousness about him - but he soon returns to his wallowing in the mire of this world and thus quenches the Spirit.

But how can such a man worry through the Sabbath? If he live in a Gospel land he has become habituated to the services of that day so that he attends upon them as regularly as if they were his delight - and as to the truths he may hear from the pulpit he has become so accustomed to hear them and to be exhorted to repentance that they do not disturb his conscience any and therefore he does not object to hearing them. And when searching the scriptures also he never thinks of applying them to himself - or if such a man feel his opposition to religion rising more strongly he hears preaching with a doubting captious disposition and if he has discovered some defect in an argument some violation of good taste in the style or some excessive zeal in the preacher. This is enough to seal the conscience entirely against religious impressions. And as to prayer and self-examination on the Sabbath this man perhaps considers them proper but it may be he has known some professor of religion who for a pretense makes long prayers - and this instance of hypocrisy is enough to keep him in doubt all his days whether it is best to enter his closet and examine his heart and pray. Thus does he stumble over the faults of another first into even to scepticism - then into stupidity and then into hell.

Thus much for the life of the unregenerate man: but what is the character of his death? Here emphatically the wicked cannot rest. Approach him now and ask him if God and Christ and the Eternal Spirit are his friends and he will weep that he has no friends in heaven – ask him if he hearkens to an enemy of God - if the Prince of darkness has ever influenced him - if he has not hate and he will sigh a bitter affirmative holiness and all holy beings - asks him if his hopes are now at an end and he will answer you by a countenance full of despair - ask him if he fears the undying worm and the unquenchable fire and he will answer you by a countenance wild with delirium.

Thus essentially have millions lived thus have millions died. Like the troubled sea when it cannot rest casting up mire and dirt. Thus do we live thus shall we die if we remain in an unregenerate state. Are we then reconciled to God or are we his enemies? Have we been born again of water and the Spirit or are we still in the gall of bitterness and the bonds of iniquity? resisting the Holy Spirit and treading underfoot the Son of God? Do we find the exercise of an unregenerate man as above described to resemble ours? And if our case be thus alarming - if we are still in our sins and under the wrath and curse of God do we mean to make any exertions for bettering our condition? Certainly our mere wishes never will be better it. We must arouse within unconquerable resolution and repent and pray God to send down into our proud hearts his almighty Spirit to humble them and subdue them. And if we must perish at last O let us perish with our faces in the dust and our arms stretched out towards the cross and crying, thou Son of David have mercy on us.

Sermon 66 Sinner's Plea of Inability

[Sermon No. 66, "Sinner's Plea of Inability," Isaiah 30:7, 1821 Aug,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 10]

Isaiah 30:7

Their strength is to sit still.

We are about to attack (attempting to expose) this afternoon a particular delusion in regard to religion which is very prevalent and very dangerous. Many are to be found who acquiesce in the doctrine of man's entire alienation of heart from God and who are ready to acknowledge because the doctrine seems taught in the Bible that by nature they are, dead in trespasses and sins. They believe too they be ever regenerate it must through the influences of the Holy Spirit. Viewing these his doctrines in connection with another fact that while they remain unregenerate neither their prayers nor doings are acceptable or pleasing to God they are our lead to the conclusion that they have nothing to do but be diligent in the use means. That is they do not feel that it is their duty to make themselves a new heart and love God supremely. God say they has appointed certain means of grace such as reading the Scripture attending upon religious meetings etc. and if we diligently use these means we may hope they will result in our conversion. Indeed if regeneration can come only from God and if he bestows renewing grace according to his sovereign will and not according to anything he discovers in us the conclusion is inevitable that it is entirely in vain for us to do anything but to use these means and to wait upon him for the influences of his Spirit. We have indeed an earnest desire to become religious: but since God must, work in us to will and to do, we must wait till it be his pleasure to convert us.

We are willing to believe that the men who use such reasoning are sincere in it. And the fact that they acknowledge even speculatively their lost alienated condition by nature and their entire dependance on God for regenerating grace is certainly much in their favor as it shows that their minds are prepared for receiving the Gospel (and there is more probability of their actually submitting their hearts to it – than of the man whose head as well as heart is erroneous). Still we are as certain as of any other fact that such persons are resting in a false and dangerous view of the subject. That man by nature is dreadfully alienated from God and that the sovereign grace of God can alone convert him we most decidedly maintain: but to infer from this that men have nothing to do but use the ordinary means of religion - that they must sit still until God please to regenerate them are inferences which the enemies of the doctrines of grace deduce from them but from which the friends of those doctrines should flee as from a dangerous delusion. We devote this discourse therefore to the subject and shall endeavor to prove that it is the duty of every man without a moments delay to make him a new heart and to love God with all his heart and mind and strength.

The text we have chosen it must be acknowledged had not originally the least reference to this subject. The prophet in the thirtieth chapter is warning the Jews not to trust in Egypt but in God and whether the text was meant to apply to the Israelites or the Egyptians is not certain. But we may be permitted by way of accommodation to apply it to this subject. Of those who use the reasoning above mentioned to justify themselves in not turning their hearts to love God we may say, their strength is to sit still. It is sitting still and waiting for the peace of God which they justify - it is while sitting still that they hope to be converted. Here then is their strength. Let us see if their strength is not weakness.

In entering upon the subject we premise this principle that a just and merciful God would never impose laws upon his creatures which he had not given them powers to observe. We know of nothing that would exhibit God in a more arbitrary tyrannical and repulsive aspect than to describe him as commanding that which man could not perform. If for instance he had required (commanded) man to love him when this was a natural impossibility we could not look upon it but as (an arbitrary act of the most flagrant injustice). And this view of the subject is that given in Scripture. The Jews in the time of Ezekiel had charged God with dealing unjustly with them by causing them to bear the iniquity of their fathers. But Jehovah repels an assertion so repugnant to the glory of his character and condescends to reason with that rebellious notion and to promote them that the fault lay with themselves – O house of Israel says God are not your ways equal? And Christ in the parable of the talents condemns in the most pointed manner the man who charged his Lord with, reaping where he had not sown and gathering where he had not strewn. Indeed the principle that God will not require of any of his creatures to perform an impossibility is so evidently correct that no man on earth perhaps in so many words denies it.

Keeping this fundamental principle in mind then let us proceed to enquire whether God in commanding man to love him has actually demanded an impossibility. For if this be the case we do not probably understand aright this scriptural command as it means perhaps no more than those suppose who are waiting to be converted viz. that we are commanded to love God only on condition that his Spirit compels us to it. But let us see what powers God has actually given to all men and what motives for loving him he has set before them.

In the first place man is capable of distinguishing between moral excellence and moral deformity.

The foundation of this discernment lies in the conscience – a faculty given to all and whose decisions are so correct that it is often safer to trust to its dictate than to the clearest chain of argument. Indeed it is a common thing for one man to appeal to the conscience of another for the moral excellence or deformity of particular actions. Whatever be the actual conduct of men very few are so weak or so wicked as not to know what part of conduct is virtuous and what part vicious. Even heathen poet Horace says that he saw and approved those things that are excellent but followed those that are blamable. Men therefore are not prevented from loving God because they cannot discern good from evil (for it is most certain that in general they can distinguish the precious from the vile - the clean from the unclean.)

But in the second place I assert that man does actually esteem and approve of moral excellence in his fellow men.

Even those who have long worked wickedness greedily and who are abandoned to every evil work cannot approve and respect him whose disposition is thoroughly good whose honesty and integrity are pure and whose benevolence is constantly at work in relieving the wants of his fellow sinners. Milton very happily describes even the Devil and his angels as possessed of some degree of this feeling of respect for pure virtue. When the angels that guarded Paradise while yet our first parents were happy first discovered Satan lurking in that garden one of them severely rebuffed the fiend. And of him the poet says -

*His grave rebuke,
Severe in youthful beauty, added grace.*

*Invincible: abashed the Devil stood,
And felt how awful goodness is, and saw
Virtue in her shape how lovely, saw, and pined his loss.*

[Milton's Paradise Lost]

And what an instance of the like him among men have you in the trembling of Felix before Paul, reasoning of righteousness temperance and judgment to come - although that Felix knew that he was unrighteous and intemperate and exposed to the tenors of the judgment yet did he feel such a severance for the holy man who could thus reason upon these things that he could not even reproach him much less punish him. And the same feeling is common among sinners of every generation. They cannot avoid having an esteem for the man who lives prayerfully and righteously although his life and conversation are a most pointed reproof of their conduct and feelings. Indeed men who are unholy themselves not only will suspect the man of moral excesses but when they feel his benevolence exerted toward themselves or their friend they cannot but feel grateful to such an one for those very virtues which pointedly reproach themselves. So powerful is the force of conscience and thus strong is the disposition in man to esteem and approve of moral worth.

Let us now suppose man to direct his attention to the moral character of God instead of his fellow men. If he saw some faint and imperfect traces of justice in his brother and respected it he now sees a God of perfect and eternal justice being no respecter of persons and rewarding every man according to his works. Why then should he not love such a God? If he saw a small degree of benevolence in man mixed with much selfishness and experienced some faint effects from it he now in the character of God discerns an infinite and unmixed benevolence. He views a Being who is emphatically called love - a Being whose deeds of kindness and mercy to man are without number and without measure - who has devised and executed the wonderful plan of redemption by sending the Son of his love to die for sinners - who sends down his Holy Spirit to strive with the whole human race - who has given his revelation a sign and a perfect guide to the sincere and humble enquirer - who has upheld our forfeited lives day after day and month after month while we were in a state of active rebellion against his authority. O how can the man who reverences and is ever grateful for the feeble benevolence of his fellow refuse his love to the Being in whose character this virtue shines forth in eternal perfection and unclouded glory - while at the same time this very man is feeling the full exercise for exercise of this benevolence upon himself?

[paragraph crossed out]

In the third place I maintained that there is no faculty wanting in man to enable him to love God - no change of faculties nor view ones conversion.

In the fourth place we remark that man neglect to love God not because there are not motives sufficiently powerful.

Is it not an insult to your understanding to present before you the inducement you have to give your hearts to your maker and Redeemer? For they are so obvious that nothing but the most blundering stupidity and deathlike apathy can be ignorant of them. And yet certain it is that the minister of Christ is obliged to hold up these motives again and again before men or they would never feel them. What think you then of being released from the everlasting curse and displeasure of an Almighty God? What think you of becoming a child of God instead of a servant of Satan? What think you of being made heir to an inheritance incorruptible undefiled and unfading? What think you are enjoying peace of conscience and joy in the Holy Ghost unspeakable and full of glory? And what think you of exchanging the everlasting burnings of hell for the everlasting happiness of heaven – and the society of devils for that of angels and saints in light? Certain it is that this wonderful change in your condition and feelings and hopes will be made the moment you will consent to yield to God your supreme affections. These motives are all urged upon you again and again in the Scriptures and the God who cannot lie has most solemnly declared that they are real and that he is sincere in presenting them before you to urge you to escape from ruin. If then you resist these motives - if you do not submit to them this moment where is the fault with God because he does not force you by his Spirit to listen to them? Or with your own heart because it will not yield to their influence?

This question leads us in the fourth place to state the true cause why men do not love God - and it is simply and entirely because they have not any disposition for it.

This cause of their unregeneracy was assigned by Christ to the unbelieving Jews - ye will not come to me that you might have life. And we know not in what respect a Jewish opposer of God differed from a Gentile. The truth is men do not desire to love God. They doubtless desire happiness - especially everlasting happiness - but after all they have not a relish for that spiritual frame of mind - for that holy conversation and that spirit of devotion exist those self-imposed services which must exist with the love of God. Could they love God with nothing of these attending it - could they be made happy by a mere reverence for God's character - the kingdom of heaven would doubtless be full. But when men find the love of God implies an entire surrender of every thing they possess every thing they are to his service - when they find that they must travel for the time to come in a course directly contrary to that they have been in all their lives and that their views and aims and hopes must be entirely revolutionized and that they must take up the cross daily and follow Christ - when men take this view of the subject there is certainly no disposition within them to submit to it. They find that they have an immediate unwillingness in their hearts to engage in the work. And this unwillingness - this want of a disposition is the sum and substance of their inability to love God. Remove this and love would spring up spontaneously in every heart and men would all be righteous.

And now we wish solemnly to enquire of every unrenewed man whether the want of disposition be not the only thing that prevents his loving God? Have you not within you those powers that enable you to discern between sin and holiness? And do you not actually esteem and love moral excellence in your fellows? And are there not motives sufficiently powerful to persuade you to regard the character of God with supreme complacency? Where then is the obstruction but the want of a disposition?

And let me here also seriously enquire whether you will dare to allege at the bar of God as an excuse for not loving him that you had no disposition for it? Is it not the very highest and most unpardonable of all sins to lack this disposition when he has given you such powers and such motives for loving him? If you had neglected the support of your families and given as a reason the want of a disposition to support them - or had you neglected the education of your children and suffered them to grow up in idleness vice and ignorance and given as a reason the want of a disposition would men believe this to be any justification? If you had neglected to love your parents or friends and assigned does not the very essence of the sin lie in that want? And yet we challenge you to produce any other reason why you do not love God.

You will doubtless reply to all this by saying that you are born with the want of this disposition and that you cannot be blamed for any defect that is natural. But will this excuse you? You are born without any disposition to obey the laws of the land but will this justify you in breaking them? You are born without any disposition to restrain your appetites and passions - but dare you alledge this is an excuse for indulging them to excess? You might do it with just as much force as to allege the lack of natural a natural disposition as a justification for neglecting to love God.

But we have another answer to the objection. God does in infinite compassion send down his Holy Spirit to strive with every unregenerate man and to warn him of his danger and that Spirit is ready to overcome his natural disinclination towards God. That God does thus strive with all man is evident from the promise of Christ that the Spirit should convince the world of sin of righteousness and judgment to come and also from the declaration of Christ that he stands at the door of the heart and knocks for admittance. And we do not hesitate to say that this Spirit has often striven with everyone in this house and that if we had not resisted that Spirit if they had not always resisted that Holy Ghost - they would not now have occasion to alledge that they want of a disposition for not loving God.

What then my hearers becomes of the boasted plea of your inability to repent and love God? When stripped of all its disguises it proves to consist wholly in the want of a disposition - a kind of inability which a person could be asked to mention even to man much more to God. But if there be any who still do not feel satisfied on this point but are prepared to ask many questions concerning it for such indeed for all others we have in the fifth place an argument that must stop the mouth of every objection and put an end to all caviling. It is an argument independant of all that has been said and will not be at all affected by what has been said. It is this - God does actively command men without any condition to love him supremely at this moment. He commands them at this moment to repent of their sins to exercise faith in Christ and to make them a new heart and a new Spirit.

It was the first great commandment that came forth from the thunderings of Sinai - thou shalt have no other gods before me. And Christ has repeated and explained this when he says, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and all thy soul and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. God says Paul, now commanded all men everywhere to repent. And God by Ezekiel says to the house of Israel, cast away from you all your transgressions whereby you have transgressed and make you a new heart and a new Spirit: for why will ye die O house of Israel?

These my hearers are the solemn commands of God and they are repeated again and again in every part of the bible. And not one place is there any illusion made to any impossibility of complying with them. They are as peremptory and unconditional as any commands can be. Now then we perceive there is a controversy between God and those who say that they cannot love him nor make themselves a new heart. For He commands them to exercise this love and they reply that this is impossible and that they are waiting for his grace to convert them. What is this but replying against God? And who art thou that repliest against God?

Here then my hearers the contest between you and me terminates. You assert that you cannot love God till he converts you. We bring forward the solemn command of God to give him your heart. If then he has commanded an impossibility the controversy over the subject lies not between you and me but between you and God. O see to it my hearers that this be terminated before the day of judgment. For however ingeniously you may now prove that you are under immediate obligations to love God because it is impossible - however clearly you may think you can see that you must wait for conversion in the diligent use of means - we greatly fear that those arguments will not avail you in the days of final account - and for this plain reason that we believe God would not command that now which you will not abide by in the day of final retribution. Thus far your strength has been to sit still. Now let your strength be shown by putting forth all your energies, to work out your salvation with fear and trembling knowing that it is God working in you both to will and to do. If the man who had the withered hand had not attempted to stretch it out at the command of Christ it never would have been healed. So unless you attempt to love God and repent at his command depend upon it you will never be saved.

[Asterisk] *

And it is indeed time that we are every one of us commanded to exercise supreme love to God before we leave this house? Most certainly - and we have witnessed the past week which a Providence that enforces this command with a powerful emphasis. This morning have I attended the funeral solemnities one who has was called in a moment from time into eternity. And for him to do we believe in Christ. It was a glorious exchange. But what if we go from this house a single step should carry us into the world of Spirit! O let us then resolve to give up our hearts to God this moment. This moment let us resolve to propose to meet our God. The next moment may be too late.

[Asterisk] *

Let us for a moment suppose a case that may occur: alas I fear it will be realized by some who hear me in their own experience. Suppose an unconverted man to be brought upon a bed of dangerous sickness and to send for a clergyman. The minister learning from his physician that he cannot survive 24 hours. He's a sick man confesses that his heart has never been changed and acknowledges that it is so entirely depraved that nothing but sovereign grace can renew it. But says he I am a dying man and in a few hours my eternal state will be fixed. O what shall I do to be saved? How can I dwell with the devouring fire? How can I inhabit everlasting burnings? Now what shall the minister answer? Shall he tell that dying miserable man that he has nothing to do but to wait in the diligent use of means for the converting grace of God? O that would be an outrageous mockery of his misery. It would bring the blood of that man upon the minister's soul. Rather must he plainly and faithfully tell the dying man that he must repent and submit to God and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ that very hour: and that he lies under no other inability to do this except the inability of a simple heart for which God will hold him guilty. And my hearers if it would not be proper to tell the sinner on the bed of death to wait for converting grace neither would it be proper to tell any other sinner to wait: for who knows how near death may be to any man? Who knows but by waiting even one hour he may seal his eternal doom. O there is not there cannot be any excuse for delaying to love God: and Satan never practices a deeper and more fatal delusion upon a man and when he persuades him that he has nothing to do but to wait in the use of means for renewing grace. For the longer he waits the more insensible will his heart and conscience become. The longer he waits the farther will God be removed from him. The longer he waits the fainter will be the prospect of his conversion. This is the delusion which more perhaps than any other in our land has sent souls silently and slowly but certainly to destruction. For until a man can be made to feel that he is under obligation to repent and love God at the present moment there is no hope - no hope - of his conversion. This is the last delusion which breaks away from the sinners mind. Ah, I fear it will never break away from the minds of many who hear me until conviction flashes upon them from the flames of the unquenchable fire.

Sermon 67 Preventatives of a Revival

[Sermon No. 67, "Preventatives of a Revival," James 5:16, 1821 Sep,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 10]

James 5:16

Confess your faults one to another and pray for one another that ye may be healed.

[Hitchcock seems to suggest that there is a spiritual disease in his church; see paragraph 5.]

What is the reason Christian brethren that there is not a general revival of religion among us? Most certainly it is not because God is not willing and ready to bestow his Spirit. For Christ hath said, If ye then being evil know how to give good gifts unto your children how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him. Ask and it shall be given you - seek and ye shall find - knock and it shall be opened unto you. Here then have you an absolute promise of the Holy Spirit if you ask it aright. Unless therefore you charge God with a lie you must conclude that if we do not have religious revival in our hearts is our own fault altogether. We ask and receive not - because we ask amiss.

But what do we mean by a revival of religion? We do not mean what many a man who is either opposed to such a work or misinformed on the subject attaches to the phrase. We don't not mean an enthusiastic excitement of the carnal passions – nor a mere awakening of the fears - not merely the strong wind nor the earthquake nor the fire. But we mean an actual increase of every Christian grace and of every good work among the children of God. We mean a period when through the greater exertions and more spiritual and fervent prayers of Christians the Spirit of God strives more powerfully with sinners around them - when a still small voice carries conviction to many a conscience - when the arrows of the Almighty stick fast in many a heart and unregenerate men are earnestly seeking and enquiring what they must do to be saved? We mean just what the prophet Habakkuk did when he prayed in view of the iniquities of Israel, O Lord revive thy works in the midst of the years; in the midst of the years make known: in wrath remember mercy.

And what is there objectionable in such a revival of religion? What is there that is not unreasonable? For if we allow that a man may be more engaged in religion at one time than another - if we allow the a Christian may be more faithful and earnest in prayer at one time than another and thus obtain a more important answer from God (and what rational man will not allow of all this) we must acknowledge that there can be such a thing as a revival of religion. Indeed the man who does not believe that the Spirit of God is at all necessary to render a person religious has every reason to believe in and encourage a revival. For he supposes that means are everything and therefore he might conclude that the more these were multiplied the more would religion prevail. And indeed it a first view it would seem that such a man would encourage the work of a revival with more ardor than those of us who believe that after all our prayers and efforts we are entirely dependant upon the sovereign mercy of God.

We now return to the enquiry that commenced this discourse - what is the reason Christian brethren that there is not at this time a general revival of religion in this place? The fault we have already seen lies with ourselves - that is with the professors of religion - and you will bear with me I trust while I attempt plainly and solemnly to point out more particularly in what this fault consists. For the text directs us to confess our faults one to another and pray for one another that we may be healed - and we do believe most sincerely that it is high time our proud hearts were humbled to submit to this mortifying exhortation.

In giving an answer to the above enquiry we do not suppose that all the reasons we shall give why there is not a revival of religion will apply to every individual professor. Some of these may apply to one and some to another. Neither do we mean to attack the particular feelings of any individual. We take it for granted that this church is affected with some disease for otherwise religion would be revived among us. And now what we intend is to suggest some of the most probable causes why so many if not all of us are weak and sickly and why so many sleep.

And the first cause why religion is not revived universally among is probably that but few of us have recently been converted.

The word conversion in the scripture generally means the same as regeneration. But in a few instances it is used to describe that change a Christian experiences when he returns to God after a long season of backsliding and stupidity. Thus Christ says to Peter in view of his denial of his master – When thou art converted strengthen thy brethren. No one will doubt but that Peter was regenerated previous to this - and therefore by his conversion to Christ must have meant his recovery from his dreadful fall. Indeed an apostasy so great as that of Peter would probably demand as much repentance as much distress of mind and as deep conviction of sin as did his first conversion from the darkness of nature and therefore it might very hopefully be called a new conversion. Now when any Christian Church forgets its first love and becomes lukewarm conforming itself to the world it is necessary in order that it should be in a proper state for a revival that it should be converted in the same sense in which Peter was. The members of such a church must be convicted of sin and undergo a deep repentance and reform. Remember therefore, says Christ to the Ephesian church, from whence thou art fallen; and repent and do the first works for else I will come unto thee quickly and will remove thy candlestick out of his place except thou repent. And it is rational to suppose and facts show it to be the case that the person who undergoes this second conversion generally experiences as much distress of mind as much humbled and sometimes receives as much light as when first right regenerated. Indeed when the man who does really though faintly love God is made to realize after a long and dreadful apostasy how monstrous is his ingratitude he must be bowed down to the dust and feel that ingratitude more deeply than he who never has loved God at all however deep his convictions.

And now brethren this enquiring we have to make is whether we have recently experienced any thing of this new conversion – any thing of this awakening from spiritual sloth? That we have been in a state of very great stupidity in regard to the welfare of Zion probably none of us will deny. Or if we do deny it the fact that a general revival of religion does not exist among us proves it. To be recovered from such a state then we must pass through the process described by Christ, remember from whence thou hast fallen and repent and do the first works. Have we then my brethren experienced anything of all this of late? Individuals might perhaps reply in the affirmative - but as a church have we experienced it? We hesitate not to decide this question in the negative and we hesitate not to say also that until such be the case is idle to expect a general revival of pure and undefiled religion. For such a work we believe in almost every case God commences in the hearts of his children. Certainly on the day of Pentecost he poured out his Spirit upon the Christian band first and then upon his enemies. And that great revival means to be in most things a prototype of all others that are genuine.

I call on you therefore my brethren as well as upon myself to repent and do the first works - I call upon you in the name and by the authority of Jesus Christ to humble yourself before God and to weep over the hardness of your hearts and the horrible ingratitude we are guilty of in departing from the living God and returning to our wallowing in the mire of this world after that we have tasted that the Lord is gracious. And I call upon you to awake now - because now is the accepted time and now is the day of salvation. Tomorrow may be too late to be of the least service to your unregenerate child or neighbor who may ere that time be in eternity his blood lie upon your head forever and ever.

The second reason why religion is not generally revived among us is that professors of religion are not faithful in prayer.

It will be observed that in this discourse we speak of all professors as real Christians. And although we have great reason to fear, nay we cannot doubt that there are some who have taken the vows of the Lord upon them who have neither part nor lot in Christ yet so long as these continue external members of the church of Christ we are bound to regard them and address them as real believers for it is the prerogative of God only to judge the heart. On this principle therefore the terms professor and real believer are used in this discourse as synonymous. And when we say that a want of faithfulness in our prayers is one reason why God does not pour out his Spirit among us we mean not but that individuals may be faithful: but there is an unfaithfulness somewhere among us. But yet we have no evidence to produce on this subject except your own consciences. We appeal directly to them and enquire whether it be not true that you have not been as faithful as you ought to have been in the duty of prayer? Have you Christians entered your closet as often as your conscience tells you you ought to have done? Have you imitated and do you now imitate in this respect your divine Master who sometimes spent whole nights in secret prayer on the mountains? Have you wept in secret over sinners as he did in view of Jerusalem? Have you wrestled as did the Patriarch of old until the break of day and feel as if you could not depart without the blessing? How have you spent those seasons which we have agreed to devote to prayer for the influences of the Spirit - especially that hour set apart on the morning of this holy day? In short have you prayed as constantly and as earnestly for yourself as you would do if you knew each day were the last of your existence? Have you prayed for sinners as you would pray for them if you saw the heavens and this earth mingling in one mighty conflagration and the trumpet of God calling them unprepared to his tribunal? If you have done all this most surely you have been faithful in your prayers and I am faulty in charging unfaithfulness upon you. And most joyfully would I upon my knees crave your forgiveness if you will rise up and say that in this thing I have injured you. Alas I fear I shall have no occasion for repentance.

The third cause why a general revival of religion does not exist among us is that the prayers of Christians are hindered.

To multiply religious meetings for prayer and conference may have the appearance of a religious revival and excite in the minds of Christians raised expectations. But if believers carry to these meetings the same insensible heart they have carried into the sanctuary of God in a time of stupidity - if they do not come to them with broken and contrite spirits - if they do not bring along with them a more earnest desire than ever for the salvation of their fellow man - in vain and worsening vain is it to increase the number of meetings for prayer. For they excite expectations never to be realized besides provoking the Almighty to send down strong delusions in answer to such stupid and unfeeling supplications. There is such a thing as agonizing in prayer - when the petition is put up in such a manner and with such an ardor and intenseness of devotion as if the supplicant could not be denied. And something of this agonizing we believe always precedes a general revival of religion - either in the social meeting or in the closet. Is there anything like this existing among us? We do not mean whether you could point to this man or that man and say we presume he agonizes in his closet - but we ask do you agonize? If not are not your prayers hindered? The first thing that may hinder them is an improper conformity to the world. Perhaps we are so engrossed by the accumulation of wealth by our farms and by our merchandise that there is very little difference in our conduct and conversation except in the performance of a few ceremonies and to distinguish us from those who are without hope. Indeed when such perceive that our affections are as much engrossed in pursuit of worldly riches or honors or pleasures as their own - when they perceive that our thoughts our conversations and our talents are occupied almost wholly in seeking to add treasure to treasure house to house and field to field - or for the praise of men more than the praise of God - why should not the irreligious man pointing the finger of scorn at us exclaim, What do ye more than others? Why should he not ridicule the evident inconsistency between our lives and our principles and exult in the consistency of his own? Why should he not tumble over us first into skepticism and then into hell?

The second thing that may hinder prayer is the habitual commission of known sin. And here let the enquiry we have come home solemnly to each one of our hearts - do not we indulge some evil propensity - some ungodly passion - some vile lust which we know to be contrary to the will of God? Or perhaps we indulge some one of these with the impression that they are failings and not real sins. O then Christians this is the accursed thing that separates between us and God. Our prayers offered under such circumstances are an abomination in the sight of God. This right hand had must be cut off - this right eye plucked out. Otherwise instead of a revival of religion we may expect to be cast into hell, where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched.

The fourth cause that prevents a general revival of religion among us is that Christians are not faithful in exhorting and warning sinners.

If a man go into his closet and earnestly pray for the conversion of an individual he can hardly fail of feeling so much interest for his welfare that he will go to him and endeavour to show him his danger and his refuge. Indeed can be called a fervent or effectual prayer whose influence does not extend beyond the door where it is made? To converse with sinners individually then is the proof that we feel for them and pray sincerely for them. There is not a more powerful means of awakening the unregenerate than a solemn plain and affectionate personal enquiry of them by a Christian friend concerning the condition of their souls. And does that Christian then feel and pray for unregenerate men while he neglects the most powerful means God has put in his hands for their conversion?

But yet is there not among us an alarming deficiency in this duty? Have you Christians conversed with that unregenerate child or friend or neighbor in such a manner that he saw your very heart was melted within you for his lost condition? In a manner so tender that he saw you must be sincere and in so plain a manner that his conscience was reached? O if we neglect these personal addresses the blood of that child or friend or neighbor will be perhaps required of us.

The fifth reason why there is not a general revival of religion among us is that Christians neglect the direction of the text to, confess their faults one to another and to pray for one another.

If we felt as we ought the deceitfulness and depravity of our hearts we should feel anxious to have our hopes examined and tested by our brethren. After a full confession of our faith in the statement of the ground of our hopes perhaps they might discover to us some radical deficiency. And if we felt as we ought our lamentable backslidings we should desire the faithful reproofs of a friend and fellow Christian that we might be healed. But are we in the habit my brethren of the mutual confessions and prayers for each other? Do we search one anothers hearts and bear those close enquiries with Christian spirit which reach the conscience and cause us to tremble? Before you can scripturally hope for a revival Christians you must be better acquainted with one anothers hearts and when you meet this must be a subject of your conversation in the place of those worldly concerns which we fear are now more eagerly enquired after than the concerns of your immortal souls.

We shall mention but one other cause why the cause of religion is not generally revived among us and that is we are depending upon one another.

If I do not mistake such thoughts as the following passed through our minds. We say to ourselves I do not indeed feel prepared for a revival of religion myself. I am yet dull and insensible to the condition of those around me. But I hope that other professors are awake and I have more faith in their prayers than in my own even if ever so much aroused. But brethren what if such a feeling should exist in the heart of every Christian in this place? What then would become of a revival of religion? The fact is every professor of religion should feel as if he himself were the only stumbling block - as if his stupidity was the only cause why God did not pour out his Spirit without measure. It is I and I alone over whom sinners are stumbling to perdition. I am the Achar of this church - I am the accursed thing in the camp that provokes the wrath of God. And indeed this may all be solemnly true. If everyone of us who is stupid or sinful though all the rest are awake, he may counteract all the exhortations and all the prayers of the rest. For his sake alone the Spirit of God may be withdrawn and a spiritual sleep deep as the slumber of the grave be suffered to rest upon us. Let each one of us then feel as if the eternal welfare of this people rest upon himself alone. Let him feel as if he must give an account at the bar of God for every soul among this people that is going down to destruction. Let him but realize that such a load of responsibility as this is upon him and he cannot sleep unless he be destitute of religion.

And my brethren is it not most astonishing out of condescension and mercy in God that he should have awakened ever one sinner in the place while there is such a deep slumber in this church! It is indeed a miracle of grace. And yet do we believe unless grossly deceived that not only one impenitent sinner has been awakened but several. Yes, Christians, while you have been asleep God has been at work. Before you have called God has answered. Though you deserved the severest judgment for our backsliding and dreadful apostasy yet has he visited us with tokens of astonishing mercy. And now it is not evident that God is waiting to see whether we make a right improvement of those mercies - to see whether they will answer us to repent and pray and exhort the wicked. And if they do not produce this effect depend upon it that judgment such as this church and people never yet witnessed will be poured out upon us without mixture. Depend upon it that the Spirit of God insulted and grieved so deeply will flee from us no more to visit us until this generation be all swept into eternity. Depend upon it that, the enemy will come in like a flood, while there will be present no, Spirit of the Lord to lift up a standard against him. Depend upon it that you will see your neighbors and friends and children living without God and dying without hopes - and as you follow them to the grave O how will it unnerve the stoutest heart to reflect that they have gone down to the world of woe because you grieved away from them the Spirit ready to convert them. And yet we sleep - My God my God why hast thou forsaken us? Why hast thou left us under the curse of the barren fig tree?

Turn, turn us mighty God

And mould our souls afresh

Break sovereign grace these hearts of stone

And give us hearts of flesh.

Sermon 69 Rights of God Part I

[Sermon No. 69-70, "Rights of God," Samuel 3:18, 1821 Sep,

Matthew 20:15

Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own?

It is the Lord: let him do what seemeth him good.

[This sermon includes many revisions, pages crossed out, and an insertion. See insert about departure of a minister from his church; the last 3 – 4 pages are a very strident and forceful condemnation of the unregenerate. A brief insert on p. 11 deals with the resignation of a minister.]

There may originally have been two complete sermons here; Sermon 69 is relatively intact. Sermon 70 may be here in full or in part as pages of crossed out text including pages 5 – 7 of the scanned document. Only the cover page and reverse are transcribed at the end.]

Much is said in every age of the world concerning the rights of man; and many volumes have been written to illustrate and a vast amount of blood and tears expended to maintain these rights. But very little is said about the rights of God. And yet it might be presumed that the Creator of all things would not be wholly destitute of rights. It may therefore be profitable to devote this hour to a consideration of some of the most important rights of the Deity in relation to his creatures.

I shall first point out some of his rights respecting the original creation.

Since then in the first place God had a right to create just such a universe as was agreeable to his will and according to just such a plan as he saw fit. To such a right as this there was as yet nothing to oppose because there was no other being or thing in existence. And most certainly there could not be a better universe than one which a Being of perfect wisdom and perfect benevolence and perfect justice should desire - nor could any other being be so competent to devise a plan for the government and regulation of such a universe. For non but an omniscient Being could discern all the relations and effects of any particular system by which to regulate a universe - none but an omnipotent Being could so adjust all the parts of such a complicated machine that every thing should move on without interference - none but a being of perfect benevolence could form a plan whose ultimate tendency would be happiness and none but a being of perfect justice could render such a system perfectly equal towards all.

In the second place God had a right to make his own glory the ultimate object of all his works.

In comparison with God all nations nay all created beings are as nothing and they are counted to him less than nothing and vanity. Surely then the glory of God is an object of vastly greater importance than the glory or even the happiness of his creatures - and therefore it was perfectly proper that God should propose the display of his glory as the object of his creation even if there was an opposition between this and the happiness of the creature. But the fact is that in promoting the glory of God the creature is taking the surest method to promote his own happiness. And therefore it is every account perfectly right in God to make the display of his all of his glory the great end of all his works.

From these considerations we perceive

In the third place God had a right to make his rational creatures free agents.

Had he left angels and men destitute of this free agency no service of theirs could have been voluntary and they would have been mere machines - moving only by the immediate power of God exerted upon them and therefore but little calculated to display his glory. And if He gave these free agents sufficient power to enable them to continue in a state of holiness and happiness surely he is under no obligation to prevent their falling from such a state.

[Last two lines crossed out; skip to page six near top]

And alas hearer it is true indeed that a part of these creatures of God have abused the power he gave them to start and have fallen and you and I my hearers are numbered among the transgressors. The whole world indeed lieth in wickedness. And we now proceed to consider some of the rights of God as they respect fallen beings.

In the fourth place then God had a right to propose to those who have rebelled against him his own terms of reconciliation.

In a warfare between two nations where if one get the victory it is customary to suppose that the defeated party has a right to accept or refuse the terms proposed by the conqueror. And this is all very correct because it may be possible that these terms would be unreasonable and it may be also that the vanquished nation after all has the most of justice on its side. But in many rebellions against God the universe will confess nay man himself confesses that God is wholly in the right and he wholly in the wrong. He too will knowledge that is impossible from the nature of God that he should propose any unjust or unreasonable terms - and therefore it is perfectly just that he and he alone should devise and propose the method of salvation to us rebels.

But there is another ground on which this right is established. God was not under the least obligation to offer us any terms of reconciliation whatever. He gave us his law - the penalty of violating which was eternal death without even a hint that there could be any mercy for the transgressors. Man therefore broke this law with a perfect knowledge of the consequences. After all this to suggest any method whereby the violator could be restored to favor was on the part of God an act of mere sovereign mercy: for had he exterminated the vile offenders the universe would have felt that it was only an act of justice. And besides in such a case nothing short of infinite wisdom prompted by infinite benevolence could have devised any method for serving man that would not fully perfect God's justice. No other being could have imagined how God could be just while he justified a returning penitent. If then God determined although man had forfeited all right to his favor and incurred eternal death that he would propose to him a method of salvation who can doubt his right to save him precisely in that way he chose? And to declare that if he would not accept those terms and any every one of them he must perish.

We presume then that God has unquestionably a right to demand of rebellious man a compliance with his own conditions or be left to feel the penalty of that law he has broken. He has a right to require as a first article of reconciliation that man should love him with all his heart and mind and soul and strength. He has the right to declare in a second article except ye repent ye shall all perish. He has a right to say in the third article except a man be born of water and the Spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. He has a right to say in a fourth article, he that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him. He has a right to say in a sixth article that, by works of law shall no flesh living be justified: but you must be justified freely by grace through the redemption there is in Christ Jesus. He has a right to say in a seventh article that, faith without works is dead. He has a right to say in eighth article, whether ye can or eat or drink or whatsoever you do do it all to the glory of God. He has a right to say in the ninth article, prepare to meet thy God.

In the fifth (second) place, God has a right out of a rebellious world to select a certain number and prepare them for glory in heaven.

We have already shown that God is under not the least obligation to show mercy to an individual of the human family. Every one of us by nature is in a state of condemnation. We are all under the sentence of eternal death. Now if God should for wise reasons known only to himself determine to save some of us and to prepare us for glory we ask has he not a perfect right to do it? What Injustice would be done to those whom he passed by since they will suffer no more than is strictly their due?

But let me exhibit the subject in a somewhat different light. What if God does actually propose certain terms to the whole human race whereby they can be restored to his favor? What if the only hindrance to their complying with them is the want of a disposition? And that he has proposed such terms and that these are most reasonable and easy the bible will testify. Now upon men's refusing month after month and year after year to close with the offered conditions has not God a right to send into the hearts of those whom he sees fit the special influences of the Spirit to subdue their opposition to him and to prepare them for glory?

To illustrate this case still more we will suppose of number of condemned criminal to be shut up in a prison by their lawful Prince. Suppose now this prince comes to the prison, throws open the doors knocks off the fetters of the criminals and bids them go out and be restored to liberty and his favor. Nay upon their refusal suppose he actually takes each one of them by the hand and endeavors gently to lead them out. And after all what if they refuse to leave their prison? Would not that prince have a right if he saw fit to exert upon some of them a more powerful influence and and as it were compel them to seek receive liberty and happiness? And has not God thrown open the prison doors of this world and invited and urged us rebels to go and be restored to peace of mind question and the hopes of heaven – nay does not his Spirit take every man by the hand and endeavor to lead him forth from his dungeon? And if after all this we refuse to be liberated has not God a right if it be his pleasure to exert a more special influence upon some of us and as it were compel us to leave the prison of sin and vise to the liberty and happiness of heaven? What reason have those of us who are left to complain after they have resisted such invitations and offers.

The right of God then to prepare some of the human race for glory is established. The question occurs has he exercised this right? We believe he has. Every year's experience shows us some men on their deathbeds who profess and really appear to be prepared for heaven by the working of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost.

And it is also a well known fact that many other men on their death beds manifest no hope of heaven and who fear that they are going down to everlasting perdition: nay some die as they have lived blaspheming or mocking God. Upon the whole it cannot be doubted that a part of mankind yearly descend to everlasting misery and a part ascend to happiness. And if this be admitted it will follow that God does select a certain number out of a rebellious world and prepare them for heaven. For there must be a cause why some are saved and some are lost. And what else can this cause be but the will of God? For had he pleased he could with right cause have saved every individual of the human race - and if a part persist as we know they do it must be because God does not see fit in his wise purposes to save them. Hence then it is evident that he does exert his right to prepare some for glory and have others to follow their own chosen way to destruction.

It is certain that God foreknew that men would reject the offers of salvation though most reasonable and easy - and unless we suppose God to be a changeable being we must also believe that he did in a eternity determine to save a part of those who should thus reject his offers and to leave a part to perish.

Do you then my hearers acknowledge that God has a right to select a part of this rebellious world and prepare them by his grace for heaven and do you believe that He did in eternity actually determine to save a part and to leave a part of our race? We presume no one will not be disposed to deny either of these propositions. And yet when you have admitted these you have admitted the whole of what most Christians understand by the doctrine of election.

[Three or four lines crossed out]

In the sixth place God has a right to appoint and superintend the ordinances and government of his visible church on earth.

He has a right to require in the members of such a church that they be really Christians born of God - justified by faith and heirs of glory - that they come out from the world and be separate that they be holy harmless and undefiled - that they present themselves being sacrifices to God and that they do every thing to his glory. He has a right to say unto the wicked, what hast thou to do to declare my statutes that thou shouldst take that covenant in my mouth? He has a right to demand of every member of this church on earth that they be, baptized in the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost. He has a right to require of every one of them to observe his holy Sabbath - to pray to God in their families in their closets and in his sanctuary. He has a right to demand of them that they show forth the Lord's death till he come by coming around his table and eating the bread symbolical of his broken body and drinking the wine symbolical of his blood poured out over the cross in remembrance of him. That God has such rights we need not attempt to prove to this audience nor to show that he has actually exercised these rights - for who is there present that disbelieves the bible?

But it is not needless to enquire of this church whether every member has attended to all these requirements of God? And if each one has not attempted a compliance with the solemn binding requisitions can he come forward this day within an unblushing face to partake of the body and blood of Christ? Most certainly if the bible be God's now such an one will, eat and drink damnation to himself. We leave it every man's conscience to enquire, Lord is it I?

God has a right also to do what he will with the pastors of his church to give or withhold them in any part of his vineyard and to continue or remove them as will best accomplish his purposes. And let it never be forgotten that whenever a faithful minister is given or taken away it is God who does it although he employs the instrumentality of man. And let it not be remembered [forgotten is crossed out] that he intended the event whether pleasant or painful for the good of his church and the advancement of his glory.

This leads us in the seventh place to state that (in the third place) God has the right to permit tares in his church on earth to grow among the wheat until the final day of trial by fire.

God might easily have given to all true Christians the faculty of discerning who are the friends and who are the enemies of God. But he has not thought proper so to do. Even in the days of the Apostles we know that irreligious men crept in unawares into the church and although those apostles possessed miraculous gifts they could not prevent it. And ever since their days many a Diotrephes - many an Hymenaeus and Alexander - many an Hermogenes and Phygellus have intruded into the church to make shipwrecks of its faith or bring disgrace upon the religion of Christ. Many a man who neglects due observance of the Sabbath - many a man who is wholly absorbed in the pursuits of this world - many a one who does not live in the habit of secret nor family prayer - many a one who indulges habitually some vile lust - some ungodly habit such as intemperance or lewdness or slander. Some of all these characters have in every age infested the church of Christ and have done more to provoke the vengeance of God and to disgrace the cause of Christ than an hundred times their number who have sinned quietly without the vows of God upon them.

Yet notwithstanding all this God has thought proper (and who will dispute his right) to constitute his church on earth so that it is impossible in every instance let Christians exercise ever so much prudence and discrimination to prevent hypocrites from becoming professed disciples of Christ. But we know that there is a day coming when every man's work will be tried by fire. And O my brethren what a scene will the judgment day disclose! How many deeds of iniquity - how many a heart hostile to God will then be found among us who belongs to the visible church of Christ! And what an aggravate condemnation will our hypocrisies bring upon us! How will the voice of the Lord wither our very souls when we hear him declare, I know you not depart from me all ye workers of iniquity! And how dreadful will be the view when we see Sodom and Gomorrah lying under a doom more tolerable than ours!

In the last place God has a right to bring a

In the second place God has a right to offer the terms of salvation to those impenitent sinners who he foresees will never accept them.

Yes and he has a right to entreat and beseech such to flee to the ark of safety arms of safety. We have already seen that God was under not the least obligation to offer salvation to an individual of the human family. For we all have sinned and come short of the glory of God and therefore will observe indignation and wrath tribulation and anguish. If God sees fit to offer us rebels the terms and means of reconciliation who shall object? Not holy beings surely because that this act would fill them with a higher admiration of the tolerance of God. Not sinners themselves such because it is an offer to them of eternal happiness. And what though God foresaw that the easy and reasonable terms he should propose would be rejected? Yet would it be for his glory to exhibit to the universe his willingness to save that thus every mouth might be stopped and the whole world become guilty before God.

And be it known to every impenitent man that God has with the utmost sincerity exercised his right to propose terms of salvation. He has made them so plain that the wayfaring man though a fool need not enter err therein. He has made them so easy that nothing but the most willful obstinacy can refuse them. And though the millions have recanted and still continue to reject them - though probably some who now hear me will live and die at enmity with God yet be assured sinner that through eternity you will never dare lisp a murmur against God for having proposed to you hard and unreasonable terms because the light of the judgment day will show you that he could not have done anything more for your salvation than he has done consistently with his character and the good of the universe.

In the third place God has a right to leave the impenitent to harden their hearts and ripen for punishment.

We attempted in the former part of the day to show that had a right to select a certain number out of a rebellious world and prepare them for glory. And if this be allowed it will follow that he has a right to pass by the rest of mankind having them in their chosen way to fill up the measure of their iniquity.

And my hearers unless we believe that all men will go to heaven we must believe that God does exercise this right to leave some to harden their hearts for punishment. For it is in the power of God as we have already remarked to save every man and if some are not saved it must be because they are abandoned of God and given over to reprobate minds. And if you do indeed believe this you believe all that is meant by most moderate Christians when they speak of that most abused and offensive of all doctrines the doctrine of reprobation.

In the last place God has a right to punish the impenitent with everlasting misery.

The moment death shall terminate the mortal existence of the sinner he falls into the hands of an angry God. And that Being has a right to thrust him into outer darkness where is weeping and gnashing of teeth - to cast him into hell where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched and where the smoke of his torment ascendeth up for ever and ever and to lead him down in the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God. Do you revolt at such alarming language as this? Then do you revolt against the language of God: for these are the words of the Bible.

The right of God thus to deal with the impenitent is established first from the fact that such punishment was threatened him while on earth. That such a threatening has been made we have already shown by the text repeated from the scripture. The sinner therefore had a perfect knowledge of what awaited him if he did not repent and be reconciled to God. He had not the least reason to doubt that his torment would be as dreadful as the bible represented. He cannot plead as an excuse for his sins that he was ignorant of the consequences.

In the second place God has a right dreadfully to punish the impenitent man because his sins deserve that. Let any man look at the perfectly and infinitely holy character of God let him look at the consequences of the single sin of our first parents - let him look at the obligations and motives the sinner violates and we venture to say that he cannot estimate the magnitude and demerit of a single sin against God. That is to say he cannot measure its enormity and extent by anything finite and he must therefore conclude it to be in an infinite evil. And for aught we can say that which produces an infinite evil deserves an infinite punishment. Thus much for one sin - let us now reckon if he can transgressions of an impenitent man's whole life and say will you hesitate and believe that God has a right to inflict upon him eternal torments?

In the third place God has a right to punish the impenitent sinner with everlasting destruction because the purposes of his government demand it. His government cannot be maintained if he does not exert his threatenings. Those threatenings are known to the universe and what must be the effect upon every holy being if they are not enacted upon persevering rebels who have determined not to obey? If they are executed what a tendency will beat the punishment have to preserve the obedience from apostasy! Let them only reflect damp any period of eternity upon the condition of those in outer darkness and how will they cling to their allegiance and love:

And now impenitent man, thou who hast never been born of water and the Spirit - this right of God to punish thee eternally will unless thou repent, soon be exercised upon thee and the moment God takes your soul from your body he will let loose upon thee all the fierceness of his wrath and press upon thee a heavier and heavier load of misery forever and ever. And what reasons have you to offer why God should not thus deal with you? Perhaps you will produce the strict morality of your life and your many kindnesses and benevolences and honorable deeds toward your fellows. For that morality we respect you and for your kindness and benevolence towards men we love you. But at the same time when we come to estimate your character in the view of God something more than morality and natural sensibility is demanded. Your conduct towards men we are willing to allow is such as should secure their respect and love - and that respect and love are your reward. But what will all this avail you if you have never loved God - if you have never served God? This is the first and the greatest commandment and if you have neglected this you have neglected the foundation. The standard by which God will try your soul is what have you done through the influence of his love: not what you have done through the mere natural sensibility or respect to the laws and customs of society. The plea then of your morality and good deeds will not for a moment be heard by that God whose demand was that you should live to his glory. And if you are yet unregenerate most certain it is that you never have loved him nor lived his glory at all.

Perhaps you will produce as a reason why God should not exert upon you the fierceness of his wrath eternally your respect for the institution of religion - your much reading of the bible your constant attendance upon the preaching of God's word and the many prayers you have put up to God. And all these duties would have been well had they been performed from right motives. But of what avail will it be to have respected the institutions of religion without any love for their authors? Of what consequence will it be to you in the day of judgment that you have read the word of God diligently without being thereby influenced to love him? What are the thousand sermons and exhortations worth which you have heard so long as the love of God was not the motive that led you to his sanctuary? And what kind of prayers are those which are offered up by him who carries a heart within him that does not love the Being to whom they are addressed? Depend upon O impenitent man depend upon it that all your prayers and all your services though they are numerous as the sands of the seashore if the love of God be not at the foundation will only serve to show how many motives have how much light and how much love you have resisted! It is the love of God alone - we repeat it is the love of God alone that can secure us from his eternal wrath.

Such then are the pleas the unregenerate man would probably produce to justify himself before God and to prevent the execution of eternal vengeance upon him. And these are the most favourable any such man can produce: the great majority could not produce all these. But what if God in reply to such an one should reckon up his sins and set them in order before him? Methinks I hear the voice of an omniscient God coming forth from the judgment seat with the searching enquiries. I gave you sinner an immortal soul and noble faculties that you might glorify me: and now have you thus used them? How many impure thoughts how many low desires - how many unworthy motives have you suffered to occupy and engage those faculties! How have you devoted those powers to the gratification of self - to the acquisition of worldly riches or honors or pleasures instead of employing them in my service. How seldom have you prayed to me and even when you have attempted it in some seasons of alarm - how did you insult me by mocking me with a solemn sound while your heart was not right before me and did not love me! I gave you my sun to shine upon you but you spent the light in gratifying self and in neglecting and dishonoring me. I gave you my earth to support you and poured abundance of temporal mercies around you but you did not devote them to the advancement of my glory - but to gratify your own inclinations and you made me not even the return of genuine gratitude. I gave you the (Holy Spirit) my word but you disregarded its first and greatest commands. Therein I commanded you to love me with all your heart and soul and mind but you have disobeyed - therein I commanded you to devote your bodies and spirits a living and holy sacrifice to me: but you disobeyed - I commanded you to repent of your sins and make you a new heart but you have lived impenitent and unregenerate - I commanded you to trust in my beloved Son for salvation but you have trusted in your own righteousness or madly presumed upon my uncovenanted mercy - I commanded you to come out from the world and be separate and confirm me before men and stand up boldly for my cause: but you have conformed to the world and have not maintained my cause and have not professed my name. I commanded you in all things to glorify me but in all things you have dishonored me and have felt indifferent to my glory and have made no efforts to maintain the kingdom of my Son. I gave you my Holy Spirit to strive with you: but you resisted him and quenched him and spurned him from you. I brought upon you afflictions and disappointments to show you the vanity of the world and to soften your heart but they have hardened your heart. I gave you religious friends to counsel and warn you and to urge you to submit to me but you have neglected their counsels and neglected me. I gave you to hear many sermons and exhortations but they have only served to harden your heart. I gave you my Sabbath: but what idle conversation have you engaged in - what worldly nay what carnal thoughts have you indulged - yea even in my sanctuary what lightness have you felt - what vile sensual thoughts have these occupied your minds and how little reverence have you felt for my name or character or commands! How little have you prayed on the Sabbath - how little examined your hearts - how often absented yourself from my house for the slightest reason - how much of the day have you spent in reflecting upon your worldly concerns and in and in devising new plans for your worldly advancement! In short you have never loved me at all! You have never done a single deed to promote my glory - you have never repented of your sins after a godly manner - you have never offered me a single prayer that was acceptable - you have never performed one of my commands from a right motive. In all your ways you have acted supremely for self - you have abused my mercies - neglected my offers of of salvation - dishonored me in your thoughts and feelings and actions - you have forsaken me in all your ways and now I forsake you. Depart from me thou cursed into everlasting fire prepare for the Devil and his angels.

Thus impenitent man will your mouth be stopped in the day of judgment and your vain pleas will never endure the scrutiny of an omniscient holy God. And that God will arrive clothed with vengeance to the exercise of that right he has to punish you with everlasting destruction. And even now the bow of God's wrath is bent and the arrow is on the string and is pointing at your heart and nothing delays it but the sovereign mercy of God and he an angry God. It is that alone which keeps you out of hell. It is that alone which restrains the darkening clouds of sinner vengeance from bursting its thunders and its lightnings over your head.

Christian what a miracle of grace was it that you gave a new heart! Why was it that you had such a favor conferred upon you while others with no worse natural inclinations than yourself are left to feel the everlasting torments of perdition! O the obligations imposed upon you by this act of sovereign mercy are infinite. And may you feel them deeply and feel them this afternoon when you commemorate the wonderful act of redemption around the table of your Lord may you feel rising within you a new and unconquerable resolution to go forth and vindicate the rights of God in an ungodly world. Remember brethren that if you stand forth finally defence of these God will stand forth in defence of you before an assembled universe.

Sermon 70 Rights of God Part 2

[Sermon No. 69-70, "Rights of God," Samuel 3:18, 1821 Sep,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 10]

I Samuel 3:18

It is the Lord: let him do what seemeth him good.

[See remarks at the beginning of Sermon 69.]

In the morning discourse we made no remarks upon this text but hurried forward to a vindication of the rights of God. And yet in fact every one of those propositions we then made was a command upon the world we have just read. They were as you doubtless recollect the submissive reply of Eli to Samuel when the state of things is the real if not the professed object of all sinful beings. All their efforts all their feelings are in violent opposition to that benevolent plan which God is carrying on for the happiness of the universe. And it would seem to mortal faculties that the only way to counteract this opposition would be to exterminate sin from the universe. But a God of perfect wisdom has so arranged the constitution of the moral world that he often employs the wicked actions of men to advantage his purposes and promote his glory so that while they are giving vent to their ungodly action are in fact most eminently promotive of the ultimate good of the universe. And that God has a right to exercise this astonishing power whereby he causes the wrath of man to praise him we need not spent time in proving. For to deny this would be to deny...

Sermon 71 Religious Joy

[Sermon No. 71, "Religious Joy," I Thessalonians 5:16, 1821 Sep,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 11]

Thessalonians 5:16

Rejoice evermore.

In ancient days a certain man suddenly changed his religious opinions and giving up all other pursuits he went about to persuade his countrymen that they were erroneous in their faith and practice though they professed to have received their system of belief immediately from God. This person appeared to the more reputable and distinguished of his countrymen and indeed almost all of them from the highest to the lowest to have become a lunatic and to be a genuine enthusiast. And they concluded that it was their duty to treat him as a madman and to restore him to his reason if possible if not to destroy him from the earth. Accordingly a violent persecution commenced against him and on many occasions he escaped as it were by a miracle from imminent destruction. Often was he imprisoned and brought before the magistrate and tried for high treason. Still he persisted in openly maintaining his new religious opinions and by his perseverance and superior faculty of persuasion and acuteness in argument he drew after him from the poor and ignorant classes of society a considerable number of followers. This served only to increase the hatred and persecutions of his countrymen against the leader and against his proselytes. Five times received he forty stripes save one. Hence was he beating with rods, once was he stoned, thrice suffered he shipwreck. He was in journeyings often in periods of waters in perils of robbers in perils by his own countrymen in perils by foreigners in perils in the city imperils in the wilderness imperils in the sea imperils among false brethren. In weariness and painfulness in wretchings often and hunger and thirst in fastings often and cold and nakedness. His followers also had trials of cruel mocking and scourgings yea moreover of bonds and imprisonment. They were stoned were tempted were slain with the sword. They wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins being destitute afflicted tormented. Indeed this man and his followers were outcast from society from poor penniless persecuted wanderers having scarcely a place to lay their heads. Or if they abode in any city their meetings and deliberations were generally in some secret spot and they had neither riches nor influence to spread their cause.

Among other cities which the leader of this new and despised sect visited was Thessalonica. Here he publicly defended his cause in the historian tells us thereby the whole city was set in an uproar and that this leader of the sect was sent away by night to save his life. A considerable time after his departure he sent back to his proselytes a letter to give an account of himself and to confirm them in his cause. And among other things he exhorts them to rejoice evermore.

At first view such an exhortation as this looks like an insult upon the Thessalonians. For in consequence of the persuasions of this leader they had abandoned the religion of their fathers and thereby thought themselves exposed to the severest miseries and they lived constantly exposed to punishment insults and death. They were in jeopardy every hour. And now how ridiculous nay what a mockery of their feelings was it for this men who had been the sole means of their distress to direct them to rejoice evermore! And yet my hearers there is one circumstance that will make us pause before we form such an opinion. This leader was Paul a follower of Jesus Christ - the man who told his disciples that his kingdom was not of this world. And Paul was persuaded that his proselytes in Thessalonica were really converted to the religion of the Gospel. Now then a question occurs whether there is not something in this religion that will enable a person to rejoice even in the time of severe affliction? Whether there is not a peace of mind which as the world cannot give so it cannot take away? Whether a man may not have so lively a sense of the things of eternity and so firm a conviction of future happiness as in a great measure to carry him above the trials and distresses of life? We know indeed that there are many who supposed that the things of religion have nothing real in them and that the professed joys of the disciples of Christ are mainly imaginary. The Jews who persecuted Paul and his followers were fully persuaded that he and they were mad men and endeavoring to turn the world upside down and that their pretended comforts were but the reveries of insanity. And many others in all ages have been of the same opinion. But after an attentive examination of this point my hearers we are persuaded that Paul was not mad and that he spoke forth the word of truth and soberness and that his followers were enabled in the midst of their presentations and distresses to rejoice evermore. Let us spend a few moments in showing what it is that gives a real Christian peace and joy.

The first thing that enables a believer in Christ to rejoice evermore is that he is no longer exposed to everlasting burnings.

He remembers with a shuddering destructiveness that period when for months and years he lived under the curse of God - that is during all his life before his conversion. The wrath of an angry God hung over him and the two edged sword of a broken law was already ready thirsting for his blood. He stood upon the very brink of the lake of eternal fire and a single misstep would have sunk him forever. Yet the merciful right hand of God guided his steps so that he felt not and that arm of mercy held back that flaming arrow. Yea and at length its omnipotent grasp seized him from the jaws of destruction. A made him a trophy of victorious grace. Now he stands upon a rock against which the gates of hell can never prevail. Between him and hell there is a wall through which the Prince of darkness cannot penetrate and the the arm of that same God is now shielding him from an exposure to the eternal fire. O what an escape! What a countless load of despair and anguish is taken from his head! If he does not rejoice where is his sensibility where his gratitude to Jehovah?

But in the second place not only is he delivered from eternal wrath and restored to everlasting happiness - to happiness which ye hath not seen nor ever heard neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive. Not only has hell beneath him been closed so that he walks safely above it but heaven above him has been opened and there does he see the paradox of God with the tree of life with the river of life with the New Jerusalem founded upon twelve precious stones and having pavements of gold in the midst of a throne for him to sit upon while the glories of his Redeemer shine around in eternal splendor and beauty - all this is open before the believer as is own sure inheritance. Let him then rejoice evermore. His heart must be adamant if it do not burn with a holy joy and burst forth into singing and thanksgiving to the saints have redeemed him by his precious blood and made him a king and a priest unto God.

And third cause the Christian has for rejoicing is that he has gotten the victory over death. That is to say he has that armor upon him which ensures victory whenever he engages in the conflict. The righteousness of Christ is the shield that can quench all the fiery darts of the last enemy. This will clear a path for the saint through the dark valley of death. This will give him a triumph over the agonies of dissolution. When he lies upon the bed of death this will direct his eyes to that Saviour and to his last moments and such a confidence will be inspired in him who is the resurrection and the life that he can calmly say, O death where is thy sting! O grave where is thy victory! Thanks be to God who giveth me the victory through my Lord Jesus Christ. And even now in anticipation of that hour the believer full of gratitude to God can feelingly exclaim, Thanks be to God who giveth me the victory through my Lord Jesus Christ.

A fourth source of joy to the Christian is religious meditation.

To the eye of the believer God is everywhere. He sees him in the sun and the moon and the stars in the earth air and water in every animal every insect every plant every mineral - and there is an inexhaustible fund of holy and rational joy when we can thus look at creation as the works of our father whom we love. But the Spiritual world is yet more vast - and the saint directs his contemplations chiefly to that heavenly world where is God and the Holy Spirit and the Redeemer surrounded by innumerable multitudes of holy holy happy beings whose society he is soon to join. And in order to learn the nature of the enjoyment of heaven he meditates often upon the word of God. Here too does he find a boundless field for contemplation. The nature of God the nature of man the mystery of Redemption the excellency of God's laws and the reasonableness of his terms of salvation all the subjects and a thousand others developed in the bible afford a kind of rational exalted and holy joy to him who loves religion. Like the devoted Psalmist the Christian exclaims, O how I love thy law it is my meditation all the day. Mine eyes prevent the night watches that I might meditate in thy word. Christians of this assembly do you know such a joy as this in contemplating the works of providence and the word of God? Have these meditations occupied your minds all the day as they did the mind of the Psalmist? If they have not is it not well to enquire seriously whether you are not deceiving yourselves with a false hope?

A fifth source of joy to the Christian is repentance for sin.

It may perhaps be thought absurd to say that that which produces pain is a source of joy. Repentance indeed is in its commencement painful. It is distressing to realize deeply that we have most wantonly and cruelly offended our Father and kindest Benefactor. But still the man who has a holy principle within him a new contending with the old will feel a joy even in the moment of his distress because that very pain is bringing down his pride that mortal enemy to his peace. And the state of feeling produced by repentance is full of peace and joy. Nay the last tear which the Christian weeps over his sins is a tear of joy - tear drawn from by a sense of returning the favour of God. And my hearers we venture to say that the saint in one deep and genuine hour of repentance experiences more delight than any man ever yet had who opened his whole life in sinful indulgence. And if this distressing part of a Christian's experiences be so mingled with pleasure - what shall we say of those seasons when God shines upon his heart without a cloud. Of these things be done in the green tree what shall be done in the dry? Christians of this assembly do you experience anything of this repentance whose end is joy in the Holy Ghost. If you do not see to it brethren that you are not resting in a false hope: for a Christian without repentance is a being unknown in the Bible.

In the sixth place a Christian rejoices because he has gotten the victory over his ungodly passions and corrupt inclinations.

As nothing can render a man more unhappy than to be under the dominion of his passions so nothing can produce a more serene pleasure than to have them under his feet and to say to their proud nerves thus far shalt ye come but no farther. How calm and peaceful in his bosom where every ungodly and unruly lust and appetite is restrained within its proper limits and not suffered to usurp the place of reason and religion! When the tumult of passion begins to rise happy must be that man who can crush its impetuosity and tame the ferocity of his heart! Yet all this is the Christian unable to do by almighty grace, and it ought to be to him an occasion of joy and rejoicing.

Let it not be said that these assertions are contrary to experience: because there are many who profess to have religion who do not curb their passions but who are led captive by them at their pleasure. For my hearers we have speak of the real possessors not the mere professors of religion – two classes of men often widely different - just as different as the heirs of heaven are from the heirs of hell. If even very many men should declare that they have religion who should neglect habitually to govern their passions it would not prove that religious men did not keep them under but that these men had not religion. We cannot my brethren and we cannot believe that a man of real piety will long indulge in an habitual known sin: for he that is born of God doth not commit sin for his seed remaineth in him and he cannot sin because he is born of God. That is to say doubtless he cannot habitually and knowingly sin.

And now Christians of this assembly do you experience that peace with joy flowing from sustained and well regulated written passions. Or does some one of your evil inclinations habitually reign over you and disturb your comfort: nay are you not sometimes through the influence of this lust unfit for devotion? If this be the case Brethren O see to it I beseech you see to it that your hope is not a mere spiders web! Are there not many men who make no profession of religion who have more correct habits and whose morality at least is better than your own? If so the world have more reason to conclude that such are pious men than yourselves because the world must judge by the fruits. Arise then and wipe away this foul reproach upon your character and upon the name of Christ.

A seventh source whence the Christian derives joy and rejoicing is a communion with his brethren.

If we are performing a journey from one place to another on earth how pleasant is it to find a fellow traveler! And in this wilderness of sin and sorrow how much more joyful to find a fellow traveler to heaven! It strengthens the believers faith and hope when he meets with others who have passed through the same initiatory change of heart who have had similar conflicts with the world the flesh and the adversary - who feel same inward conflict between the old and the new man - who feel within them the same heart of deceitfulness and depravity but who yet trust in the same precious Redeemer as he does - who feel the same filial confidence in God – the same reliance on his grace and who eagerly look forward with ardent aspirations and elevated conceptions to the same haven of rest and eternal glory. O how sweet is it for such persons of the like hopes and experience to hold communion together! It serves to awaken the languishing graces of the believer - to make his heart kindle anew with a holy love and to disentangle itself from the fetters of this world thus to converse with and to pray with his brethren!

Christians of this audience has such communion as this with your brethren been delightful to you? When you meet one another have you engaged in close enquiries upon experimental religion! I do not ask whether you have engaged in controversy on the subject of religion nor whether you have been forward in exhibiting the faults and censuring the practices of other denominations of Christians: but have you come to converse upon the state of vital religion in your own hearts - upon the best means of advancing Christ's kingdom and upon the exceeding great reward that awaits the faithful and have you been more delighted with such conversation the more your brother was engaged in the subject and the more close and searching were his enquiries? And have you rejoiced at separation to unite in a prayer to your common father! If you have neglected all this you have not known at least one of the present pleasures of religion and you want at least one evidence of your own piety viz. a strong love of the brethren.

An eighth source of Christian joy is communion with God.

All Joy must flow from heaven to the believer. God is the centre of all his wishes and hopes and therefore to commune with him must afford the purest and sweetest pleasure. And we have no other means for communing with God but by prayer. In the sanctuary of God the Christian often finds a nearness to his heavenly Father that is delightful. Especially at the table to commemorate the death of his Redeemer does God often fill the disciples heart with the holy peace - nay some find at that season a joy unspeakable and full of glory. O it is a spot of peculiar manifestations where the presence of God is often so sensibly felt that a saint will feel how dreadful is this place – this is none other than the house of God and the gate of heaven. It is good for me to be here. In family prayer too a Christian not unfrequently finds a nearness of access to the mercy seat which fills him with the love and presence of God - and how pleasant is it for him who sustains the responsibility of the head of a family mornings and evenings to command them in faith to the care of Almighty God his most merciful father. But it is in secret prayer that the believer finds himself able to comprehend what is the breadth and length and depth and height and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge and is filled with all the fullness of God. O there is a joy in secret communion with God that is beyond all price - a joy which he who has felt it would not exchange for this whole world - a joy which fills and elevates and enraptures the soul - a joy which is a foretaste of heaven. It is a moment when God shines in full glory upon the Christian soul - when the world is trodden under the believers feet - when he knows that God is reconciled to him and that he shall soon get to enjoy him.

Christians of this assembly! Has communion with God been habitually observed by you and have you often found it delightful in the sanctuary coming - consoling in the family and enrapturing in secret? Then do you possess an additional evidence that you are born of God. You have within you a source of joy whose streams will never become disgusting and will never dry up. But if you know nothing of the joys of such communion, O it is high time to enquire whether you are not leaning upon a broken staff.

The last source of joy the believer in Christ possesses lies in his effort to advance the Redeemers Kingdom among men.

If a man be himself sensible of a great deliverance and of experiencing the most sublime and delightful pleasures he will be anxious that others experience the same deliverance and the same pleasure. If you say to a friend treading over a lake of fire and in danger of falling into it every moment and if by means of your warning him of his danger he should be restored to a place of safety you could not help rejoicing at the deed. If you had just been delivered from a place of torture and could be instrumental in delivering others it must afford you pride and intense pleasure. So the Christian having trod over hell having long been under the tortures of sin - and being at length rescued from his danger and distress and restored to the hopes of heaven and the delights of religion must rejoice exceedingly if he can deliver any of his brethren from the same exposure to hell and from the tortures of sin.

And when any man does not have an earnest desire to be instrumental of the salvation of others - when he does not feel a thrill of joy to learn that a soul is born again and another subject added to Christ's kingdom must it not be because he does not realize the value of his own salvation - because he does not feel that there is such an infinite distance as the bible describes between the regenerate and the unregenerate? Or rather should it not awaken an earnest enquiry in such a man whether he himself ever has experienced religion seeing he has none of its comfort and feels so little anxiety about those around him who are walking carelessly over the bottomless pit? Christians of the assembly we put this enquiry to you.

Such are briefly the sources whence a real Christian desires joy and rejoicing. It is his happiness to hope that he is delivered from the everlasting burnings and that he is an heir of everlasting bliss - and to realize that he has gotten the victory over death - and to reap the joyous fruits of repentance - and to triumph over his evil passions and inclinations - and to have communion with his brethren and to have sweet communion with God and his Son Jesus Christ and to be instrumental of promoting the empire of happiness. If from all these he cannot desire a pure and holy joy where can he find it on earth? O Christian, if there be one particle of pure and rational happiness on earth, it belongs to you. It is your happy privilege to taste the purest delights to be found beneath the sun nay to have a foretaste of the joys of heaven. We repeat then the text, rejoice evermore. We say to the believer whether in prophecy or adversity in sickness or in health – rejoice evermore. And Oh, while your eyes run down with tears of joy let there be mingled a tear of compassion for the unhappy multitudes around you who have none of your comfort and none of your heavenly hopes – and whose momentary laughter will soon be turned into everlasting mourning.

Sermon 73 [Hope of Divine Mercy]

[Sermon No. 73, "Hope of Divine Mercy," Job 27:8, Romans 5:5, 1821 Nov,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 11]

Job 27:8

For what is the hope of the hypocrite though he hath gained when God taketh away his soul?

Romans 5–5

And hope maketh not ashamed.

There are two things that prevent the great majority of men from attending to the subject of religion. Some indulge a secret hope that they are on good ground though they know nothing and practice nothing of experimental religion. Others do not suffer themselves to reflect seriously upon the subject. For did unregenerate men fully realize that they are exposed every hour to sink forever into everlasting misery without the possibility of escape it would be morally impossible for them to rest easy. A man who sees his habitation in imminent danger from fire would find it difficult to sleep in it. So a man who realize that he was himself in imminent danger of eternal fire could not with the utmost exertion direct his thoughts from the terrifick picture. Whenever he should whatever he should engage in hell would be continually present before him and he would startle at the rustling of a leaf lest the hand of death was about to plug plunge him into it. Impenitent men therefore who are careless do not realize their actual danger or they have a hope that they are not exposed to perdition.

An immense multitude we believe are in this lost predicament. They are clinging to some kind of hope that they are secure. And some we believe are resting that hope on a proper foundation and are indeed secure shielded by the righteousness of Christ from every Spiritual danger. But there are very many others who the bible warrants in saying have merely the hope of the hypocrite that perishes when God takes away the soul. That some have false hopes is implied in the text. Paul had just been saying to his brethren that, being justified by faith they had peace with God through the Lord Jesus Christ. By whom also they access by faith into that grave wherein they stood and rejoiced in hope of the glory of God. And not only so continues the apostle but we glory in tribulations also: knowing that tribulation worketh patience and patience experience and experience hope: And hope maketh not ashamed because the love of God is shed around in our hearts by the Holy Ghost.

Paul in the text then is speaking of a hope of the glory of God that is a hope of future glory in heaven. And he says that this hope did not make them ashamed. It was built on such a foundation that they would not be ashamed to profess it before men and before the universe at the last day. And by this expression he implies that there is such a thing as hope of heaven of which men ought to be ashamed on earth and of which they will be ashamed at last because it rests on a delusive foundation. We must first examine those hopes which are delusive and secondly enquire into the grounds of that which will abide the trial by fire.

In the first place he has a hope that maketh ashamed at the judgment day who pursues upon the mercy of God without any faith in Christ.

So exalted and perfect is the holiness of God so irreconcilable is his character with sin in every shape that a sinful being cannot directly approaching him and live. From his eternal throne there flashes forth so many holy jealousies to guard him from the approach of whatever defileth the man who presumes to enter his presence unshielded by a mediator is madly tempting his destruction. Is it not enough to be told by an inspired person that, no man cometh to the Father but by the Son? Is it not enough for Christ to declare that, without him we can do nothing, and for an apostle to add, There is none other name given under heaven whereby ye can be sure? Mercy, my hearers? There is no mercy out of Christ. On every one of us who trusts in anything else for acceptance there abideth the wrath of God. There is one and only one path that leads from earth to heaven. And in the very entrance of this path is Christ. On every other side the walls of that holy city are guarded by a doubly flaming sword. And the lightning of divine justice flashes upon the man who attempts to climb up some other way in defiance of Omnipotence. The earth is indeed full of the goodness of the Lord: but in regard to saving sinful man God has selected his own way and declared that if men refuse to comply with this he shall not be saved at all. To hope for his mercy therefore in any other way is to tempt God. And when we shall meet Christ in judgment we shall be ashamed to acknowledge that we have hoped for salvation without any faith in his blood. Reason indeed might decide that the most rational way in which God can pardon man is simply through repentance and reformation. But God in his revelation has declared that he will not pardon them on these terms: but that they shall believe on his Son or he will not listen for one moment to their supplications for mercy. Whoever therefore in defiance of this declaration presumes upon God's mercy while he is out of Christ wishes upon his own destruction.

In the second place he has a hope that will make him ashamed at the bar of Christ who presumes that God is too merciful to punish any part of the human race everlastingly and that all will at length be restored to his favor.

And indeed it ought to make such an one not only ashamed of his hope but even to tremble for it and to abandon it when he opens his bible and reads that the wicked shall go away into everlasting misery, that they shall be punished, with everlasting destruction - that their worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched - that the smoke of their torments ascended up forever and ever. Yes when a man reads such passages as these dictated by the God who cannot lie and so plain that nothing but an evil heart of unbelief can misunderstand them he ought to be concerned - he ought to blush that he believes that the wicked shall not go away into everlasting misery - that they will not be punished with everlasting destruction and that their worm will die and their fire will be quenched. For to presume that God will not execute his threatenings what is it but to charge him with a lie? And the man who make such a charge upon God either directly or impliedly has something worse than shame awaiting him in eternity - something worse than disappointment awaiting him - something worse than he can now imagine.

In the third place he will be ashamed of his hope who trusts to his morality and amiableness alone for salvation.

Why says someone do you continually endeavor to depreciate morality - that pillar on which society rests - that without which men would become a horde of savages and robbers? Why not rather show us the necessity of possessing it and not a man who hears you but will approve your recommendations? God forbid my hearers that we should ever refuse morality that place which He has given it. God forbid too that we should say to any man that mere morality should save him from the burnings of perdition. For if the bible does not teach that men must be saved by faith in Christ and by that only it does not teach any thing. And that same bible teaches us also and experience teaches us that worldly morality may exist in its utmost perfection when there is not one particle of faith in Christ. Though on the other hand faith in Christ cannot exist without morality and morality too of a superior order - a morality founded on the love of God.

To show that the strictest morality and kindness may exist among the people where there is not one particle of love to God take the following illustration. Suppose a remote part of an empire to have rebelled against its lawful sovereign and to have fortified itself for the most determined opposition. Now it is easy to conceive that among these rebels there maybe established the most strict and equitable laws – and every one of them is most exact in their observance and that an infringement of the least article is punished severely and that there may be an united effort to maintain these laws in all their purity. And such a set of rules may in all their public affairs be under the most wholesome regulations and every one of them cheerfully obedient. But at the same time every one of them is in a state of most daring and obstinate rebellion against his lawful sovereign and they have cast off the authority of every one of his laws and are altogether opposed to submitting to a single regulation coming from him.

Just so in this rebellious world - men may establish the purest regulations among themselves and be most strict in the maintenance of correct moral feelings and correct moral conduct towards one another so that every feeling and every practice contrary to the standard agreed upon shall be regarded with an indignant disapprobation and punished by neglect. And we may conceive this whole world under the influence of such moral habits and feelings exhibiting an interesting spectacle to an observer who looks no farther than this world. But at the same time were he to direct his thoughts to God the rightful sovereign of the earth he might find that with all this perfect morality between men and men there is a total disregard of the commands of God - that is to say such a state of morals might exist while not an individual regarded that first great command of God to love him supremely. And therefore every individual might be under condemnation in the court of heaven as obstinate rebels.

Now as it is certain that no man will ever be saved without the love of God in his heart and as there may be the most strict morality of conduct and amiableness of feeling when there is not one particle of this love nay when the heart is actually in rebellion against heaven it follows that morality alone does not secure salvation. Faith in Christ too is declared essential to salvation - and certainly a man may be moral and amiable without this faith and therefore we repeat the conclusion that morality however strict and amiable however attracting do not in themselves secure us from the condemnation of rebels under which we all by nature lie.

And yet my hearers we believe that many men do actually rest their everlasting all upon their good deeds. Many will feel if they do not say that it has been their intention to render to all their dues and to be benevolent in rendering the wants of their fellow man and that in short they may have consciences void of offence towards all men because they have always endeavoured to act as they should act and that they do not fear that justice will not be done them in another world. O man that is just what we fear. We fear that justice will be done you and then you are certainly undone. For God commanded you to love him supremely and to live continually to his glory and now this is the question that will be asked you before the bar of God not what moral deeds you have performed toward your fellow men but have you complied with the first and greatest commandment of loving God. And if you reply in the negative certainly if God deal justly with you he will punish you with everlasting destruction. It is the justice of God then that you are to fear. And when he demands of you why you did not love him will you not be ashamed to recount your good deeds to your fellows as a vindication of yourself when you are deficient in that first of all requirements love to your God? O my hearers if there be one of you existing on such a delusive hope give it up - give it up now - be ashamed of it now that you may not be ashamed of it in the day of judgment. For certainly if the word of God be true it will not abide in that day and will be swept away like a spiders web by the whirlwind of the Lord.

In the fourth place that is a hope that will finally make a man ashamed which is built on the failings of professed Christians.

There are not a few who when enquired of concerning the state of their hearts not having experienced anything of regenerating grace and feeling perhaps a little irritated at the enquiry will reply that they believe themselves as safe and that their lives are as good as such or such a professor of religion. But the difficulty in this case my hearers is that the professor of religion who does not live according to the vows that are upon him has no evidence that he is safe - nay until he amend his ways and live godly in Christ Jesus there is evidence that he an enemy of God and that his condemnation will be more aggravated in eternity than that of the man who lives carelessly. If then you are in no safer condition than the professor of religion who lives in sin you are in greater danger than most other unregenerate men. You may flatter yourself with the idea that you shall go as certainly to heaven as that professor. But the fact is that professor will not go to heaven at all - and if you accompany him you will be sunk in perdition deeper than Sodom and Gomorrah. And when you are in hell being in torment it will afford but a miserable consolation to reflect that a false or backslidden professor of religion was the means of your destruction. Away then with such a miserable subterfuge - such a shameful hope.

In the fifth place he has a hope that will finally make him ashamed who is depending for salvation upon his supposed conversion rather than upon the fruits of his conversion.

We shall best illustrate the meaning of this proposition by stating a case. A person becomes alarmed concerning his eternal safety and is brought under deep convictions for his sins and his alarming condition. After a period of distress which is perhaps very deep he distress subsides perhaps suddenly and it may be that his succeeding comforts and joys are very great. For a time he is constant and fervent in his prayers to God in his closet - and he is strict in the performance of every duty relating to himself or his fellow man or his God. But ere long he begins to neglect the duties of the closet he takes little interest in social worship he begins to doubt the reality of religion and especially of peculiar attention to it. He neglects to come forward and profess his faith in his Redeemer and in a short time though he may continue to be moral and amiable, his closet is neglected almost entirely and he scarcely performs a single duty of religion that is peculiar to all Christians such as self-examination - repentance - prayer - conversations with his brethren - communion at the Lord's table - exhortations to sinners etc. But yet it is rare that his conscience is alarmed and he does not often suffer himself to compare his present stupid state with that he was in at the period of his supposed conversion. If by chance such a person is enquired of whether he indulges a hope that he is on safe ground and in favor with God - he will perhaps bring forward his supposed conversion many years previous to establish his tittle to a Son of God. Although during those many years that have elapsed since the supposed period of his conversion he has lived just as those who make no pretensions to religion. In other words he depends for evidence of his Christian state not on the fruits of his faith in Christ: but solely on those feelings he experienced a long time past. Now let us see whether the bible does not forbid his trusting to any such ground as this for salvation.

What is the mark my hearers which Christ gives to determine who are Christians? By their fruits, says he, ye shall know them. Not everyone that saith unto me Lord, Lord shall enter into the kingdom of heaven but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Now this man of whom we speak has none of these fruits to prove him a son of God. The many years ago said Lord Lord unto Christ but he has neglected to do the will of God. We ask then has he the least reason to conclude that he has ever experienced religion? Again the apostle says, faith without works is dead being alone. And is not this exactly the faith of this man? He had faith and yet it did not produce works. Therefore it was a dead faith a faith which will make ashamed at last. We do not deny indeed that a man may live long in a backslidden state who is a real Christian. But if he fall into such a state soon after his supposed conversion and continue in it year after year he has no evidence we say that he is a Christian. No matter how deep were his convictions for sin - no matter how clear were his succeeding views nor how lively were his joys of the fruit of those convictions and joys did not appear in his life - or if like the seed sown in stony ground the sun withered away the tender blade that man cannot according to the bible say that he was ever born again. Real religion my hearers is an abiding operative entire principle and it will inevitably show itself in the life. So that if it do not appear in the conduct - if you do not habitually appear a man has every reason to conclude that it does not exist within him and that if he trust to any religious feelings experience of many years since he is trusting to a hope that will make him ashamed. It is the present state of the feelings and of the conduct that can alone determine the Christian state - that is to say if a man finds himself now in habits of communion with God - of repentance for sin - of laboring in the cause of Christ and if he actually now strive to fulfill all the commandments of Christ this gives more grounds for hope than any solitary experience we have had many years ago. Many persons indeed spend year after year in trying to ascertain whether they did not secure a new heart a long time since. But were they to occupy as much time and devote as much labor and praying and repenting and serving Christ now they would not be wanting in evidence that they love God. It is no matter when we become Christians if we are now Christians: and if we do not serve and love God now it will not avail us anything to ascertain that we loved him formerly. Abandon then my hearers if any of you are cleaving to such a hope as this abandon it and adopt the resolution of Paul to, forget the things that are behind and reaching forth to those that are before press forward towards the mark for the picture of your high calling of God in Christ Jesus your Lord.

The way is open to proceed to the second head of discourse where we proposed to examine the ground of hope which maketh not ashamed. And it may confidently be stated that a, good hope through grace, rests solely on the righteousness of Christ. But what is the evidence a man can have that he has genuine saving faith in Christ? We have already shown that mere morality and amiableness does not prove it. We have shown too that faith without works does not prove it and that convictions for sin - repentance for sin and secret prayer are necessary to prove that our supposed religious actions are not mere worldly morality. On the other hand good works are necessary to show that our faith is not a dead faith - a mere delusion of the imagination.

And my hearers we believe that if a man find himself year after year habitually possessed of religious feelings and at the same time habitually performs religious actions that he has the strongest evidence that can be given that he has that hope which maketh not ashamed. Permit me then to enquire of each individual before me whether you are habitually impressed with a sense of your sinfulness - whether you habitually repent of sin - and habitually pray in secret - and habitually meditate upon religion and habitually long for more holiness and whether you habitually strive to perform the commandments - every one of the commandments of Christ. If you answer that you do probably you have a hope that will not make you ashamed. If you answer that you do not and yet are not destitute of a hope of immortal happiness probably yours is the hope of the hypocrite that will perish when God taketh away your soul.

Sermon 74 No Hope but in Christ

[Sermon No. 74, "No Hope But in Christ," Acts 4:12, 1821 Nov,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 11]

Acts 4:12

Neither is their salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved

The object of this discourse my hearers is to drive you to despair. And not until you are brought to that state have we any hope that you will ever be saved from eternal misery. Until you are driven to despair we despair of your salvation. Indeed no man ever entered heaven unless he passed through the gates of despair. He must despair of his own righteousness – despair of his evil heart - despair of his repentance – despair of the prayers of others - despair of the means of religion in short - he must despair of everything but the sovereign mercy of God through Jesus Christ. And these are the points brethren upon which we would now endeavor to persuade you to despair.

In the first place men must despairing their own righteousness as a ground of their salvation.

In order to determine whether men may not be saved by their own good deeds let us look at the conditions of their acceptance with God. He has given them a law that is holy just and good to regulate all their thoughts and words and actions and to that law is annexed a penalty. The language of this law is this (*) Cursed is everyone that continueth not in all things written in the law to do them. Whosoever keepeth the whole law and yet offendeth in one point is guilty of all. (*) Moses, says Paul, describeth the righteousness which is of the law that the man which doeth those things shall live by them. It is evident then that if any man can observe every one article of God's law – every one of his thoughts every one of his feelings and every one of his actions be exactly according to the law or will of God he can justify himself before God and thus attain salvation. But if during a man's whole life he indulge a single thought or feeling or word or action contrary to this he is at once cut off from the possibility of being justified by the law - for whatsoever offendeth in one point is guilty of all. The question then occurs – has any mere man since the fall been able perfectly to keep keep the commandments of God? And for deciding this Christian we cannot have better authority than the bible. Says Solomon there is not a just man on earth that doeth good and sinneth not. And John says, If we say that we have no sin we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us. Again he says, no man liveth sinneth not. And Paul says, we all have sinned and come short of the glory of God. If this be true and if the wages of sin is death, as the same apostle declares. How we ask we ask - we ask it with emphasis - how is any man to be justified and acquitted before God by his own works? Constantly every one of us by nature lies under the sentence of eternal death: And now since God must execute his threatenings or forfeit the integrity of his character how can we prevent his coming out in judgment against us? Suppose that for this time we could perfectly meet the laws of God? Yet would that be no more than is justly his due - still might it be said that we were, unprofitable servants - we have done that which it was our duty to do. For he has most justly commanded us to love him with all our heart and soul and mind and strength and what more than this could we do? But still what would become of those sins or that single sin of which the Scripture says we have all been guilty and for which God has shown he will punish us? How can we make amends to God for that offense if for the time to come we can do no more than is our most reasonable duty? Surely that sentence must be executed upon us without mitigation if we depend upon our own righteousness to defend us and render ourselves acceptable to God. We may with perfect truth repeat the conclusion of Paul so often made in his Epistles to the Romans and Galatians - therefore by deeds of the law shall no flesh living be justified.

Thus far my hearers we have been supposing that man is guilty of only a single sin during his whole life - and yet by that one soon he is effectively cut off from even the possibility by his own righteousness of escaping everlasting misery. But how much more gloomy and hopeless is the prospect on the part of man when we reflect that not a day passes over his head but he is guilty of many sins! How enormous will be the catalog during a life of threescore years and ten! And how is he to atone for all these by his righteous deeds? His righteous deeds! We have indeed spoken of men by nature as performing righteous acts: but brethren what is the real truth on this subject! Let us again resort to the bible. The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men to see if there were any that did understand that did such after God. They are all gone out of the way: there is none righteous no not one. The heart of the sons of man is full of evil and madness is in their hearts while they live. The heart is deceptive above all things and desperately wicked. The imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth. And is this indeed the language of inspiration? And could not God find a single man in whom by nature there was any righteousness? Not any one in whose heart there was not madness - not one the imagination of whose heart was not evil from his youth? Does not the bible exaggerate or mean something else when it describes men so wicked by nature that they do not love God at all nay that they are enemies of God? Ah, my hearers, be this humbling doctrine ever so repugnant to our feelings it is nevertheless a plain doctrine of scripture. What then becomes of the righteous men as a ground of their acceptance with God? How can they be justified by that which they do not possess? How can he be justified before God, whose heart is full of evil who drinketh in iniquity like water - whose heart is desperately wicked and the imagination of whose heart is evil from his youth? Yet this is the very scriptural account of man. The sooner then that man despairs of salvation by his own righteousness the better. For these cannot be any more offensive to God than for a being thus depraved to come forward and claim salvation as due to his goodness. Hence it is that we find then the apostle Paul arguing with such correctness against the doctrine of justification by works.

But suppose God to implant as we know he does implant in the hearts of some a new principle a principle of holy obedience: cannot these be justified by works? We reply in the words of an eminent writer, I will says he but only make a demand: If God should yield unto not as unto Abraham if fifty, forty, thirty, twenty yea if ten good persons could be found in a city for their sakes this city should not be destroyed: but and if he should make us an offer this large search all the generations of men since the fall of our Father Adam and one man that has done one action which have passed from him pure without any stain or blemish at all; and for that one man's only action neither man nor angels shall feel the torments which are prepared for both. Do you think that this person this ransom to deliver men and angels could be found to be among the sons of men? The best things which we do have somewhat in them to be pardoned. How then can we do anything meritorious or worthy to be rewarded? (Hooten Eccles. Pol.)

In the second place I would persuade men to despair of their own hearts without divine influence.

Were there within the heart of man a natural disposition to love God and religion he might cultivate this disposition without God's assistance and by his own exertions - by his own strength altogether acquire a love to God and to holiness - so that there would be no need of the grace of God at all to render a man fit for heaven. In such a case man should trust in his own heart and not despair of it. But my hearers how does such a view accord with those texts we have cited under the first head of this discourse? When the bible says that, the heart of the sons of men is full of evil, are we to understand that it is not full but contains some holiness some disposition to love God? When the bible says that the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth are we to conclude that a part of that imagination is evil and a part good? When that sacred book tells us that among the sons of men God could not find one righteous no not one are we to understand that those only are meant who have not cultivated their natural disposition to love God and that after all there are some righteous? When the bible says that, the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God for they are foolishness unto him neither can he know them because they are Spiritually discerned, are we to understand that some natural men do receive the things of the Spirit or God? O my hearers, let God be true but every man a liar. Better is it for us to believe the words of God than to flatter ourselves with the idea that these are exaggerated expressions and that our hearts are not so bad as the passages literally imply. Ask a man under deep and solemn impressions for sin whether he does not believe his heart to be full of evil and whether the imagination of his heart has not been evil from his youth and he will tell you that such apparently extravagant expressions as these do but faintly express the deep rooted - the entire depravity of his heart. Ask the Christian who has daily examine his heart for thirty or forty years whether some abatement ought not to be made for the meaning of such texts and he will reply that his constant experience has shown them to be literally true. O then my hearers ought not man to despair of ever deriving his salvation from such a fountain of any iniquity as his heart? When the God who cannot lie has told him that his heart is deceitful above all things, will he dare trust in it? And when that same God has added that his heart is desperately wicked, ought he not will he not give up all confidence in it and despair by the utmost strivings of unaided nature to cultivate in it a love to God and to holiness? What madness to trust our everlasting salvation upon that which is deceitful above all things or to expect holiness to spring up without the Spirit in that which is desperately wicked?

And yet o my brethren this is this the rock on which thousands have split. It is this unwillingness to believe ourselves by nature as bad as the Scriptures describe that has peopled the world of woe with myriads of our deluded race. For when a man acknowledges the entire corruption of his heart and his enmity to God he must also acknowledge that if he ever be saved must be through the sovereign grace of God. This is a degree of humiliation which the heart of man naturally resists with the utmost violence. And it is to the unregenerate a hard saying. Indeed unless the Spirit of God convince men of their sin of righteousness and judgment to come it is in vain to endeavor to persuade them that their hearts are so particularly destitute of holiness and so hostile to God. And yet also until they do feel this corruption and deceitfulness of their hearts they will never apply in an acceptable manner to God for a new heart. They will never come feeling that they are entirely lost – and despair altogether of their own hearts as containing anything that is acceptable before God. They will not feel that their salvation must be entirely of sovereign unmerited grace: but will suppose that they have within them some powers and feelings and that they have performed some deeds acceptable to God. But certain it is that God will have all the glory of man's salvation or he will not save them. We long therefore my hearers to see you despairing of your hearts. For then we should not despair of your salvation.

And in the third place we would persuade you to despair of your repentance. We do not mean that you should cease to repent or regard genuine sorrow for sin is a little importance: but merely that you should not depend upon this for salvation. It is no uncommon thing to find men relying upon the means of their salvation as the processing cause of it. After a person has been long under conviction for sin and has felt some sort of sorrow for it he is apt to suppose that on this account he is more acceptable to God and he cannot imagine why he is not converted. Now this man my hearers is building up a righteousness of his own. He makes his repentance the reason why God should regenerate him: whereas had his repentance been as genuine and deep as that of David described in the 51st Psalm he could on this account lay no claims to the converting grace of God - because after all he would deserve everlasting misery. And still would he be dependant entirely upon the merits of Christ: For there is salvation in none other: and there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby they can be saved. But my hearers the repentance of a man who does not love God and who never has been regenerated like other things which the wicked perform does not proceed from a right matter and therefore cannot be acceptable before God. To expect regeneration then on account of his repentance is to expect that God will reward an action which he cannot approve. While therefore every man is bound to strive to exercise genuine repentance for his sins let him remember that this is only a condition not the processing cause of his salvation and that after all there is another thing he must do before he will be saved. He must submit to the righteousness of Christ. He must trust in him and in him only and despair of everything but God's mercy in him.

In the fourth place men are exhorted to despair of their prayers as being able to save them. These too however well and acceptably performed are merely means which God has seen fit to appoint and can never by their intrinsic efficacy bring down regenerating or sanctifying grace. Even the effectual fervent prayer of the righteous which availeth much owes all its efficacy to the merits of Christ. Without these it would be merely an abomination before God because the very best service of the most holy man that ever lived is mixed with sin: and if Christ had not atoned for that sin God could not look upon the prayer with which it was mixed without abhorrence. But in this case as in that of repentance if it be the prayer of an unregenerate man it is the prayer of one who does not love God and it does not proceed from the right motive and cannot be pleasing to God. What presumption then is it for a sinner however correctly he may pray to depend upon his prayers for acceptance with God! And what a self-righteous spirit does it manifest! O the merits of Christ - the merits of Christ are the only ground of acceptance with God and to submit to his righteousness and despair of everything else is what God requires. For there is none other name under heaven etc.

And for this same general reason we urge men in the fifth place to despair of the prayers of others in their behalf. These prayers may indeed be the means of their conversion. But after all a man has something more to do than to sit still and depend upon those prayers. After all he must submit to Christ and feel that nothing but his atonement can save him from eternal ruin. It is proper indeed for the impenitent to solicit the prayers of Christians in their behalf: because God has appointed this as one of the means of salvation. But at the same time the sinner should feel that unless he himself submit all will avail nothing. He should feel that there is no efficacy at all in those prayers in themselves - but that their efficacy rests solely on the suffering and obedience of the Lamb of God.

In the sixth place we would urge you my hearers to despair of all the means of grace you enjoy - that is to say do not depend upon them for your salvation. It is no uncommon thing for men to feel that if they diligently read the scriptures and regularly attend upon the preaching of the Gospel and observe the Sabbath if they do all these they feel as if they have nothing more to perform and that they shall most certainly be converted before they die. But, brethren, this is depending upon the means of grace instead of Christs righteousness for salvation. To read the Scriptures is a duty - to support public worship by attending it is a duty and to keep the Sabbath is a duty none of which ought to be neglected: the truth is these things cannot save us. And besides all these we should feel it to be our duty - our duty this moment to submit to Christ and to love God and to repent of sin. And so long as we expect to be regenerated by a mere attendance upon the external duties that is so long as we expect God will convert us as a reward for our performance of these depend on it my hearers that we shall never be converted. The sooner therefore we letgo this delusive hope the sooner we despair of the means of grace as a ground of salvation so much the better. While then my hearers you are diligent in the improvement of the means of grace remember that after all you must submit to the righteousness of Christ or these means will only ensure your final condemnation.

In the last place we would persuade you to despair of everything as being able to save you but the sovereign mercy of God in Jesus Christ. We have mentioned several things to which men are clinging for salvation. But there are a thousand other things on which they rely which is not possible to point out in a sermon. But we may in general terms say that on whatever foundation a man is resting save Jesus Christ there is no hope for him and of every thing else we are urge him to despair. What other foundation for hope is there to a being who is entirely lost? Yet self-righteousness invents a thousand schemes of salvation and holds forth a thousand miserable stakes upon which the unrenewed heart will us seize. And it is self-righteousness after all that induces man to rest upon anything and upon every thing rather than upon Christ's righteousness. But the voice of God has declared that There is salvation in no other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved. Other foundations can no man say than that is laid which is Christ Jesus. Abandon then O sinner abandon every thing else and come to the cross of Christ: for everything else will ere long abandon you. But in Christ all fullness dwells and whosoever cometh to him he will in no wise cast out. O Despair of everything else: for everything else will at last make you (drive you to final) despair.

And my hearers, to this despairing condition to this low state of submission God is waiting to see you reduced and the moment you let go of everything but Christ and his cross God will give you a new heart. And it is because you are clinging to something else - still bolstering yourself up with some pillow of self-righteousness that you are not converted. We long therefore to see you driven to a state of despair. We long we pray that you may despair of your own righteousness - of your evil heart - your repentance - of your prayers - of the prayers of others - of all the means of religion and in short of everything but the sovereign mercy of God in Jesus Christ. For then and not till then have we least hope of your salvation.

In conclusion of this discourse we would however suggest a caution. Let no one suppose from what has been said that I am discouraging the constant the diligent use of all the means God has put into our hands for attaining salvation such as prayer social and secret - reading the Scriptures - meditation and attendance upon religious worship in the house of God and occasional meetings. Indeed I would urge most earnestly that every such means be improved: and for this obvious reason that God converts men almost in every instance while they are using those means and leaves those to perish who neglect them. Let it be distinctly understood that I am not endeavoring to depreciate the value of means in religion but that I am only warning man not to rely upon these as if they were able to save them. I wish to convince every man that besides the use of means they have something to do - and that is to submit to the righteousness of Christ. Of everything short of this we earnestly urge them to despair.

A single inference and we close.

And this subject teaches us, my audience, the reason why so many who appear to be seeking salvation finally fail of it. It is because they stop short of Christ - it is because they do not despair everything besides his atonement. They may give up many things and submit to a certain degree of humiliation and mortification: but so long as there is one thing remaining except Christ of which they do not despair they are as effectually cut off from heaven as those who never take a single step towards it. I how many are there who are resting in the means of grace! How many who feel that they have done all in their power to attain salvation and that they must wait for conversion! All these are merely self-righteous pleas of a deceitful heart to avoid submitting to Christ. O let such awake and tearing away their self-righteous supports let them fly to the cross of Christ let them cling to this as the shipwrecked sailor clings to the rocks resolving if they must perish to perish there. And yet it must be a new thing in the universe for a despairing sinner to perish with his arms around the cross.

Sermon 76 To the Aged

[Sermon No. 76, "To the Aged," Genesis 47:29, 1821 Oct,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 11]

Genesis 47:29

And the time drew nigh that Israel must die.

[Note comments on his predecessor pp. 5 and 9. Also page 9 he seems to give up on some unregenerate elders.]

There is a solemn pleasure in reading the history of the patriarchs as they approached the close of life. It is interesting to observe when they saw the time of their departure to be at hand with how much composure they set about the work of preparation. No duty in life and in the midst of health was more faithfully and exactly performed than this last duty. They first looked back upon their lives and reviewed the way in which the Lord had led them through this wilderness world and his goodness often drew from them a song of thanksgiving and praise. Then they cast their eyes upon the children and companions around them bestowing on them the blessing of God. And last of all turning their eyes to the heavenly world before them they gazed calmly and steadily upon its unmingled joys until death was swallowed up in victory.

The most striking instances of this kind on record were Moses and Israel more commonly called Jacob. Moses after forty years sojourning in the wilderness having now reached the borders of Canaan and being debarred from entering it himself knew that his end was nigh. He therefore gathered together the Hebrews and rehearsed to them the dealings of God with them and the laws he had given them with the blessings and the curses of disobedience and caused them to renew their covenant with God. After a solemn charge to Joshua his successor he composed a hymn of adoration and praise and then blessed the tribes of Israel. His work on earth being now completed, he went up from the plains of Moab unto the mountain of Nebo to the top of Pisgah that is over against Jericho, and there saw before him the promised land of the heavenly Canaan and there this servant of the Lord perhaps in a trance of wonder at the goodness of God breathed out his last.

Israel after having seen so much of the goodness of God in saving the life of his son Joseph and after having lived with him in Egypt seventeen years perceived that his last sickness had come and the time drew nigh when Israel must die. To Joseph and his sons he related the dealings of God with him in his life and after blessing Ephraim and Manasseh he called unto his own sons and said, Gather yourselves together that I may tell you that which shall befall you in the last days. Then with a prophetic spirit he declared to them the blessings and afflictions that would come upon them and their posterity to the end of time. He predicted too the coming of Christ and with a song absorbed no doubt in his glories he burst the prison of the flesh and ascended to partake of his fullness in heaven.

My venerable gray headed fathers and mothers before me, you will permit me this afternoon to address you. I speak to you only who feel that you have long been descending the vale of life and who realize by your infirmities and weakness that your days on earth are almost at end and that time draweth nigh when you must die. No one in this house indeed knows how near he is to eternity. The young, however, may be many years: but you who are on the verge of three score years and ten or have already passed that limit of human life must know that your remaining days must be few. What better season than the present is there then for you to pause and like Moses and Israel look back upon the scenes of your life that is past and forward upon the scenes that await you! It is my desire to assist you in this interesting contemplation. And let me first invite you to reflect upon some of the scenes you have enjoyed.

And here we may first remark how much reason you have for blessing God for your many temporal mercies. You may have seen many hardships and escaped many dangers - but it is the merciful right hand of God that has delivered you and borne you through them. And you may have seen much of sickness and pain yet what a cause for gratitude have you that God has treated all your sicknesses and so many times saved your life from destruction. While you have seen one friend after another and one neighbor after another drop into eternity in youth or in middle age so that now but few who began life with you are to be found you have been protected from the pestilence that walketh in darkness and the destruction that wasteth as noonday. Though a thousand have fallen at your side and ten thousand at your right hand yet it does not come nigh you.

Another cause you have for gratitude is that, the lines have fallen to you in such pleasant places and that you have had so goodly an heritage. You have not been called to cultivate the dreary and inhospitable regions of the extreme north nor to pine and wither under the parching skies of the south. Nor have you been compelled to wander through the wilderness among the ignorant and barbarous savages. But in this land of hills and vallies the pastures, have been clothed with flocks and the valleys covered over with corn, and rarely has the earth failed to pour forth an abundance of fruits to fill your storehouses and barns and to afford an abundant supply for man and beast. Here too have you possessed those means of instruction in human knowledge so well calculated to soften the native ferocity of man and to multiply his comforts and usefulness and here too have you for many years enjoyed the intercourse of kin and civilized neighbors and friends. O number how many millions of your fellow men are destitute of the ordinary comforts of life and grew up in perfect ignorance and know nothing of friendly intercourse and learn from hence who it is that thus maketh you to differ and how great is the debt of gratitude you owe so kind and beneficent a God.

But still more abundant and great have been your spiritual mercies. How long has been your day of grace! Others have had only a few years in which to prepare for eternity. But you have had more than half a century. What an immense number of prayers to God you have had an opportunity of making - how many precious seasons of communion with God and his Son Jesus Christ and of self-examination and meditation! How many Sabbaths have you been blessed with and how many sermons and exhortations have you heard! It has been your peculiar privilege to enjoy for more than fifty years the uninterrupted ministrations of one whose life has been the best comment upon his doctrines - and who now like yourselves being borne down with age and infirmity feels that the time draws nigh when he must die. You have had no false teachers to delude you from the simplicity there is in Christ nor any peculiar divisions among yourselves to operate as hindrances to your advancement in holiness. Every thing indeed has been favorable to your growth in grace. It has been your happy lot also to witness among this people a number of revivals of religion. You can doubtless remember the time and you can never forget how great was your joy when there was a general enquiry among the unregenerate, what shall we do to be saved? And when many a converted spirit would cry out The arrows of the Almighty are within me the poison whereof drinketh up my spirit. You have seen the day when the aisles of this house were filled with a multitude of rejoicing souls coming forward to confess their Redeemer before men.

And in such a day you could exclaim in the triumphant language of the Psalmist, O sing unto the Lord a new song; for he hath done marvelous things: his right hand and his holy arm have gotten him the victory.

And now my aged fathers and mothers, shall I permit myself to enquire whether it is possible that one of you who have been blessed with so many and so distinguish opportunities for religious improvement have nevertheless remained to this late hour of life destitute of an interest in Christ? O the thought is overwhelming – and rather would I pass by the subject than endeavour to compute the awful account he has to render who has resisted the threatenings and promises of the Gospel three score years and ten. I would rather draw a veil over the final condition of such a man than to follow in imagination a gray headed sinner into the world of perdition and there see how much lower he lies in misery than Tyre and Sidon and how much fiercer the wrath of God burns upon him than upon Sodom and Gomorrah.

I invite you my venerable audience in the next place to look back and contemplate some of the scenes of affliction through which you have passed. I cannot indeed lay before you individual sorrows. The heart knoweth his own bitterness. And some of you may have been called to pass through scenes of distress whose recital would make every heart bleed. Perhaps some of you for months and even years have stood upon the very brink of the grave, full of tossings to and fro from morning to evening and from evening to morning and like Job choosing strangling and death rather than life. Or perhaps you have stood for months or years by the sick bed of your friends and seen one after another leave you at last to enter eternity. It is probable that there is not one of you indeed who has not been called to close the eyes of some dear friend - some wife or husband - brother or sister child or companion. Ah, which of you is there who has not many a time been called to such a trial as this! Which of you that has not buried almost every friend with whom you began life? When you look back upon the days of your childhood and recall to mind the companions of your youth how few of them are there which you have not followed to the grave. The race of men now in the full vigor of life around you are a new generation and you feel as if you were a stranger among them. How wonderful how mysterious the dispensations of providence by which you have been carried through so many changes and by which you have remained unsmitten though the arrows of death have been flying on every side of you and pierced the bosoms of so many of your neighbors and friends!

As you now stand as it were alone and survey the ruins of your generation and remember through how many trials God sustained you are you not astonished at the mercy of God even though you weep at the recollection of your departed friends and shudder at the scenes of deep distress you have been called to witness? For all those bereavements and all those sorrows were designed for your everlasting good. At the time they were not joyous but grievous yet do you not now see the fruit of them? Were they not the means of weaning you from the world of fastening your affections firmer upon God and of awakening you to a greater diligence in the cause of Christ? With David cannot you now exclaim, before I was afflicted I went astray but now have I kept thy word. If you have indeed improved aright your various trials and bereavements it will be for your joy and rejoicing through eternity that you were thus afflicted. But if you have not found these trials sanctified to you O how hard in this must be your hearts!

But ye fathers and mothers however great may have been your afflictions in your past days and however great may be your present infirmities and trials all these are near their end. Those eyes which have been so often dimmed in tears of sorrow will soon be dried up no more to weep. You already feel that world which has so long agitated your feelings to be losing its interest and losing its power to distress you by its disappointments and trials. You have but a few more afflictions to meet - but few more sighs to hear - but few more tears to shed. And your opportunities too for serving and worshipping

God on earth are almost at an end. You have almost done with the public services of God in this house where you have so long assembled to unite with your brethren in praise to God. You will hear but few more sermons and exhortations and when you have offered up a few more prayers your tongues will be silent and your hearts cold in the grave. For your age and infirmities daily remind you that, the time draweth nigh when you must die. Come then ye aged of this assembly and like the patriarch of old look with a steady eye upon that grave which is before you and that untrodden world you are about to enter.

You have no doubt too often contemplated upon death too often realized your mortality to be agitated by the thought of it. Let me then ask you with what feelings you look forward to a dying hour and to a day of judgment? The answer to this enquiry no doubt will greatly depend upon the manner in which you have improved the afflictions and mercies of your long lives. If you have improved these aright that is if they have been the means of giving you a new heart probably you look forward to the solemn scenes before you with composure and it maybe with ardent anticipations. Though it ought not to be forgotten that real Christians when they come to be borne down with the weaknesses and infirmities of old age sometimes find within them many dark and painful doubts to obscure the evening of their days and to render still darker the valley of death. But there are many who find amid all the infirmities of age a calm a settled and a triumphant hope that they shall soon see their Redeemer as he is and be seated at his right hand in heaven. And to such an one it must be a joyful view to look forward into eternity and to realize that in a very few days he shall be there - and all his infirmities will be succeeded by immortal youth and undecaying vigor. Soon will this feebleness and weakness of old age be forgotten and he will become as the angels who excel in strength. Never more will he feel the tear of sorrow stealing down his cheek nor the sigh of sorrow heaving his bosom - but joys unmingled and eternal will flow to him from the throne of God. Fresh and consoling indeed must be such anticipations to the old man who has become weary with the world and who expects no more permanent enjoyment beneath the sun.

And now ye fathers and mothers permit me to put an enquiry to you for the instruction of those of us who are middle aged and young. As you now stand upon the brink of eternity and have done with the bustle of the world how do the scenes and pursuits in which you have been engaged appear to you and what class of actions affords you the most pleasure? Some of you perhaps have labored diligently and for many years for the acquisition of riches - some perhaps in pursuit of honor and some of pleasure - and we would hope many of you have labored for your own and others salvation. And need I wait for an answer to determine how all your eager pursuits after the world now appear like the dreams of a bewildered imagination and with how much delight you recollect every service you have done for God and with how much regret you realize that you have done so little for the cause of Christ.

The world now appears to you comparatively vanity and religion appears to you all in all. O shall not the middle aged shall not we who are young and in eager chase after the world listen to this solemn lesson of experience sent back to us by those who are just entering eternity?

I have said to the aged before me that the time draweth nigh when they must die - I say not this to awaken needless fears - I speak only what they all speak and think almost daily. Yes their failing senses - their trembling limbs - their growing infirmities convince them that, dust they are and unto dust shall they return, and that when a few more days or years are, come they shall go the way of all the earth. Doubtless many of us who are young will be called first - yet we know not how soon - but we do know that you who have already been three score years and ten must ere long resign your spirits into the hands of the God who gave them. Soon must you stand before the tribunal of Christ and give a long account of your blessings and afflictions. Soon will your aged pastor meet you there and thus will the long series of his faithful instructions be held up before you - sermon after sermon - exhortation after exhortation and prayer after prayer and the improvement you have made of the decisions of the judgment day can he alone declare. O that he may find many of your souls in that day shining as jewels in his immortal crown. And can I indulge the thought for a moment that one of you before will not be found at the bar of God in the crown of his rejoicing? O it is too dreadful an idea to dwell upon that a man in a Gospel land should resist for three score years and ten all the promises and threatenings of the bible. And I will not dwell upon it even did I suppose (which God foretold) that there is such an one present. For what impression could my feeble voice make upon a heart which has been hardening for more than half a century in sin and has stood proof against the joys of heaven and the terrors of hell.

I have said to the aged that the time of their departure is at hand. And what seat is there this day vacant among them? O there was one among you the last Sabbath uniting in our worship who now lies lifeless in yonder dwelling and who as we humbly hope is now joining in a purer worship in the temple of God in heaven. He has come to his grave in a full age like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season. Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth; yea saith the Spirit that they may rest from their labors and their works do follow them. What a comment is this providence upon the text and how it enforces with more than mortal emphasis the truths we have been exhibiting!

Thus one of the fathers of our church after another is dropping into eternity: and soon all these venerable pillars in our Zion will be gone. Who then shall stand up for the Lord among this people when the enemy cometh in like a flood? I stretch forth my heart to you ye middle aged and to you ye young and plead with you, to come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty. I appeal to you in the name of this church and entreat you to come forward and fill up the places of your fathers and catch their falling mantles. I appeal to you on behalf of your own souls and by the bitter agonies of your Redeemer beseech you to fly to him for salvation. I appeal to you on behalf of myself. And now that the fathers on whom I leaned are passing into the grave I throw myself into your arms and upon your mercy and beseech you by the solemn responsibilities that lie upon me to come forward to hold up my hands by your prayers and examples lest I grow weary and abandon this part of the walls of Jerusalem to the inroads of the enemy. I call to you in behalf of these your aged fathers and mothers before you and by their grey hairs by their tears and their prayers for you I beseech you to give them before they die the exalted joy of seeing you come forth decidedly in support of that religion they love and which is now their only support. O do not embitter their few remaining days with the agonizing thought that you are out of Christ. This O this is a thought that will plant daggers in their bosoms and bring down the grey hairs with sorrow to the grave. After all their prayers and exertions for you for many years the reflection that you have not hope will fill them with anguish indescribable. To see you corrected is all they wait for in this world. And the fear that after they must leave you unconverted is what fills the thoughts of their hour with distress. And they linger on the shores of time only to catch the news of your salvation that they may bear it to heaven. O what an agonizing scene will it be if after all as they see you come around their dying bed they are compelled to realize that you have no hope and as they stretch out their withered hands to grasp you for the last time how can they pronounce - how can you hear the everlasting farewell!

And now ye aged I turn once more to you. Probably this is the last time we shall all meet together this side of the bar of God. Accept my earnest wishes and prayers that you may find your few remaining days softened by the bright hope of eternal glory and that you may find your Redeemer to comfort and support you amid the trials that are before you. Finally when nature shall yield to the silent ravages of death may you be gently released from your long warfare and conducted by angels to Abraham's bosom.

But while God shall continue to keep alive the lamp of life we do most earnestly beseech your fervent and earnest prayers for Zion in this place. O if your eyes are not yet bedimmed with age turn them around upon this great assembly and see how many there are in this house - how many of your own descendants who profess hope of a happy immortality. My fathers these souls must not perish - they must be wept for - they must be prayed for. And we do look to you with confidence for your continued intercessions in their behalf. It is a day when prayer is heard almost before it is offered - and how would it soften the pillow of a death bed to know that a great multitude of these precious souls around you had fled to a Saviour! Like Simeon of old you would exclaim in the ardor of a triumphant gratitude – Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.

Sermon 78 History of Revivals

[Sermon No. 78, "History of Revivals," John 12:8, 1821 Nov,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 12]

John 12:8

The poor always ye have with you; but me ye have not always.

The occasion that drew from Christ this expression was the anointing of his feet with costly ointment by Mary. The avaricious Judas protested against the waste and declared that this ointment might have, been got for three hundred pence and given to the poor. But this he said, as the evangelist witnesses, not because he cared for the poor but because he was a thief and had the bag and bare what was therein. What an exact picture is this of the niggardly spirit which in every age under the pretense of greater benevolence objects against the bestowment of liberal charities for the promotion of the kingdom of Christ.

But to animadvert on such a topic is not our intention in this discourse. It is the reply of Christ to which we would direct our attention. Then said Jesus let her alone against the day of my burying hath she done this. For the poor always ye have with you but me ye have not always. As much as to say I shall soon leave you: and while I remain think it not a waste if my followers for whom I have done so much should even at some expense pay some peculiar regard. Soon you will see me no more and then you will have time to attend to the poor who are always with you. Such a gentle reproof would have reached the heart of any other man but a Judas.

Though Christ has left the world and is no more visibly present on earth yet is he in reality in the midst of his faithful followers to the end of the world. Then however it may be said that he is not with them always for their lives are short in comparison with eternity and therefore as they have to prepare for eternity during the momentary period it would seem they ought to improve with peculiar diligence the opportunity they have of learning in the school of Christ.

And so with unregenerate men Christ is present by his Spirit but not always. However little they may realize it their day of will soon be past and when once the thread of life is cut the Spirit abandons them forever. There is such a thing too – O sinners be not faithless but believing there is such a thing as a man's day of grace being terminated before his day of life. And when men resist great light it requires but a short period to grieve away the Spirit of Christ forever. There is a peculiar propriety therefore in saying to unregenerate men, The poor ye have always with you but Christ ye have not always.

The text however leads us to consider those seasons when Christ is more peculiarly present with his followers and with all men. For when he told his disciples that they could not have him always with them he referred to his bodily visible presence: for after his resurrection he assured them that he, would be with them always even to the end of the world. That is evidently he would be present with them always by his Spirit that holy Comforter he promised to send down after his ascension. And to this day the followers of Christ have uniformly witnessed that he has been faithful to his promise. Still however the Spirit does not visit the believer or the sinner with an uniform influence but there are some special seasons when he manifests himself more peculiarly both to saints and sinners. And we shall now proceed to point out the most important of those particular times when Christ by his Spirit is more remarkably present with men.

In the first place the followers of Christ often find it a season when he is periodically present with them when they commemorate his dying love or when engaged in secret prayer or meditation. This is agreeable to the experience of almost every Christian. Sometimes I have a view of their depravity at such a time that well nigh overwhelms them. Sometimes they see more forcibly than ever before the odiousness of sin in the sight of God. At other times the glory and perfection of the Divine character are manifested to them in a striking manner. Sometimes Christ appears uncommonly glorious and his character supremely lovely. At one time there is a sweet and delightful calm spread over the soul producing joys unspeakable and full of glory; at another time a remarkable fervency and delight is experienced in prayer. Now most certainly the Christianism ought to look upon these as privileged moments and to even remember that though other duties may be attended to at any time Christ will not be with him always in this peculiar and delightful sense. Therefore would it not be madness for him at such times to neglect to improve them diligently and to break away from such delightful services to enter into the concerns of the world. Who but an avaricious Judas could reprove him for spending more than time than usual in secret prayer private devotions and meditation? (Probably many Christians greatly grieve the Spirit.) How much do Christians often lose by neglecting to improve such precious moments.

The next particular season in which Christ is peculiarly present with men is when they experience great changes in their outward circumstances. Thus upon the death of a near friend or upon the loss of great possessions or upon experiencing some severe disappointment the Christian will find his thoughts powerfully drawn to contemplate the things of eternity and will feel within him an unusual disposition to pray. And at such times he ought sincerely to improve diligently these seasons that they may lead him to growth in grace if he thus apparently interferes with ordinary duties. Because these may be performed afterward but a disposition to pray and meditate upon eternity will soon be gone. Christ will not remain always. And if the Christian refuse to pay him peculiar honors and listen intently to him when he is present especially if he turn away and prefer the wrath, of this world to his instructions, no wonder if the Christian be left to darkness and if it were possible to final apostasy.

Impenitent men also during the season just mentioned are favored with the peculiar presence of Christ. When afflicted or disappointed they too have their thoughts turn more upon religion and feel a disposition to pray. And it is not the part of wisdom at such a period to neglect for a time secular affairs and impose the precious presence of Christ by prayer praying and meditating much upon heaven and hell upon God's law and their sinfulness remembering that Christ is not with them always and that if they neglect him with who he favored them with his special presence they may plead in vain for his return when the day of their calamity shall come.

The third season in which Christ is peculiarly present with man is when he pours out the Holy Spirit upon particular regions and awakens convicts and converts sinners and arouses Christians. This is usually called a revival of religion. We have passed over the two preceding heads of the discourse more rapidly than we might have more time for attending to this. And we shall first give a general history of revivals – then secondly consider their effects and thirdly their direction.

The history of the most powerful and extensive revivals of religion that ever happened is contained in the Old and New Testaments. We pass by those that occurred among the Jews while in the wilderness and also those happening during the reigns of David and Solomon especially when the latter dedicated the temple. In the reign of Asa religion was at its lowest ebb so that for a long season, as the historian says, Israel was without the true God and without a teaching priesthood without law. But when the prophet Isaiah faithfully warned Asa of their awful state, the king gathered together all Judah and Benjamin and the strangers with them. And they entered into a covenant to seek the Lord God of their fathers with all their heart and with all their soul. That whosoever would not seek the Lord God of Israel should be put to death whether small or great whether man or woman. And they swear unto the Lord with a loud roar and with shouting - and with trumpets and with cornets. And all Judah rejoices at the oath for they had sworn with all their heart and sought him with their whole desire and he was found of them and the Lord gave them rest round about.

Before many years however the Jews relapsed into their former state of stupidity and idolatry and the rising generations were ignorant of God. But in the reign of Jehoshaphat the successor of Asa another powerful outpouring of the Spirit was experienced. Jehoshaphat destroyed the remnants of idolatry and sent princes and Levites to teach the people in the cities. And they taught in Judah and had the book of the law of the Lord with them and went about throughout all the cities of Judah and taught the people. And the fear of the Lord fell upon all the kingdoms of the lands that were around Judah so that they made now war against Jehoshaphat. How powerful must have been this work of the Holy Spirit which could strike an awe into other nations and they to Pagans! Yet even in this day we often see something of the same effect from a revival in restraining the wicked round about.

There were also revivals in the reigns of Jehoash and Uzziah – and a very remarkable and thorough one in the reign of Hezekiah. This prince seeing the desolation of God's sanctuary calls upon the priests and, they went into the inner part of the house of the Lord to cleanse it and brought out all the uncleanness that they found in the temple of the Lord into the court of the house of the Lord. And the Levites took it to carry it abroad into the brook Kidron. Next they set about preparing the people by prayer and sacrifices for keeping a solemn passover. And Hezekiah rejoiced and all the people that God had prepared the people for the thing was done suddenly. After this the passover was kept solemnly seven days, offering peace offerings and confessions to the Lord God of their Fathers. Yet so sensible were they of their sins and backslidings that, the whole assembly took counsel to keep other seven days and they kept other seven days with gladness then the priests and Levites arose and blessed the people and their voice was heard and their prayers came up to his holy dwelling place even up to heaven. O my brethren had we been as faithful as these Jews in keeping the passover other seven days ere this our voice would have been heard and our prayer have come up to God's holy dwelling place even unto heaven. And as the passover was succeeded by the destruction of idolatry throughout the land and the overthrow of all their enemies so would our prayers be followed by the conversions of multitudes, who now serve and worship the creature more than the Creator.

The Jews during this long captivity in Babylon had become stupid and insensible to true religion. On their return a powerful revival commenced among them through the instrumentality of Nehemiah and Ezra. When Nehemiah after he wept and mourned in public and prayed certain prayers came to Jerusalem to rebuild its walls he found powerful enemies to the undertaking - And they laughed as to scorn, says Nehemiah, and despised us and said what is this thing that you do? Will ye rebel against the king? Then answered I and said unto them the God of heaven he will prosper as therefore we his servants will arise and build; but you have no portion nor right nor memorial in Jerusalem. And the God of heaven did prosper them for they proceeded prayerfully feeling then entire dependance on him. And when the wall was completed were assembled and for seven days Ezra continued to read the law of God to them. On the eighth day was a solemn assembly and the people were assembled with fasting and with sackclothes and earth upon them and they stood up in their place and read in the book of the law of the Lord their God one fourth part of the day and another fourth part of the day they confessed and worship the Lord their God. After this humiliation the people and priests entered into a solemn covenant with God and then they proceeded to put away their strange wives and to reform their conduct on the Sabbath - so that probably few revivals of religion have produced effects so powerful and permanent.

We pass next to the N. Testament. And the earliest special outpouring of the Spirit there recorded was during the ministry of John the Baptist. He baptized in the wilderness and preached the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins. And though it must have been very unpalatable to that race whom John himself called a generation of vipers to be called upon to repent and to bring forth works meet for repentance yet for some reason or other the evangelist says that there went out to him all the land of Judea and they of Jerusalem and were all baptized of him in the river Jordan confessing their sins. It must have been the special influence of Gods Spirit that could have brought so many to adopt a course so unwelcome to their feelings and to confess their sins to one so plain and unsparing as John.

The book of Acts contains the history of a series of the most interesting and wonderful revivals ever witnessed. You all remember the day of Pentecost - how those very Jews who only fifty days before had crucified Christ now listened to his despised disciples proving that he was the very Christ and how when Peter without equivocation charged them with the murder of Christ they were pricked in their hearts and cried out, Men and brethren what shall we do? What a wonderful change did that single sermon of Peter produced upon these hardhearted obstinate Jews. O it was the Spirit of God sent home his word like so many barbed arrows - causing a wound which none but the great Physician of souls could heal. And 3000 of them submitted to God that very day and received new hearts.

Soon after this astonishing outpouring of the Spirit Peter again address the unbelieving multitude in a part of the temple and by the same argument he brought a still greater multitude to submit even five thousand. Such powerful works of grace as these aroused the malice of those who hated the cause of Christ and though the chief priest and rulers reprovved them and threatened them and finally thrust them into prison yet still the works went on and the cause of Christ prospered and numbers were daily added to the church of such as should be saved. The persecution however at length became so violent that the disciples were scattered abroad into various regions and thereupon their preaching the doctrine of the cross extensive revivals succeeded. There was one in Phoenicia another in Cyprus and a third more extensive in Antioch. Soon after also in that city and in the neighboring region a second outpouring of the Spirit attended the preaching of Paul and Barnabas an historian says, as many as were ordained to eternal life believed. After this another gracious influence of the Spirit was manifested when Paul preached Christ in Thessalonica: and as usual a violent opposition succeeded although some of the Jews believed, of the devout Greeks a great multitude and of the chief women not a few. At Bena also a work of grace went on for a time without opposition until the opposers in Thessalonica came hither and stirred up the people - although not a few says the historian believed. Paul preached liver likewise a single sermon at Athens which was carried home to the consciences of some who believed and came unto him. After this under the bold ministrations of this same Apostle an extensive and long continuing revival took place in Corinth. At Ephesus too the labors of Paul were abundantly blessed in the midst of much opposition, so that the word of God grew mightily and prevailed. In Greece, Macedonia and Asia Minor the works of God went on under the faithful preaching of Paul. But we have not time to be more particular.

But revivals of religion did not terminate with the days of the apostles. The church has had since that time many a period of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. By means of these the Gospel was rapidly spread into almost every part of the earth: and though in later days there was a great and almost universal declension of religion yet in the 16th century the Spirit of God gave remarkable efficacy to the preaching of many of the reformers not only in Germany but in France Sudetenland, Holland Denmark the Low Countries and in Great Britain. A very extraordinary work of grace took place in the west part of Scotland in the year 1625. In 1630 during the communion season in a small town in Scotland (Shotts) the wonders of the day of Pentecost seemed to have returned and nearly 500 are said to have been awakened most of whom gave good evidence in their subsequent lives that they were born of God. In 1838 Scotland was again remarkably visited with the special presence of God. In 1628 in the north part of Ireland a revival occurred which is described as, one of the largest manifestations of the Spirit one of the most solemn times of the outpouring thereof since the days of the Apostles. And during the ravages of the plague in London in 1665 a powerful work was carried on by which thousands were hopefully converted.

Ever since his first settlement of this country there has been a succession of revivals in it. God in former days remarkably blessed the preaching of such men as Whitfield, Prince, Stoddard, Edwards, Tennent, and Brainard. Between the years 1720 and 1740 this part of N. England and Connecticut experienced a remarkable refreshing from the presence of the Lord as the following excerpt from the writings of President Edwards will show - I hope, says he, that more than three hundred souls were savingly brought home to Christ in this town (Northampton) in the space of half a year. In the month of March new people in South Hadley began to be received with a deep concern about the things of religion which soon became very universal. About the same time it began to break forth in the west part of Suffield where it has also been very great. It next appeared at Sunderland and soon overspread the town and I believe was for a season no not less remarkable than it was here. About the same time it began to appear in the part of Deerfield called Green River and afterwards filled the town and there has been a glorious works there. It also began to be manifest in the south part of Hatfield and the works of God has been great there. There has been also a very general awakening at West Springfield and Longmeadow. And in Enfield there has been no small concern amongst some that before had been very loose persons. Something of this works likewise appeared in the first precinct in Springfield. And in Hadley old town there gradually appeared so much of the work of God on souls as at another time would have been thought worthy of particular notice. For a short time it was also a very great and general concern of the like nature at Northfield.

Soon after this extensive revival so much interest was felt in the subject that a weekly paper was published in Boston wholly devoted to the history of revivals. Since that time during the 50 years that have elapsed numerous other powerful works of grace have been observed in this county which we have not time to mention. But probably no period of our history was ever so much distinguished by the extraordinary influences of the Spirit as the present (than the year 1820). During that particular year more than 7000 have been added to the communion of the Presbyterian Church in this country - most of whom were the fruits of revivals. In the single state of Connecticut not less than (50 towns have been visited and not less than) 5000 have hopefully passed from death unto life and in the state of Vermont not less than 2000.

[Here there is one paragraph that has been crossed out in pencil]

This is a brief history of the special outpourings of the Spirit of God in all ages of the church. And these statements have occupied so much time that the remainder of the subject must be deferred till the after part of the day. We cannot close the discourse however without making one inference which forces itself upon the mind when contemplating candidly the preceding statements. And we learn from this subject my hearers that there is a general resemblance between the revivals of religion in every age of the church.

They have been alike in the manner of their commencement. God has first stirred up one or more of his servants to attempt by prayer and fasting and exhortation a reformation of abuses and to bring men to submit to the truth. The flame has communicated from one heart to another until most or all the children of God were united in the great work.

Again revivals have been alike in their direction and efforts. Their duration has only been short and their effect has been to advance Christians in holiness - to detect hypocrites - to bring sinners into the kingdom of God and to awaken the opposition and harden the hearts of the impenitent who are not subdued. There may indeed have been much of enthusiasm and delusion during some revivals: for the special influences of the Spirit may be abused as well as the mercies. Yet never we believe have such seasons passed without awakening some Christians or detecting some hypocrites or converting some sinners. And this uniformity of effect in all revivals shows the work to have revealed the same origin and that Divine and thus to be of God. And while such are the effects who that loves Zion will not rejoice in it and shout grace grace unto it?

[The last few pages seem to be an addendum, possibly added at a later time]

The subject suggests many important reflections especially as regards revivals of religion. But can mention only a few.

In the first place the history of revivals proves their identity of origin and nature in all ages

(see last page of sermon number 78)

In the second place the short continuance of most revivals is a feature of fearful interest.

This is referred to in the text, The poor ye have always with you: but me ye have not always. And so have men found in every age. In all the revivals mentioned in the Old Testament the religious interest soon began to decline and iniquity seemed to be gaining ground although in reality, religion had made an advance upon wickedness. On the day of Pentecost the most powerful part of the work to communicate in the space of a few hours and though for some days afterwards there was frequent instances of conversion yet nothing like the abundant shower of the first days was witnessed subsequently. And in several of the succeeding revivals in Thessalonica Lystia and other places a few hours must have ended the work since the apostles were driven away once and the preaching of Christ strictly prohibited. All therefore who did not submit in those few hours were left in their sins and probably most of them never heard the Gospel again. In later times than that persecution has caused revivals of somewhat longer continuance: and yet they are usually felt in the greatest power only a few weeks or months and rarely continue for years. Many charge their brevity to the unfaithfulness of Christians and doubtless in some cases justly. But wherever the fault lie or whether in all cases that be any the fact is acknowledged by all that these seasons are brief. And it is a fearful fact. Some indeed regard this fact as evidence against revivals considered as a work of God: for they cannot believe that he would suspend the salvation of man upon a few days of excitement. But they might object with equal reason against the brevity of man's whole probation which in many instances is really only a few weeks or months. And as to entertainment certainly men are more apt to attend to religion when others do and are continually talking about it than when they hear nothing save the services of the Sabbath and the dead life of worldliness is not muffled by religion during the week. Besides if revivals be a most powerful means of grace as they certainly are should we not expect that God would make such opportunities brief: for a week spent in the midst of such a work is equivalent as a trial of character to years of the ordinary means of grace: and therefore it is unnecessary to continue these special and powerful means for a long period. If a man resist them even for a few days he would certainly resist ordinary means for years and therefore his character is as much doomed in one case as the other. This neglect of the special means used during a revival will assess as effectively shut his mouth in the final judgment as his neglect of ordinary means for many years.

I am led by these remarks to notice the fearfully rapid development of character during a revival. If this development affected only temporal interests we could regard it almost without emotion. But it takes hold on eternity. And while we cannot but rejoice to see some beginning that new race that will give them the final everlasting victory over sin and sorrow how distressing to see others as the work is drawing to a close gradually losing their interest in the subject and settling back into the iron slumber of impenitence and unregeneracy. They may not be conscious themselves of the rapid change their moral feelings are undergoing but the experienced Christian sees it and it fills him with intense anxiety especially when he sees evidence that the Divine Spirit is silently withdrawing his influence.

In vain does he labor openly to persuade them to come at once to the great decision and to receive the offered boon at the eleventh hour. But alas he usually labors against obstacles nearly invincible: and with finding it vain to labor anymore for their conversion he takes refuge in the sovereign will of God and exclaims to Father for so it seemeth good in thy sight. He feels certain that God will be glorified though Israel be not gathered in yet it is one of the hardest lessons of submission the Christian ever learns to be willing that God should be glorified in the everlasting destruction of those whom he loves.

Sermon 79 Effects of Revivals

[Sermon No. 79, "Effects of Revivals," John 12:8, 1821 Nov,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 12]

John 12:8

The poor always ye have with you; but me ye have not always.

An attempt was made in the former part of the day as you recollect to point out in considering this text those seasons in life when Christ is peculiarly present. First of these seasons is at the communion table - the second when men experience great changes in their outward circumstances and the third is during a revival of religion. We passed rapidly over the first two divisions of the subject in order to find room for a more particular consideration of the third. The proposal was first to give a general history of revivals which we have already executed. The second subdivision proposed to consider the effects of revivals and the third their duration.

It is impossible for any man of whatever sentimental sentiments feelings or habits to witness an outpouring of God's Spirit without having an effect produced upon his mind. Whether he be a real Christian or one resting in a false hope or an unregenerate man he cannot escape the influence of revival if he be a Christian it may indeed be said that he experiences a refreshing in his own bosom. He is led at first to examine his own heart and he is astonished to find in what a state of stupidity he has lived and how far he has backslidden from God. This discovers to him more forcibly than ever the dreadful depravity of his heart and so deep does his corruption appear that he is led seriously and oftentimes most painfully to doubt whether there can be any love to God in his bosom. This ingratitude rises before him in such a tremendous aspect that the spark of holiness within him is dead and often for work weeks and months he is under deep convictions for sin before he obtains relief. And his exercises are sometimes as distressing as at his first conversion. And though after a time he usually obtain some relief yet the effect of such a view as this is to keep him extremely humble before God and make him to feel as did Paul when he said, God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of Christ.

Another effect of a work of divine grace upon the Christian is an earnest desire for the conversion of sinners. He has now a more distinct and vivid impression of their alarming situation. He views them to be as they really are suspended (by the brittle thread of life) over a lake of eternal fire - and yet they remain careless and thoughtless in this state of perpetual jeopardy. The Christian feels as if he must take some measures to arouse them to a sense of their danger. He feels as if they must not perish while it is so easy to escape. And when he finds them to resist every warning and entreaty his anxiety and distress for them are increased. For this resistance shows such an awful state of insensibility and stubbornness as awakens all his compassion and sympathy. He had believed all along it is true that impenitent sinners were exposed to everlasting burnings: but now he realizes this and actually sees them in imagination amid the agonies of that awful world.

A necessary effect of such anxiety for impenitent sinners is a spirit of earnest fervent prayer for them. The real Christian knows that they can never be rescued from a state so dreadful but by the arm of Almighty God. Therefore does he make supplication for them and with strong crying and tears unto him that is able save. He had before prayed for the unregenerate in his family and in public but there were formal prayers made in so languid unfeeling a manner that every one who heard them see that he was not in good earnest for sinners. But now when under the influence of a revival you will perceive in the Christians prayers for them and increased earnestness - a certain agonizing spirit which may be called wrestling. And were you permitted to look into his closet you would see still more of this fervency and this prayerful agony.

Such an earnest desire for the salvation immortal souls as we have described as the fruit of a revival will not terminate in ardent prayers merely. It will extend to the conversation. A man who feels deeply a subject will converse upon it with such an air of earnestness as manifests that his whole soul is engaged in it. Unless circumstances forbid we we always converse upon that which is uppermost in our minds most deeply interests us. If then we feel an ardent desire for the salvation of immortal souls we shall not fail on every proper occasion to introduce the subject to them and affectionately endeavor to win them to Christ. And especially when Christians meet one another their conversation will be chiefly upon the subject of religion if they feel their own stupidity and the value of souls around them. They will confess their faults one to another, and feel desirous to be searched by one another. If thus during a time of revival of religion you meet a professed Christian and during one or two hours (a long) conversation he says nothing or very little on that particular subject you may safely conclude that he does not feel interested in the works. President Edwards in his account of the revival in this part of the country eighty years ago says - All other talks but about spiritual and eternal things was soon thrown by; all the conversation in all companies and upon all occasions was upon these things, only unless so much as was necessary for people carrying on their ordinary secular business. Other discourse then of the things of religion would scarcely be tolerated in any company. Alas! my hearers how much the reverse of this description is the case with most of us at this time in this place! And it is this more than anything else that convinces me that this church are not just yet prepared for an extensive revival of religion.

Another effect produced upon the Christian by a revival of religion is to render more interesting and precious his communion seasons. This is a necessary effort of that state of feeling we have already described. Never does the believer come in a more acceptable manner to celebrate in the eucharist the dying love of Christ than when he feels his great unworthiness and has a deep sense of his vileness and feels a brokenness of heart and spirit. And the effect of a revival is to produce such a state of healing. This prepares the heart for realizing the astonishing love of Christ in dying for such vile and grateful beings as men - and the absolute need of his soul of the justification of Christ's blood and Spirit. To this precious fountain he flies while the symbols of his Redeemer's death are before him - and most earnestly prays that he may have that precious blood applied to cleanse his conscience. Then too with an unconquerable resolution does he renew his covenant and determine by the grace of God assisting him to commence a new course of life and no longer to crucify the Redeemer afresh and to wound him in the house of his friends. Thus does he gather new strength to go forth to fight the battles of the Lord and to trample under his feet the enemies of his soul.

It may be too that during such a communion season which he commenced with great brokenness of heart that the believer may have such a vivid impression thrown in upon his soul of the glory of the divine character such a deep sense of the love of Christ - such an unwavering trust in God as will fill him with peace and joy and seem a foretaste of the marriage supper of the Lamb in the New Jerusalem above. And if at such a moment his thoughts are turned upon the many of his friends and acquaintances who live without God and without hope O what an earnest desire does it create within him for their salvation and how fervently does he offer up the secret ejaculation that God would have mercy upon them.

And now my brethren of this church we are about to approach the table of Christ this afternoon under the circumstances above mentioned. For however stupid we may have been still God has been processing out his Spirit in this place in a special manner. And now perhaps we can determine the state of our feelings in regard to this revival by the exercises of our minds this afternoon. If we come to the table as insensible as we have done at many past communions - what shall I say? Shall I say that we have no reason to consider ourselves Christians? I will only say that this will be an evidence that God is about forsaking this work and about leaving sinners in this place to final impenitence.

Another effect of a revival on professors of religion which I have room just to mention is a revival of their discipline. In times of stupidity individual members who do not live agreeably to the Gospel are suffered to go on undisturbed. But when the Spirit of God comes to search the heart Christians are led to enquire whether the time is not come when judgment must begin at the house of God, and whether it be not their duty as Paul commands the Corinthians, not to keep company if any man that is called a brother be a fornication fornicator or covetous or an idolater - or railer or a drunkard or an extortioner: with such an one no not to eat.

The second class of persons on whom a revival of religion often has an effect is the self-deceived professor. We do not include those who have made an hypocritical profession that is those who professed to him religion when they knew they had it not: for such persons are generally given over to such hardness of heart and blindness of mind that nothing will arouse them but the shout of the archangel and the trump of God. We mean those who though sincere in their professions of religion were deluded. And the obvious reason why they are often undelivered during a revival is that the Spirit of God stirs up men at the time to deeper heart searchings than they have before attained. And it is not an uncommon thing for such persons at such a time really to experience a saving change of heart. What a mercy is it in God to awaken and convert them to often they have so long eaten and drunk unworthily at his table not discerning the Lords body!

The third and largest class of men on whom a revival produces some sort of effect are the impenitent. These effects however are very different on different persons. But even the most determined infidel will feel something when a powerful work of Grace is going on around him. It will at least make him uneasy - to see many of his former companions his side and embracing that religion he believes to be a delusion. And it will not be pleasant to him to witness a solemnity and an anxiety on the subject among those he daily meets.

On such persons however and on many others a work of divine grace often produces more powerful effect. It stirs them up to a most resolute and bitter opposition. Amongst the numerous revivals mentioned in the old and new testaments we do not recollect but few where this was not the case. You will recollect Sanballat, Tobiah, Geshem and many others opposed Nehemiah and how they laughed him to scorn and despised him - and what stratagems they laid to decoy him from the work of rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem which if it should be effected they will know would prepare the way for a reformation in religion and morals as it in fact did through the protection of God. You remember also that on the day of Pentecost while some were in doubt, others mocking said, these men are full of new wine. At the second revival in Jerusalem although five thousand were converted yet opposition rose to such a height that the Chief Priests Captains of the temple and Sadducees laid hands on the apostles and put them in prison. And at length after having stoned Stephen for his faithful preaching they persecuted the other believers so violently that they were compelled to flee for their lives. Violent opposition and persecution were produced by the revivals in Lystra, Thessalonica and Ephesus. At Berea indeed for a time men instead of opposing the works, searched the scriptures to know whether these things were so; but in the end they were roused to opposition.

Exactly the same Spirit that manifested itself in the days of the apostles has attended almost every outpouring of the Spirit since that time especially if the work were powerful. We have not time to particularize: but will just quote an extract from President Edwards' account of the revival in this vicinity 60 years ago - When this work first appeared says he and was so extraordinarily carried on amongst us in the winter others round about us deemed not to know what to make of it and there were many that scoffed and ridiculed it; and some compared what we called conversion to certain distempers.

And here we may remark that often the man who is most violent in opposing such work is himself soon to become a subject of it. Nay that very opposition arises from an effort to lull asleep the voice of conscience and to quench the stirrings of the Spirit. Never was man more bitter against a revival than Paul. He was exceedingly mad against those whose preaching was the means of it. But when he went to Damascus a voice from heaven showed him what he never before suspected that he was persecuting Christ and that he was fighting against God - though he vented his fury against man. Suffice it to say he was subdued by this discovery and returned from Damascus as zealous for Christ as he had before been opposed to him. And so has it happened to thousands equally bitter against the truth.

From the general fact that revivals of religion usually stir up a deep rooted opposition among many of the impenitent we can see the reason why such a work sometimes is succeeded by the dismissal of faithful ministers and a prostration of all the ordinary means of grace. The fact thus far in the world has ever been that a majority in every place have remained unconverted during a revival. Even in Jerusalem though thousands were regenerated in a day this was the case and this remaining majority are doubtless in all instances rendered if not opposers yet more insensible to the subject of religion and unless God restrain them they will certainly take means to prevent any future revivals by destroying religious institutions. Let those who object to revivals from a fear of such consequences remember that worse effects than these attended every outpouring of the Spirit in the days of the Apostles. And yet when these holy men were driven from one place they immediately set about promoting the same works of grace in another. Let this fact also serve as a lesson to us who are in the ministry if through fear of being driven from our places we are disposed to relax our exertions for promoting promoting a revival.

But we proceed briefly to notice some other the effects of the work of grace upon impenitent men. For thank God the great majority of such at the present day are disposed to favor instead of opposing such a work and they even have a desire to be sharing in it - a mark of preparation by no means unfavorable. Such at the commencement of a revival find upon their minds more than usual solemnity. They feel more the vanity of the world - are disposed to enquire more concerning the way of salvation - are more frequent in their attendance upon the means of grace. They break off partially or wholly from any known habits of sin. They begin more earnestly to read the Scriptures and oftentimes commence a habit of secret prayer. Beyond this point however multitudes never go - and when the revival is gone they return with hardened hearts to their former sins and their former neglect of God.

But some of these have a still more powerful influence exerted upon them at such a season. They are brought to have a most alarming view of their danger and to have such an anxiety for their souls that they cannot conceal it but are lead to cry out, what shall we do to be saved? Beyond this point however many do not proceed; and after remaining a few months in an anxious state, the special influences of the Spirit are withdrawn and they return to their former wallowing in the mire of this world.

Yet some proceed during a revival still farther. They not only are convicted for sin and are distressed for it but actually believe themselves to have put their trust in the Saviour and for a time they go on their way rejoicing: but these are they that have not root in themselves but endure for a while: for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word by and by they are offended.

There are always some however during a real revival of religion proceed still farther than this. They do really submit to the righteousness of Christ and receive new hearts and bring forth fruit some thirty some sixty and some an hundred fold. And if but a single soul is really converted during a revival it is worth all the exertions and all the prayers that can be made. What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?

But we hasten in the last place to consider the duration of the revival of religion. And we may safely assert that it is uniformly short. The poor ye have always with you but Christ - ye have not always. All the revivals mentioned in Scripture and these as we have already seen are many, were of short continuance. In all the cases mentioned in the Old Testament we find that religion soon began to decline and iniquity and idolatry to prevail. On the day of Pentecost the most powerful part of the work terminated in the space of a few hours - and though there were daily some new instances of conversion yet there was nothing like the abundant shower of the first day witnessed afterwards. And in several of the succeeding outpourings of the Spirit that took place in Thessalonica Lythra etc. a few hours must have ended the works because the apostles were driven from those places in the preaching of Christ's cross prohibited. All therefore who did not submit in a few hours were left to harden their hearts. What a mercy is it that in these latter days revivals often continue several months and in some rare instances over a year! Yet it is usually the case that the influence of the Spirit appears to operate most extensively only a few weeks and then to most impenitent men it is said, he that is unjust let him be unjust still and he that is filthy let him be filthy still.

And my hearers we think that we can in part discover the reason why the special impulses of God's Spirit are continued no longer. For if God grant to individuals in a particular place more powerful motives for embracing religion and operate more deeply upon their hearts than he does upon others it would seem to be but justice but that more powerful influence should be exerted only for a shorter period and if men continue to resist this more powerful influence only during this short period they do in fact resist as much as others who are favored only with ordinary influences during their whole lives. And if this be true how rapidly my hearers does it show impenitent men to harden in sin during a revival. They resist so much greater light - and so much more powerful admonitions of the Spirit - that unless their hearts yield they are becoming rapidly more opposed to religion and God and more ripe for destruction.

And does not the subject my hearers show that it is important and right that when Christ is especially present in any place by his Spirit that people both Christians and sinners should pay some special attention to his presence? When Christ honored Mary with a visit she anointed his feet with precious ointment as a token of her peculiar attachment. And shall his disciples at the present day manifest by no extraordinary efforts of joy at the gracious visit of their Master with whom they hope to spend eternity? Shall they not even intercede more earnestly with him that he would heal the spiritually rich among them? Shall they refuse to spend a few extra hours each week in prayer secret and public? Should a friend who was an equal pay them a visit they would not suffer every little trifling worldly concern to prevent their paying him some peculiar respect. And can they will they refuse specially to honor the visit of the Lord of glory?

And ought not be the impenitent too to improve assiduously the presence of Christ among them when he comes to seek and to save that which was lost? When the blind beggar Bartimaeus heard that Jesus of Nazareth was passing by he began, to cry out and say Jesus thou the son of David have mercy on me. And many charged him that he should hold his peace; but he cried the more a great deal. Thou Son of David have mercy on me.

So if impenitent men appear to be anxious during a revival and to devote much time to reading prayer and attendance upon the means of grace many are ready to cry out that they are neglecting their business and minding their estates. But Bartimaeus knew that if Christ was once beyond the reach of his voice he never should recover his sight and therefore he persisted to cry aloud to him and thus obtain relief. So while Christ is passing by during a revival unregenerate men ought to remember that that is the favorable moment and that if they neglect this opportunity Christ may never pass by them again. And what if it should be the means of their losing some good bargains. Is it not better to lose this than their souls?

My hearers we well know that Christ has been specially present with us in this institution for weeks and what lesson does the history of revivals teach us? Why if any Christian wishes his soul awakened and purified and if any sinner desires to be converted he must make the application to the Redeemer without delay. You may not believe this now: and may vainly fancy that tomorrow will be as today and much more abundant. But I know that the terrific conviction of its truth will hereafter feast upon your lost and despairing souls either in this world or the next when as you utter the agonizing cry of Bartimaeus - Jesus the Son of David have mercy on me. No voice of mercy answers your call - no mercy seat will be seen sprinkled with atoning blood - but the high and awful throne of justice will slam in its place bearing on its pillars the inscription, the door is shut.

[One additional page is attached; this may be the section that was covered by the previous page]

...that the time of his departure is at hand. And now is there one who has any request to make before he shall go away? Is there no one who has an immortal soul to save? This then is the moment for crying with the blind Bartimaeus, Jesus the Son of David have mercy on me. Soon will he be beyond the reach of your voice. The world all always ye have with you but Christ – ye have not always.

And must it be Christian brethren that our Divine Master who is now so specially present with this people will soon leave us? Must we be left to go back to the world and to crucify this Redeemer afresh - and must so many of the dear mortal souls in this place be left to perish? O we may rest assured that unless something be speedily done by this church, unless something be speedily done - unless something powerful be done it is vain it is presumptuous to expect the continuance much less the spread of the present revival of religion among us. The truth is and it is a melancholy truth that this church as a church is not yet half awake. And it is a most astonishing and of mercy in God to convert so many souls while we remain in such a stupid condition. Is it not then a proper time brethren for shaking off our slumbers around the table of Christ this afternoon. Let none of us partake of that supper unless we are resolved from this day to commence a new course - O I feel as if it depended upon the [????] of your partaking of this supper at this time whether this revival is to continue or terminate and whether the souls around us now out of Christ shall finally go to heaven or to hell.

Sermon 82 Entire Moral Depravity

[Sermon No. 82, "Entire Moral Depravity," Ecclesiastes 9:3, 1821 Nov,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 12]

Ecclesiastes 9:3

The heart of the sons of men is full of evil and madness is in their heart while they live and after that they go to the dead.

Many pious men have used such strong expressions in describing the depravity of the human heart that others have regarded them as extravagant and untrue. Yes here is a description by the wisest man that ever lived and he too under the imprisonment of God which represents man by nature in a state so desperately wicked (it amounts to a kind of madness) that few writers have described him in a worse condition. And had it not been written by Solomon and dictated by God perhaps many of us might be disposed to set it aside as exaggerated and untrue. How sweeping and indiscriminate is the charge he makes upon us! The heart of the sons of men, says he that is most definitely the hearts of all men not of a few abandoned ones, is full of evil. And if it be full of wickedness where is there room for goodness? But however severe and uncharitable this assertion may seem to the merely amiable and moral man yet Solomon proceeds with an additional remark still more cutting and humbling, and madness, says he, is in their heart while they live. The original word translated madness is plural and might read thus, and madnesses are in the hearts while they live, that is one mad thought or feeling follows another while they live. Solomon here doubtless speaks of the heart of man when it is unchecked in its natural native tendencies: for in the preceding verse he had been speaking of the righteous and the wicked; the clean and the unclean. If then there were no exceptions, if madness was in the heart of all men during all their lives, there could be none clean or righteous. And yet the expression, the heart of the sons of men, evidently includes all men. So that there is no way of reconciling the text with the preceding verse, except to suppose that the writer meant to say that the hearts of all men, if left to themselves are full of evil and madness while they live. And although the grace of God renders some comparatively righteous and clean, yet these are exceptions and they are made such contrary to the natural tendency of the heart: and therefore it was not necessary to name these exceptions in stating a fact concerning human nature which until the Spirit of God operates upon it is universally true. A like mode of expression very common in the Old Testament, the heart is deceptive above all things and desperately wicked, says Jeremiah - that is evidently - such is the state of the unregenerate heart. The Lord, says David, looked down from heaven upon the children of men to see if there were any that did understand and seek God. They are all gone aside, they are all together become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no not one. Here the phrase children of men most certainly includes all men under heaven - and yet in the same Psalm there is mention made of the generation of the righteous. So that it is evident the Psalmist here speaks of men as they are before conversion - that is while they are under the influence of their corrupt native inclination. And in that sense is it true that God could not find among all men under heaven one that, did good no not one.

To say, that the heart of the sons of men is full of evil and that madness is in their heart while they live is to deduce essentially the same thing although the latter expression is a stronger and bolder declaration of man's corruption than the former. It implies that the state of the unrenewed heart is such as amounts to a kind of derangement. Yet we shall endeavor to show that this expression is by no means extravagant or untrue. We shall attempt to prove that madness is in the heart of unregenerate men while they live.

Yet Solomon could not mean by this term that kind of insanity which is usually denominated madness among men. He could not mean that state of mind which led the man whose name was legion in the time of Christ to dwell in the, mountains and in the tombs crying and and cutting himself with stones, and which makes it necessary to confine men lest they destroy themselves or others; and which preventeth them from having correct ideas of the most common worldly concerns; and renders them mere nuisances in society. But there is no impropriety in denominating that man mad, or deranged, who uniformly acts contrary to right reason; even if it be in regard to a practical object, say in regard to eternity - although in regard to everything else, he is reasonable and self possessed. Such cases are not infrequent, where men follow the dictates of reason in regard to everything except one. And it was this state of mind no doubt, which Solomon not improperly denominates madness.

And here I am reminded of a passage in the history of a person who was really mad or deranged in the common sense of the term and was confined among other lunatics in an asylum for the insane. This person had some lucid intervals and during one of these he expressed himself to a visitor to this effect. A certain member of us said he are confined in this place because we are deranged. But the fact is the world in general are deranged some in one way and some in another. And now because our madness differs from theirs and we are few in number we are shut up in this place and said to be deranged: while they denominate themselves rational. But were we to become so numerous as to form a majority we should be called the rational party and they the insane.

Now my hearers although there be much that is extravagant in these ideas yet the assertion of this lunatic that there is a degree of madness or derangement adhering to most of us in regard to some particular things is too true. And when an inspired man declares that madness is in the hearts of the sons of men while they live let us not be too hasty in calling this an extravagant expression. Let us not endeavour by any forced interpretation to fritter away the force of the passage. Let us see if we cannot find evidence that there is something in the conduct and feelings of every unregenerate man in regard to his eternal welfare that may well be denominated madness.

And now perhaps my hearers you expect that we are about to bring forward from the bible those texts which exhibit the depravity of the human heart in the strongest light - or that we shall gather from the history of mankind the bloodiest and most savage deeds then recorded. Overpowering evidence might indeed be produced from these sources to the melancholy truth in the text. But we pass term both by at this time and shall confine our remarks to a part which none will dispute viz. - that there are thousands in Christian lands who live in the neglect of religion and who make no preparation for the judgment day. In other words every unregenerate man neglects to submit to the terms of salvation proposed in the Gospel. And now let us see whether this fact does not furnish evidence that all such are under a degree of madness or insanity in regard to eternity. Let us first attempt a parabolical illustration.

A certain man during the night discovers his neighbour's house to be on fire in the lower story and knowing that his neighbor was asleep in an upper room he erected a ladder to the window and ascended to wake him and assist him to make his escape. When he had entered the chamber and broken the slumbers of his neighbor he bid him make haste and escape for his life: for the lower part of his house was all in flames and if he did not flee it might not be a moment a longest it could not be more than an hour before he must sink into the flames below without a possibility of escaping destruction.

This neighbor after hearing him through instead of endeavoring to escape told him about improvement he had contemplated in the furnishings of that chamber and immediately set himself about it stating that when he had finished the chamber he should attend to his warning. He had some more elegant furniture to put up; and some choice paintings which would add very much to the appearance of the chamber and it would not occupy him but a short time. But the man who came to warn him assured his neighbor that his danger was imminent and asked him of what consequence it was how a chamber appeared that was on the point of being burned up and what consolation it would be to him if he should sink in the flames that he had finished it more elegantly and concluded by urging him more earnestly to escape for his life. And while he was yet speaking some one of the family in an adjoining chamber sunk with a with a shriek into the flames. This for a moment aroused the man's attention and he stepped toward the window as if to escape. But on descending the ladder he doubted whether it were able to support him and soon turned about and began again to arrange with much art and taste his pictures. On seeing this the man who came to save him felt so distressed for his danger that he took hold of his hand and endeavoured to pull him towards the window - but he burst away in a rage telling him that he was an intruder meddling with that which did not belong to him and actually compelled him to flee from his presence. In a few moments that chamber was seen to give way and the unhappy man was precipitated into the flames. And wherever the circumstances of this case were known it was the universal conclusion that he must have been deranged or he could not have conducted so strangely and foolishly.

My hearers, mankind were asleep in this world, while the flames of hell were burning beneath and threatening them with inevitable destruction. While in the situation the Lord Jesus Christ came among us, to wake us, show us our danger, and the only way of escape. He has left us the bible which speaks to every unregenerate man and tells him that except he escape for his life - except he repent and have a new heart - it will be at longest but a short time it may not be a single day before he will inevitably sink into the flames of perdition where he will be tormented in a lake of fire and brimstone day and night forever and ever. Yet this solemn warning does not move unregenerate man to flee to the cross for safety: but they go about the concerns of the world with the greatest eagerness and though standing in the most imminent danger every moment they will not set about attaining salvation until they have adorned their persons a little more or acquired a little more knowledge or property or fame or indulged a little more in worldly pleasure. Nay further while these warnings are sounding in their ears from the bible they often are solemnly admonished of the truth by some unregenerate companion on his death bed, who assures him that he is just ready to be plunged into the unquenchable fire because he has neglected his soul. And though such dreadful instances sometimes induce sinners to take a step towards escaping yet they see so many difficulties in the way and have so many doubts about the method of salvation through Christ that they soon give over their fears and return again unconcerned to their pleasures and their literature their money or their merchandise. But Christ does not forsake here. He sends down his Holy Spirit to take them by the hand and as it were compel them to escape to the strong hold of safety. But even this generous assistance they refuse and actually resist that Spirit forcing him as it were to depart. Yes and many unregenerate men conduct in this manner although they profess to believe the bible and the truths it contains. Though they say that they have no hope and believe that should they now die they should sink into perdition and there lie weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth forever and even and though they believe that there is a way of escape through Christ and that it will be their own fault if they are not saved - though many acknowledge all this yet they conduct just as if not one word of it were true and they pursue with eagerness the vanities of this world to the entire neglect of their immortal souls.

Now my hearers who of you is there that would not say that man was insane who conducted as I have described when his house was on fire? And can you hesitate to call him insane who conducts as I have described while the fires of hell are blazing beneath him he knows not but the next moment may be too late to escape? Or not the two cases parallel? Parallel! did I say? If it be madness to refuse to leave a house on fire and to suffer a temporal death - what shall we call it to refuse to escape from hell and to such blindfold into the wine press of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God - to be tormented not merely a few years but forever and ever? If it be insanity to set about adorning our houses when the fire is consuming them what shall we call it to spend our whole time in eager pursuit of the trifles of this life when everlasting fire threatens our souls any moment? And yet that is certainly a faithful account of the conduct of unregenerate men year after year and often as long as they live. Why then does this conduct discover a blind a fatal madness? And why is it that such astonishing infatuation and stupidity is not regarded among men an evidence of insanity as much as the conduct of him who would not escape from his burning habitation? Certainly the fact that men do not thus regard the person that lives unregenerate an additional evidence that in regard to spiritual things madness is in their heart while they live.

Thus much for the first parable. Let us proceed to a second.

A man was observed year after year to be constantly employed in searching every broken and stream for a certain kind of pebbles which had no peculiar value about them except that they were more rare than common pebbles and these he carefully deposited in boxes and placed them in a safe place. During all this time his feet were bare and bleeding being wounded by the stones - his food was of the coarsest kind and not satisfying hunger but a few moments and his drink was of such a quality that increased instead of allaying his thirst. While in this situation a rich man came to him and presented to him as much silver and gold as would render him independant through life and offered to give him food and drink of the best quality to furnish him with a superb dwelling and to place him in a situation where he would be above want and enjoy all this world could afford. And all this did he offer merely because he pitied that hard lot of the poor man. But that poor man although complaining continually of his hardships and trials entirely disregarded this princely offer and although the rich man urged it upon him and tried to reason with him on the subject he proudly and scornfully rejected his invitation engaged more eagerly than ever in collecting his pebbles. And before he died he gathered together an enormous file. And whoever heard of this singular case concluded that once that this man must have been deranged. And so in fact he was.

Yet my hearers the situation of this man gathering pebbles and refusing to accept the gold the palace the food and raiment to liberally offered to him aptly represents men gathering the riches the honors and pleasures of this world and refusing the glories and the joys of heaven. For the riches and pleasures offered this poor man had not a greater superiority above those he then enjoyed. The riches and pleasures of heaven have above those of the earth. They have not a greater superiority did I say? They have not the ten thousandth part as great. For in the case supposed there is ground for a comparison - between earthly riches and heavenly riches there can be no comparison. The one is finite the other infinite. Neither do earthly riches satisfy the mind and the pursuit of the world only serves to increase the thirst for it. Yet God through mere compassion has offered to give us an inheritance incorruptible undefiled and unfading - to give us for food the fruit of the tree of life and for drink the river of the water of life whereof man drinks he shall never thirst - and he has opened the riches of heaven and offered them to us without money and without price and he has urged us most affectionately and earnestly to accept of them without money and without price although they complain of the hardships and trials of this life. Yet unregenerate men refuse and neglect the offer and they go on in pursuit of earthly riches and or honors our pleasures just as eagerly as if no such offer had ever been made. Nay many of them after acknowledging that God has made such an offer to men and after confessing that this world does not satisfy them and that the riches and joys of heaven are as great as the bible describes after all this they continue year after year to pursue eagerly the objects of time to the total neglect of the riches and joys of eternity. Now if this be not evidence of an insanity in the mind of such persons as that of the poor man whose case we have described where can evidence be found?

And yet to the unregenerate part of the world such neglect of the offered joys and riches of heaven afford no evidence at all of any thing like madness in the human heart. Nay to discover a great anxiety for a new heart for a preparation for heaven is regarded in the world generally as a mark of irrationality and littleness of mind and as indicative of enthusiasm and derangement. I appeal to facts whether this be not the case. O my soul to what a state of debasement and madness has sin reduced the human character!

*My god I feel the mournful scene
My bowels yearn o'er dying men
And fain my pity would reclaim
And snatch the firebrands from the flame. [Source: Hymn by Philip Doddridge, 1739]*

Sermon 83 Entire Depravity

[Sermon No. 83, "Entire Depravity," Ecclesiastes 9:3, 1821 Nov,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 12]

Ecclesiastes 9:3

The heart of the sons of men is full of evil and madness is in their heart while they live and after that they go to the dead.

[Delivered at the afternoon service following Sermon 82.]

We attempted in the morning to prove that these words of Solomon as applied to men in an unregenerate state are neither extravagant nor untrue. And we did not stop to address proof of the fact that madness is in the heart of the sons of men while they live either from other parts of scripture or from the history of the world. But kept our eyes fixed solely on the single fact that unregenerate men neglect the offers of salvation made to them through Christ year after year and often through life. This fact no one will dispute for it stares us in the face every day and therefore it is a better argument to establish the assertion of Solomon than any more remote and capable of being disputed. That argument - that fact we wish still to keep our eye upon this afternoon. In the former part of the day it was presented before you in a parabolic form. We now drop the parable and present the subject and the argument naked before you. Let us in the first place prepare the way for the subject by giving a short statement of the condition of man by nature in Christian lands - we mean their condition as the bible describes it. For the evidence that the bible is from God is so overwhelming that very few minds can withstand it and probably there is no one within the sound of my voice who will deny its divine original.

With then who are born in a Christian land as soon as we reach the years of moral discernment are informed by scripture and by pious friends that we have but a short and and uncertain time to live in this world - but that we have souls within us that are to live forever and then after death cometh the judgment when we shall be condemned to everlasting woe in hell or received to everlasting happiness in heaven according to the deeds done in the body. We are told further that we have all sinned and come short of the glory of God and that by nature we are children of wrath even as others. And that except we repent we shall all perish - except we be born again we cannot see the kingdom of God - and except we believe in the son of God we are condemned already and shall never see light but have the wrath of God abiding on us. That is to say we are all by nature in a state of condemnation having broken the law of God and unless we comply with the terms of deliverance and reconciliation through Christ God will remain our enemy and will cast us into the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone forever and ever and punish us with everlasting destruction. And we know not that another hour will be granted to us to comply with these terms.

Such is the alarming state in which the bible informs us as soon as we can read it that we are placed. And now would not an angel of light who was informed of our condition but knew nothing of that madness we carry within us would he not conclude that as soon as we were made acquainted with our fallen alarming condition we should not give ourselves a moments rest until we have made our peace with God and complied with the terms he had propose to us? Would he not conclude that are that our distress of mine would be exquisite until this was affected lest our lives should be taken away and we sink into everlasting burnings? Would not this angel be thunderstruck were he told that ninety-nine out of a hundred among men receive the knowledge of their awful condition without having excited within them anything more than a momentary anxiety! What would he think that ninety-nine out of a hundred lived year after year in this state of condemnation under the curse of God before they experienced any lasting distress or conviction of their danger although very many among them were taken away in their sins before their eyes and warned them on their death beds of that hell into which they were sinking. Could such an angel believe that when men lay under the eternal curse of an omnipotent God they could possibly attend a single moment even to supply their necessities until that curse were known. Much less could he believe that they could enter actively and with their whole heart into the pursuits of worldly riches or honors or pleasures? And when he saw that they did thus do that they neglected almost wholly the subject of religion and labored constantly for this world's goods as if they were to live and enjoy them forever must he not conclude would he not have reason to say that, madness is in the heart of the sons of men while they live? What better evidence could he have that in regard to their eternal state they were actually insane?

Still however men who live along year after year regardless of religion in a Gospel land find it necessary for easing conscience and vindicating themselves before Christians to have some kind of excuse for neglecting it. To some of these let us now attend and perhaps in these also we shall discover evidence of a state of feeling which may very properly be called madness.

And the first excuse that usually meets us for neglecting religion is that repentance and a new heart are the gift of God and therefore we must wait till God please to bestow them. But the easy answer to this is that God does please to bestow these gifts any moment when we seek them in a proper manner - and we challenge any man to produce an instance where a man has sought religion in a proper manner without a right Spirit who did not finally obtain it. You would think that man an idiot who should refuse to sow his seed in the spring saying that as the harvest is the gift of God he must wait till God please to bestow it. Now God has not more truly promised his Spirit to them that asks him: and we have just as much reason to expect a natural harvest without showing that the seed as a spiritual harvest without exertion. But the fact is most men who bring forward this excuse for neglecting religion do not themselves believe that it is any serious obstacle. For if they really suppose themselves compelled to wait month after month and year after year for God to move upon their hearts before they could take one step it would distress them beyond measure lest in the meantime they should die and be cast into hell. And in general those who make this excuse have no such fears - and therefore they do not really believe it. Under all the circumstances then what a degree of madness does it indicate to address such a reason for remaining stupid!

But in the second place many unregenerate men will say that they wish to possess religion but they know not how to set about acquiring it - they know not how to acquire convictions. What a shocking degree of madness and stupidity does it indicate in any heart when it knows that it is every moment exposed to sink into everlasting burnings not to have convictions of its danger! If a man were told that his habitation was on fire and that he would soon be destroyed unless he escaped from it what would you think of him if he should reply I would gladly escape how shall I get convictions of my danger? For although I do not doubt that my house is on fire and that I shall soon become consumed unless I flee from it - yet I am not convicted of my danger and how then shall I set about escaping? Now this language is not more extravagant than for a man to say as many do - I believe the bible to be the word of God and I believe that if I should die in my present state of heart I must go directly into hell. But still I have no convictions of my danger and how shall I get them? And how can I set about working out my salvation unless I have these convictions? What my hearers! A man believe that in a single hour he may drop into eternal fire - a man stand as it were on the very border of the bottomless pit and have its covering stripped away and already feel the heat he had of a guilty conscience pushing him into it and yet complains that he has no convictions of his danger and gravely enquire how he shall get them? O what a contradiction stupidity and madness! And yet this is the precise condition in which every very many rest in a Christian land! For were they who profess to believe the bible to have convictions of the danger they would soon have convictions for sin and be brought to submission. O there is madness in the heart of the sons of men while they live!

A third excuse men have at hand to justify themselves in neglecting religion is that mentioned by Christ. One has bought five yokes of oxen - another a farm - another is busied in merchandise and a fourth has married a wife and they are so constantly occupied by these objects that they cannot find time to attend religion. In other words many men complain that their necessary worldly concerns take up their time so entirely that they cannot attend religion although they wish to become religious. It may indeed be true that a man is so incessantly occupied that he does not find time to attend even for secret prayer. But was he compelled to involve himself in so much worldly business? Would he starve or be without raiment or remain in ignorance were he to devote a portion of time every day to reading the bible meditation and prayer? Certainly nothing short of absolute necessity would afford the least excuse for neglecting the welfare of the soul. And indeed is there any necessity so powerful as to justify a man one hour in neglect of eternity? Suppose an extreme case that a man has the alternative before him either to attend to religion and actually starve to death or neglect religion and live sumptuously a few years and then go to hell? In other words would it be possible to starve on earth and go directly to heaven or to have enough on earth and after death go down to hell? If you ask those who are now in heaven having fullness of joy and pleasures forevermore are those who are now lifting up their eyes and in hell being in torments what think you would be their reply?

But my hearers such a case as this never yet did occur. It is not required of us to neglect our necessary worldly business in order to attend religion. And we do not believe that there was ever yet a man who really supposes that he must leave his worldly concerns to destruction in order to obtain religion. Though there are not wanting those who produce this as a reason for not attending to it. All men in Christian lands regenerate and unregenerate know that the bible enforces repeatedly the virtues of industry and economy and that it condemns only that devotion to these things which excludes attention to the soul - and therefore to address the pressure of worldly pursuits as a reason for neglecting God and eternity as evidence of a kind of infatuation which amounts to madness.

In the next place some unregenerate transgressors will say that although they believe the religion of Jesus Christ is a reality yet they find so many clashing and opposite opinions on the subject among different denominations and different men that they know not what to believe even in regard to the practical part of it. For while one person tells him that a change of heart is necessary and that he hopes he has experienced it, another tells them that this man's proposed change of heart is all a delusion and that he has himself had all those feelings said to accompany regeneration and found them the effect of fear and high animal vanishing in a short time without any fruit. And because men differ on this subject, therefore these persons conclude that they never can arrive at the truth if they attempt it, and hence they do not make the attempt. That is to say, although they acknowledge that there is a human and a heaven and a hell, and that they are not prepared for heaven yet because men differ about what that preparation is, they despair of finding out the truth on the subject and conclude to make no attempt to escape destruction. Now is not this a most irrational counsel? If men had any sense of the value of the torments of hell instead of plunging into an universal doubt on the subject because all do not explain the bible alike, they would at once not only abandon all confidence in opinions of men but betake themselves to reading the bible with prayer, resting on the plain principle that if God has given us a revelation on which our eternal welfare is suspended he has made it capable of being understood and being also assured in that revelation that, if any man lacks wisdom he may ask it of God who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not - and it shall be given him. And yet we venture to affirm that not one man who makes this excuse for neglecting religion unless he be awakened by the Spirit of God, ever takes this most obvious and consistent course. And why? Because madness is in the heart of the sons of men while they live.

Another excuse not infrequently met with for living without religion near akin to the preceding is that many of those who commence a religious life with great ardor and profess to have great light soon fall away and are guilty of greater sin than before and hence it is impossible to say who has religion and who has not. And although few men will openly acknowledge that this is any excuse for their neglect yet the frequency with which many dwell upon this point shows that it does secretly operate to lull their consciences into security. Now to what does this excuse amount? Stripped of its disguise it means just this we are resolved to go to hell because others are and when we are there writing in the agonies of despair how sweet it will be to reflect that a few apostates were the means of bringing us into that place of torment and how much it will alleviate our anguish to reflect that had not these false professors of religion stood in our way we might have gone to heaven! The truth is my hearers were there not a single professor of religion in the world who is really a child of God if every one of them were a hypocrite it would not afford us the shadow of an excuse for neglecting to embrace religion ourselves. For we are bound to look at religion in the bible not at religion as it is abused among men. Yet the majority of unregenerate men find their consciences greatly relaxed whenever they hear a professed Christian has disgraced the cause of Christ. What can such a feeling perceived from unless it be from a heart that is mad?

Another method in which men sometimes excuse themselves at least to their own consciences and especially in times of a revival is this. Religion say they we acknowledge is a good thing and we mean to possess it before we die: but we do not mean to be frightened into it we do not intend to be driven into heaven. We want to take time to examine the subject deliberately: for in a concern of so great importance we do not intend to be mistaken and certainly if religion be not rational it is not worth having. And therefore we dislike to have so much terror preached to us. Now my hearers although such language is in many a mouth and in many a heart the fact is it is impossible either to drive a man into religion or to frighten him into heaven. But he may be driven by the terrors of the Lord to see his danger and frightened at it when he does see it. And then he will make efforts and rational efforts too to escape it. And is there not something in the idea of being gnawed forever by a worm and burned forever in fire and brimstone calculated to produce a most distressing alarm even in the most rational mind. And if all unregenerate men are hourly exposed to these very woes why should we not plainly and repeatedly and forcibly tell them and urge them to escape without a moments delay? If you see a friend in a burning building and perceive the roof just ready to fall upon him would you not cry out to him to escape from it in a moment or he would be a dead man? Or would you say to him it will be well for you my friend to leave that house: but do not be frightened - do not be driven out of it - deliberate well what you are about to do lest you should come out of the wrong door? And yet it would be just as proper it would be more proper to address this man in such a manner than to neglect to warn the impenitent sinner for hell is already opening to receive him and the storm of Almighty wrath and may ere one hour bury him forever. Why is it then that men judge so correctly concerning temporal things and so wildly concerning eternal things? The fact shows that there is within us a strange and deep rooted derangement.

We shall mention but one other fact that afford evidence of Solomon's assertion. It is that unregenerate men who acknowledge the Gospel of Christ to true are yet ashamed of it. They do not indeed alledge this for neglecting as an excuse for neglecting religion nor unless under deep convictions will they acknowledge the fact. Yet it is nevertheless true and probably almost every Christian present can bear witness to it, that unregenerate men when convinced of their danger and of the truth of the gospel are ashamed to let it be known that they are anxious for their souls - and unless their distress be great they will hide it in their bosoms as no doubt very many shift their convictions and resist the Spirit merely because they are ashamed to meet their companions and confess that they are resolved to serve the Lord. They dread being called superstitious or even religious more than the tenors of the bottomless pit. And yet my hearers of what has a man who is anxious for his soul to be ashamed except that he has so long lived without anxiety? Is it anything shameworthy to forsake the company of the wicked man for that of angels of good men of Christ and God? Is it shameworthy to desire to be delivered from the anguish of eternal fire? Ought Or to wish to enter and possess fullness of joy and pleasures forever more in heaven? What communion can be more disgraceful and unpleasant to a pure heart than that of the wicked man which we wish to leave? Or what more honorable and delightful than that we seek? What torments more dreadful than those we would share or delights more exquisite than those we seek to win? And tey after all unregenerate men almost universally are ashamed to acknowledge that they are anxious to possess religion. What! Is a drowning man ashamed to be seen making efforts to save himself? Is an honest man ashamed to exert himself to escape the society of the dishonest? And yet certainly such persons have much more cause to be ashamed than the man who is anxious for his soul. Can there be a stronger evidence of madness in the hearts of men?

Such are the proofs my hearers furnished by the single fact that men neglect religion that the assertion in the text is neither extravagant nor untrue. It is indeed sickening and distressing to observe what a deep and dreadful moral madness this single fact shows us to be in the heart of the sons of men. By this the Prince of darkness keeps his thousands and ten thousands in subjection. This it is that raises so many obstacles to the progress of Christ's kingdom among men and this will cause millions to weep and to rail and to gnash their teeth forever and ever.

Yes my hearers it is a voluntary and an unnecessary madness. It is the deliverance of sin: and therefore discourses deserves and will meet the fiercest punishment from a holy God. Let then the man who indulges this madness the man who neglects religion let him prepare to endure the storm of divine vengeance. For it is gathering over his head. Already do I see the clouds of thickening and blackening in the heavens. The thunderbolts of eternal justice are struggling to give vent to the lightning of almighty wrath already begins to flash. O it is the final storm - and when once it bursts, its lightnings will cleave asunder the earth - its thunder will shake the lowest foundations of hell - its fury will sweep away the broken fragments of the material world and from its caverns will be poured forth a stream of fire to melt the elements and burn up the universe.

That day of wrath that dreadful day
 When heaven and earth shall pass away
 What power shall be the sinner's stay?
 How shall he meet that dreadful day?
 When shriveling like a parched scroll,
 The flaming heavens together roll,
 When louder yet, and yet more dread,
 Swells the high trump that wakes the dead,
 O, on that day, that wrathful day,

When man to judgment wakes from clay,
Where, where shall be the sinner's stay?

Sermon 85 Sinner Like the Heath

[Sermon No. 85, "Sinner like the Heath," Jeremiah 17:5-6, 1821 Dec,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 13]

Jeremiah 17:5-6

Thus saith the Lord, cursed be the man that trusteth in man and maketh flesh his arm and whose heart departeth from the Lord; For he shall be like the heath in the desert and shall not see when good cometh; but shall inhabit the parched places in the wilderness in a salt land and not inhabited.

[Trust the bible, not our own interpretation, p. 3. This sermon has many revisions and deletions. It is not clear whether some of the material inserted is alternate or additional text. Some crossed out sections are transcribed, some are omitted.]

The plan of the discourse we are about to present from these words is first to explain the meaning of the text and then to make a particular application of it. And the first enquiry that meets us is what description of men is it who trust in man and, make flesh their arms and whose heart departeth from the Lord? As a general reply to this question we may say that all men who do not love God supremely do not trust in him but in something else that is in worldly object connected with man and they can lean upon an arm of flesh instead of the arm of God. But it may be necessary to be more particular.

In the first place those more specially put their trust in man who rely upon their own reasonings concerning the doctrines and practice of religion rather than upon the bible. We are to use our reason most certainly in examining whether the scriptures have evidence about them that they are a revelation from God. And after we have decided upon the closest enquiry that they are divine we are to use our reason in ascertaining what that revelation contains: but when we find in them some doctrines which appear to us mysterious although clearly asserted by the sacred writers we have no right to reject them because we see difficulties in them. For after we have acknowledged the bible to be the word of God we are bound to believe in everything it contains. We cannot constantly believe a part and reject a part for this is setting up our own reason as a judge of what God can what he cannot reveal. Whereas the very nature of a revelation from God implies that we ought to expect things new in it beyond our faculties to comprehend. Take for instance the doctrine of second said regeneration. After reading in the bible what Christ has declared on this subject that except a man be born of water and the Spirit he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven, if like Nicodemus we may enquire, how can these things be? and are led live on account of the mysteries contained in the doctrine to reject it as untrue or which amounts to the same thing to say that it is a difficult and unintelligible passage and we know not its meaning - this is to put our trust in our own reasonings instead of God's word - whereas if we reject that doctrine we ought to reject the whole bible we ought to believe that doctrine and to distrust our own understanding in a matter so much above our comprehension.

In the second place he trusts in man and departs from the Lord who is more influenced in matters of religion by the opinion and practice of other men than by the declarations of the bible. Some form their religions opinions from the writings of eminent man without consulting the bible to determine whether that contains the same sentiment or not. And very many become so prejudiced beforehand against certain sentiments - entire depravity, regeneration, the trinity, election, etc. - that they would not discover any thing in the scriptures contrary to their prejudices though plain as the noon day sun. And so certain are they that they must be in the right that they do not pray when reading the scriptures for the enlightening influences of the Holy Spirit to guide them into the truth.

There are others and they are numerous too who neglect practical religion because many learned and respectable men - many of their nearest and most valued friends and many of their companions neglected. Like the chief priests and Pharisees of old they enquire concerning Christ, have any of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed on him? It is not in general the unlearned part of society that become converted to evangelical sentiments. And do not the wisest and most learned and most candid of mankind stand in doubt about the reality and necessity of a change of heart? And so long as such men (so long as the majority) neglect vital godliness thousands will lean upon and feel safer to trust in opinions than in God. Yet surely they are confiding in an arm of flesh and departing from the Lord. When God commands them to repent and be converted they do not enquire whether it is their duty but whether such or such persons have presented and been born again: and finding certain favorite individuals or it may be a majority with them they resolve to neglect God and trust in man.

[A paragraph is crossed out in pencil and is skipped]

A third class of men who confide in themselves and therefore trust in arm of flesh are those who depend for salvation upon their works. Some conceive nothing more to be necessary to obtain heaven than to be just and upright honorable and merciful in their concerns towards their fellow men and strict in the restraint of their more corrupt passions - that is they depend for salvation upon an exact and elevated morality. Is not this leaning upon a broken staff? Is not this departing from the Lord - who have said that, by the deeds of the law no flesh living shall be justified and that not of our selves it is the gift of God?

Other men proceed a step farther. They have a certain round of what are called religious duties in the performance of which they are very strict. They observe exactly the sabbath unite morning and evening in prayer and perhaps (though this is with such is rare) go regularly into their closets and thus far all is well. But they rely only upon these duties for salvation instead of Christ. When they feel any anxiety about their real state they look back and count up their many prayers their many charities their many sacrifices in the cause of Christ and moreover take into view how sincere they have been in all these things and their consciences are at once eased and they conceive it impossible that God should not ever cast away any one who has performed so many good works sincerely. And so he could not were men to be justified and saved by works such by imperfect and selfish obedience - but so long as it is true that after they have done all they are but unprofitable servants - so long as they seem justified freely by grace through the redemption there is in Christ Jesus and as long as they are saved not by works of righteousness which they have done but according to the mercy of God by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost certainly they who rely upon these works instead of the merits of Christ for salvation are trusting in an arm of flesh and not in God.

Those in the fourth place emphatically trust a man who are depending upon the prayers of Christians. The disciples of Christ ought to pray and will pray for all men and especially for impenitent men, and it indicates a state of feeling by no means unfavorable in a man to ask an interest in the prayers of those whom he believes to be Christians. And it may be that God will hear the prayers of such in their behalf. But He will not hear them until the person who is trusting in them is brought to put his trust somewhere close viz. in the sovereign mercy of God in Jesus Christ. He will be brought first to see that the prayers of his Christian friend derive all their efficacy from the blood of Christ and to realize that to trust in them and not in God is to lean upon an arm of flesh.

In the fifth place some are trusting in their sincerity. They do not pretend to have studied the bible carefully or to have made up their minds as to the doctrines it contains: or to know anything from their own experience concerning that change of heart which Christ declares essential to salvation. Yet they know that they are sincere in all that they do and feel respecting religion and have no desire to interfere with others in their religious opinions not to prevent their becoming serious: and on this feeling of sincerity they depend for salvation feeling confident that God cannot finally condemn those who are so honest: although God has said, he that trusteth in his own heart is a fool: there is a way etc. - he that believeth not shall etc.

In the sixth place some are trusting in the means of grace for conversion and thus departing from the Lord. What can we do say they but attend religious meetings and read the bible and pray and consciously perform every moral duty incumbent upon us? We cannot change our own hearts: but we hope to receive the blessings in the diligent use of the means of grace and salvation which God has appointed. Alas such individuals forget that there is not one promise in the bible for the conversion of those who are waiting for it in the use of means: and they forget that experience teaches that no such man ever yet was converted until he was thoroughly convinced that was under immediate and pressing obligation to repent, and love God was led in agony of Spirit to cry to God for mercy. Until they are brought into such a state of feeling they are departing from the Lord and are therefore cursed.

Finally those disciples of Felix who delay attention to a more favorable opportunity depart from the Lord and are under the curse. In time of stupidity they excuse themselves from giving their minds and hearts to religion because there is nothing to excite their attention. In time of a revival they excuse themselves lest they should be influenced by fear or sympathy - or because they cannot in a time of excitement give religion an impartial examination. Such persons are emphatically leaning upon arm of flesh: for they are calculating upon that most uncertain of all things - that response to human life. The command of God is my son give me thy heart - a duty which commends itself at once to every man's conscience nor does it require any learned investigations to proving it binding upon us. But a heart deceitful above all things and desperately wicked persuades a man that a desire calmly and impartially and thoroughly to examine the subject of religion is the true reason why he does not attend to it - whereas it is nothing but the aversion of that heart to religion that lies in the way.

Today attend is wisdoms voice etc.

There are others in the seventh place who trust in a revival of religion. They conceive that there is an influence abroad at such a time which will almost infallibly force them into the possession of love to God not remembering that though more is said at such a time upon the subject than at others yet the same process must be gone through then as at any other time - viz. submission to the righteousness of God. And accordingly such persons usually find after waiting long during a revival for conversion that they are trusting in man and neglecting God.

We mention but one other class of persons who trust in an arm of flesh. They are the disciples of Felix who depend upon a continuance of life and that they shall at a future time have a more convenient opportunity to become religious. Such were those to whom Isaiah said cease ye from man whose breath is in his nostrils; for wherein is he to be accounted of? And truly when men look around them and within them and have evidence from day to day that nothing is uncertain as life is it not a proof of the most egregious folly to rest their everlasting all upon the days to come? This is emphatically to tempt God and to depart from him. Yet thousands in every age - probably some in this house are confiding in this and in this only.

We have now explained what it is to trust a man and make flesh our arms and depart from the Lord. We proceed to explain what is meant in the text by the heath to which such men are compared.

The heath is a certain plant that is found in many parts of the earth on the driest and most barren spots. It does not flourish in the spring like other plants but remains without flowers or leaves till the latter part of summer. It is withered from for want of moisture the soil on which it stands being so loose and dry as not to retain. The showers that fall upon it - and of course it is almost destitute of soil and almost worthless. While other plants in better soils are revived and flourish by the showers and the warmth of summer this stands barren, leafless and withered.

We come now my hearers to the application of this subject - saith the Lord cursed be the man that trusteth in man and maketh flesh his arm and who departeth from the Lord. For he shall be like the heath in the desert and shall not see when good cometh but shall inhabit the parched places in the wilderness in a salt land and not inhabited. You have seen that those who put their trust in man are in general terms the impenitent part of society. You have also seen that what is meant by the heath. And now you are able to see how justly the prophet made this comparison. Nothing indeed can be more forcible to describe the condition of the impenitent in a Gospel land. Like the heath they partake not of its influences. Like the heath they remain amid the showers of divine grace withered and dry and in the view of God worthless. They see not when good even the greatest possible good cometh. And though Christians grow and flourish around them and bring forth fruit yet these dwell in a dreary spot and as it were in a land not inhabited.

But we have a more particular application of the subject in view. If the comparison be applicable to unregenerate men in every condition it is most emphatically applicable to such during a revival of religion. Then a most plentiful shower of divine grace is poured out and many souls are repented and put forth the tender leaves and blossoms of holiness and promise ere long to bring forth abundant fruit. But these stand unrefreshed presenting to the eye of God nothing but the naked and barren aspect of moral winter of spiritual death. Though good spiritual good supreme good - eternal good come near them yet they see it not. Though all is dressed in the beauty of spring around them yet there they stand, shrivelled and blasted in the barren soil of sin, in all the stillness and dreariness of winter. There stands the man who leaning to his own understanding neglects the word of God. There stands the man who renders a greater deference to the opinion and practice of others than to the declarations of God. There too you see him whose heart is bound up in the world and him who is stirring to cover himself with the tattered garment of his own righteousness - and him who is looking to the prayers of his fellow sinners for salvation and him who leaps upon the broken prop of his sincerity for salvation and him who sits waiting in moping stupidity for remaining grace in the use of the ordinary means a man who is depending upon that very revival which is only hardening his heart and him too who madly disregards that precious shower of grace now feeling so copiously around him and presumes upon a future day in which to make his peace with God. O what a melancholy group of deluded men who are putting their trust in man and making flesh the arm and departing from the Lord and how mournful to see them standing like the heath in the desert knowing not that good is come - and receiving no refreshing from that stream of grace which waters all around them and puts new life and beauty into many thousands while they remain lifeless blossoms or fruits. O the frost of sin will never be melted except in the eternal fire. O sin thou put a barren soil and they that are rooted in them will wither and die!

But let us look at this application a little more closely. During a revival of religion separations are witnessed at which the eye of Christian benevolence weeps. The shower of grace which then falls gives new life to one and leaves another on the grave of spiritual death. The parent is often taken while the child is left - the father often witnesses his son and the mother and her daughter rejoicing in hope while they remain desolate as the heath of the desert and though good comes upon their children they see it not and feel it not in their own hard and heavy hearts. The brother perceives unmoved and unaffected the conversion of the sister - and the sister feels none of the influence which regenerates the brother. Brother is separated from brother and sister from sister - the one made ready for death and eternal glory and the other standing forth in the view of God a monument of a hard unsubdued and unfeeling heart. The wife sees her husband singing a new song to his Redeemer she knows not how to sing the Lord's song. The husband hears his wife declaring what God hath done for her so soul while he remains insensible bearing on his forehead the curse upon the barren fig tree. Let there be no fruits on these hence forward forever. The friend witness his friend choosing a heavenly friend - the companion forsakes his companion for Christ - and the neighbor witnesses his neighbor beginning to pray while that friend and that companion and that neighbor who are left remain with hearts as hard as ungodly as ever.

And my hearers could we indulge the hope that these separations made during revival would be of short duration - could we believe that those who are left like the heath in the desert would ere long experience a second shower that would renovate their souls the picture not be so distressing. But alas! Small is the probability almost desperate is the hope that those who can resist the motives and the grace exhibited during such a period, should in a season of stupidity submit to God - and should they live to witness a second revival their calls to repentance would be no louder while their hearts would be harder and their sins more rooted. Ah, then these separations will probably continue! Nay! They will become wide and wider forever. Let us follow these different characters in imagination along their respective paths. Speak not here of those who defend themselves with a false hope. But those individuals that parent or child that brother or sister that husband or wife - that friend a companion or neighbor on whom the shower of divine grace has fallen during a revival will find their faith like the morning light that shineth more and more into perfect day. The Spirit of God will continue to nourish and defend by his influences the tender plants of holiness which have sprung up in their hearts during a revival - and ere long they will bear abundant fruit. At length after resisting for a few years the killing blasts of the world they will be transplanted into the garden of God in heaven - there to flourish and blossom and be fruitful forever - being continually nourished by the river of the water of life that proceedeth from the throne of God.

But on the other hand those (that parent or child) that brother or sister that husband or wife that friend or companion or neighbor who during a revival trusted in man and made flesh their arm and departed from the Lord and felt no the shower of divine grace that fell around them - that did not see the good offered but remained like the heath in the desert. These will probably be left in the parched places in the wilderness to inhabit a salt land and not inhabited. Though the showers of the Spirit should fall around them yet they will remain unwatered in the barren soil of sin. Good may come near them but they will not see it. The burning rays of God's displeasure will parch up the little moisture that is left in them. Their hearts will become harder and harder. The drought upon their souls will become more and more intolerable. The desert around them will look more and more desolate when by no flowers nor fruit nor verdant landscape but a dreary sand waste cooled by no breezes and watered by no showers. And at length after a few years they too will be removed into a world where the drought and the desert will be a thousand times more severe and desolate. And shall we follow them in imagination any farther? Shall we unveil before you the world of weeping and wailing and bid you look at them rooted in the lake of fire and brimstone – forever dying yet condemned forever to live – eternal monuments of the wrath of God – calling in vain for a drop of water to cool their tongues and filling are hell with the agonizing wail. Now how I hated instruction in my heart and despised reproof! The harvest is past, the summer is ended and I am not saved! And there O there must they be forever! O it is forever, forever, forever! But we will not draw out the picture. Let the gates of the bottomless pit be closed: for horrible as is the thought there the parent may discover his beloved child or the child his beloved father – the brother may then see a brother or a sister see the sister or brother – the husband a fond wife or the wife a fond husband – the friend a dear friend, the companion a companion – or the neighbor a neighbor – O God spare us the shuddering the agonizing fright – and send thy grace to subdue every heart that we may all at length flourish in immaculate verdure in thy paradise above.

Sermon 86 Stewardship of Ministers Teachers and Parents

[Sermon No. 86, "Stewardship of Ministers, Teachers and Parents," I Corinthians 4:2, 1821 Dec, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 13]

I Corinthians 4:2

It is required in stewards that a man be found faithful.

In great families an officer is appointed to have the oversight and the management of them who is called a steward. For the manner in which he conducts the temporal concerns of the household he is accountable to the master. The conditions of man in relation to God is precisely that of a steward to his master and this comparison is a favorite one with sacred writers as you will recollect. Everything indeed which we possess is only lent to us for a season – and for the manner we use every talent and every possession we must give an account to God - the Supreme Master of the universe. In the day of judgment he will say to us as the master in the parable said to the officer who had charge of his household, give an account of thy stewardship. And there is no principle more evident in regard to stewards whether appointed by God or man than that, a man be found faithful. Whether we have been faithful to our own souls and the souls of others will be the grand enquiry of our final judge.

We have chosen this text my hearers not at this time to make a general application of the principle contained in it to all the relations between God and man: for this would be too wide a range. We have three cases in view in which men are eminently stewards of God and to these we mean in this discourse to confine our attention. The minister of Christ is peculiarly a steward in spiritual things over his people. The instructor of youth is peculiarly a steward over his scholars. And the parent is peculiarly a steward over his children and household. And we mean to enquire when these stewards of God are faithful in their respective stations.

The first of these stewardships that of minister over his people is the one of which Paul is speaking in the context - Let a man do account of us says he as of the ministers of Christ and stewards of the mysteries of God. By the mysteries of God he means those sublime truths of the Gospel which had in ages past been kept hid from men but now revealed by the Holy Ghost. And these doctrines were entrusted to the ministers of Christ to be imparted to their people just as the master of a house entrusts his property in the hands of steward to give his household their meat in due season.

A minister of Christ then is not a faithful steward of the mysteries of God unless he declare to his people the whole counsel of God. This was the reflection that made Paul triumphantly exclaim to the Ephesians, I take you to record this day that I am pure from the blood of all men. For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God. Whatever doctrine the minister sincerely believes to be in the Gospel of Christ he must plainly and boldly and practically urge upon his people. Perhaps many in his congregation perhaps the majority - perhaps many of his nearest friends are decided and even violent in their disbelief of such or such a doctrine but if he sincerely believe it to be a part of God's revelation this consideration must not deter him one moment from declaring it and proving it and enforcing it. It may be and undoubtedly is in all cases painful to the preacher of righteousness to cross the feelings or opinions of any of his people: but it is the truth only that can make them free and if he keep back any of the truth because his hearers do not relish it how can he hope for or dare to pray for the blessings of God upon his labours? A bold and inspiring declaration of the truth may be indeed and often has been the means of driving the faithful servant of Christ from his station. Often has it brought reproach upon his character involved him in poverty and subjected him to a life of persecution and wretchedness. But for all this he who engages in this work should be prepared and though all these evils threaten him and though it would be perfectly easy for him by prophesying smooth things to avoid them all yet he should not shrink for a moment from as plain and forcible declaration of the doctrines of the cross as it is in his power to make. For he ought to obey God rather than men. He ought to employ the utmost of his faculties in explaining defending and applying divine truth. He cannot be too plain nor too forcible. He cannot be more plain or forcible than the bible. We do not mean indeed that he should be personal in his remarks. He should not appear in the pulpit as if he were contending with an adversary. He should indeed endeavor to forget that there are any in his congregation to deny the truth he defends. It is said that a sentinel when on duty in an army should know no man. So the minister of Christ when in the pulpit should forget everything in regard to his hearers except that they are dying sinful men like himself and he should, know nothing among them save Jesus Christ and him crucified. He should fill his quiver with arrows from the word of God and then hurl them forth with energy indeed not pointing them at this or that man - leaving it with God to direct them to the conscience of individuals. Justice is described by the poet as being blind. So the Ministry of Christ when in the pulpit dealing out the mysteries of God that is the doctrines of the cross should be blind to the opinions and feelings of friends and foes. He should wield the two edged sword of the Spirit which is the word of God with a double handed sweep not knowing whether friends or foes are smitten. He must tell backslidden Christians generally - not this or that backslider that except they remember from whence they are fallen and repent and do the first works a double condemnation awaits them. He must tell the impenitent not this or that unregenerate man but impenitent men generally that they are a lost that they are dead in trespasses and sins - that madness is in their hearts while they live - that they are children of wrath even as others - that a deep and a mortal leprosy is upon their souls and that in the language of the Psalmist, God is angry with them every day and if they turn not he will whet his sword that he has bent his bow and made it ready and he hath prepared for them the instrument of death. Such plainness and impartiality is alone consistent with faithfulness in the steward of the mysteries of God. Such plainness and impartiality cannot fail of taking effect upon some of his hearers - whether that effect be to bring them to yield to Christ or to arouse them to opposition he must leave with God to determine assured that he has done his duty and that he is, pure from the blood of all men because he has not shunned to declare unto them the whole counsel of God.

And O my hearers if the minister of Christ feel any thing of the value of a more immortal soul - if he feel any thing of the solemnity of eternity above all if he keep his eye fixed upon the judgment seat to which he and the people of his charge are hastening how can he avoid being thus plain and thus faithful! It is an awful an overwhelming thought that he must meet every individual in his parish and be enquired of in the presence of the universe whether he has been faithful in divining to them the word of life. If he has kept back any thing essential to their salvation if he has by neglect been the means of the everlasting ruin of one wretched soul better would it be for him if a millstone were hanged about his neck and he be cast into the sea. More tolerable will it be for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for him! O my hearers I must meet you that day and be confronted with you. And what great reason have I to fear that the blood of some of you will be brought upon my head because I am so unfaithful to you souls because I am so prone through fear of giving offense or wounding your feelings to neglect to declare so plainly and forcibly as I might the great the searching the saving doctrines of the cross. Brethren I do shudder at the thought of that final meeting. Brethren I shrink from that final meeting. O it is awful it is freezing to my soul to think of meeting one of you there whom I have been the means of conducting to perdition. How can I then look that man in the face and remember that if I had been faithful to him his soul would have been saved and my own. But now we must go away together into hell and there will his agonized countenances his groans of despair and his bitter reproaches be like so many daggers into my heart and harrow up my guilty soul forever and ever. Lord save me from so awful a fate!

We remark in the second place that the instructor of youth is a steward over his scholars. And we proceed to enquire when he is found faithful. That he is a steward in regard to their instruction in human literature and science cannot be doubted and if he is unfaithful in this respect parents and guardians will soon discover it and feel very solicitous about it. But alas few are equally anxious whether he be as faithful to their souls – nay many are indifferent even if he exert an influence upon them unfavorable to religion. For in truth an indifference of some sort or other he must exert upon them in regard to religion and if not for Christ it must be against him.

This situation indeed is peculiarly favorable for fixing on their tender minds a sense of the importance of religion or of closing their hearts against the influence of eternity. And that parent must be in a state of awful insensibility who can be indifferent whether his children secure their instructors religious exhortation.

But what must the instructor do in order to be fruitful? One most obvious course is morning and evening to call his scholars to unite with him in prayer to God for forgiveness of sin and continued blessings. This will have a most salutary influence not only upon his own mind by solemnizing it and composing it but will also inspire in their bosoms at very least a reverence for God and if offered in faith those prayers will be answered and the influence of the Spirit be given.

But in the business so full of difficulties and so responsible as that of youthful instruction a man who feels these things cannot rest satisfied with a formal prayer morning and evening. He will daily go into his closet and then commit his way to the Lord imploring a blessing upon the souls committed to his instructions. How will he dare to engage in so arduous a work – a work where every thought every word every action may be the means of fixing the eternal state of immortal souls - how can he dare engage in this without earnestly and constantly imploring the guidance of the Holy Spirit? O if he love their souls as he ought as a faithful steward how earnest will he be that he may be the means of their salvation and how will he long to see them enquiring not merely how they shall be learned but what they shall do to be saved?

Another very important thing without which an instructor of youth cannot be found faithful is moral and religious exhortation. If he pray in secret for his scholars he cannot avoid this. The very idea of his praying sincerely for them implies an anxiety for their moral and religious improvement - and if he do not address them on all suitable occasions and let them see that he longs for their eternal happiness - that is if he do not take this most effectual of all means to render them virtuous and religious will he not feel ashamed to implore God to convert them? The fact is a neglect of secret prayer will cause him to neglect exhortation and a neglect of exhortation will cause him soon to neglect secret prayer.

And the exhortations a faithful instructor will give his children will be such as will make them feel that he believes and realizes what he says and that he does earnestly long for their eternal happiness. He may be faithful in causing them to learn many of those summaries of religious doctrine and duty called catechism: but these children are apt to learn without knowing their meaning and they repeat them as a matter of habit without once supposing that they have anything more to do by way of application of those things to themselves. Yet when their instructor from the fullness of his heart shows to them how pleasant are wisdom's ways and that all her paths are paths of peace - when he tells them they are immortal - that they must soon die - and that there is a heaven for the virtuous and a hell for the vicious - they can hardly resist such exhortations which are sanctified and applied by earnest prayer. Not that an instructor should inculcate upon his pulpits upon his pupils sectarian peculiarities but let him set before them the great - the fundamental - the practical truths of the Gospel. Let him tell them of the wonderful love of Christ in dying to save sinners and that except a man be born again he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven - truths which must be fundamental and practical so long as the bible is acknowledged as the word of God. Let him inculcate the strictest morality of conduct and urge them to the universal duty of daily secret prayer. Thus doing he will be found faithful and though his pupils neglect his instruction and finally perish yet will he be clear from their blood and their blood will be upon their heads. But stopping short of this obvious course of duty how can he meet these children at the bar of God? Few instructors are there who are not anxious to please their employers and so they ought to be. But let them never forget that they are stewards of God and let them be at least as anxious to please him whose eye is continually upon them and who notes down in the book of his remembrance the manner in which they execute the important and religious office with which he has entrusted them. They must one day have a review of all they are now doing and though they may be now unfaithful to the precious souls committed to their care yet God will be faithful in requiring of them an account of their stewardship.

The third class of men we propose to address as the stewards of God ours are parents and heads of families. And no one of this extensive class will deny that God has constituted them stewards to supply the temporal wants of their children and families. And very few are there who are so unnatural a part as not to do their utmost to supply their children with food and raiment if it be in their power. Indeed there is scarcely a man living who will not assent to that declaration of the Apostle that, he who provideth not for his own household hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel. The husband and the father cannot see his wife or his children crying for bread or shivering with the cold without exerting the utmost energies of his nature to supply them. But the truth is the parent is just as much bound to exert himself to supply the spiritual wants to the children as he is the temporal wants. And that man is merciful who suffers a child to perish through hunger or nakedness in comparison with him who leaves their souls to perish eternally without any exertion to save them. To refuse to open your door to a child perishing in a wintry storm and pleading for admittance would be thought an act of the most shocking cruelty and the man who should do it would be abhorred and shunned by society. But refuse to make any effort to open for child the door of heaven nay to throw bars in the way of becoming religious this is infinitely more cruel - yet thousands of parents are guilty of it and it excites no unpleasant feelings and no remarks among men.

But what is it that makes a parent a faithful steward in Spiritual things over his children? In the first place he cannot be faithful who is not much engaged in prayer with them and for them. In a prayer which Jeremiah says was dictated by the Holy Spirit he implores God to pour out, his fury upon the families that call not on his name. David prayed morning and evening and Daniel did the same morning noon and evening. Reason accords with this practice of the ancient patriarchs morning and evening to collect our families together and commend them to the keeping of Almighty God. How deep how abiding is the effect of such a method upon parents and children. Is he then a faithful steward who neglects it? Has he not reason to fear that the prayer of Jeremiah will be answered? Has he any reason to expect that his children will be brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord? Will they not be very prone to follow the prayerless example set them?

But the parent who is a faithful steward does not rest satisfied with what is termed family prayers. The father and the mother who feel as they ought the awful responsibility that rests upon them to bring up their children to God will often kneel together during the silence of midnight to implore a blessing upon their children and their domestics. In the book of Ecclesiastes in the Apocrypha it is said that, the father maketh for the daughter when no man knoweth and the care for her taketh away sleep. No doubt every faithful parent before me know this from his own experience and I can scarcely believe there are any in this house who, having such a solemn charge committed to them, can live month after month and year after year without sending up their devout and fervent and united prayers to heaven for direction and for the salvation of their dear children. Much less would I believe that there is one who has not often who has not daily prayed in secret for the precious immortal souls committed to his superintendence. Can anyone be so insensible to his obligations. So cruel to his tender offspring as not to beseech an Almighty God to protect them from the temptations of the world – and so regardless of their eternal welfare as not earnestly to pray that they may be saved if he himself should perish!

And here I cannot refrain from stating a fact with which I have been made lately acquainted which although it may excite the smile of the of the sceptre will I doubt not delight the heart of the Christian. A father of a family died leaving a widow to support and bring up eleven children. She felt the immense responsibility that rested upon her and resolved to devote every moment she could spare to secret prayer for the conversion of those children all of whom were unregenerate. This sets not a morning and evening service: but it was continued at all times possible through the day and even when altering to other concerns - week after week and month after month - till at length one child diverted himself to God then another then another and so on until before she died the whole eleven were rejoicing in the hope of a blessed immortality. O what faith! What faithfulness and what success!

Another method without which the parent cannot be a faithful steward over his children is to give them personal instruction and exhortation. Said God to the Israelites, And these words (that is the ten commandments) which I command thee this day shall be in thine heart - And thou shalt teach them diligently to thy children and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house and when thou walketh by the way and then thou liest down when thou risest up. And is this covenant less binding upon us than upon the Israelites? Shall those who have the Gospel in addition to the law be under less obligation to instruct their children? Shall they not do it more earnestly and more feelingly? If the children be uninstructed by their parents who is there to direct them in the ways they ought to walk in? Who else feels in them so much interest – or will have so much influence over them? Who else is so responsible for their conduct? Who else will have such an account to render for them at the day of judgment.

And here we would remark that there is a certain method of enforcing religious instruction adopted successfully by some. After personally and individually addressing their children and domestics they kneel down and pray with them and for them or if they address an individual child they pray separately with him. Those who have never tried this course are not aware of the deep impression it makes. It convinces the child that the parent is sincere and in earnest.

My hearers I have not addressed you all this afternoon - but if God blesses this feeble discourse its effect may reach you all. Or if you feel nothing in this world from it yet you will remember it at the day of judgment. For there shall we meet you all either as minister and people are his instructors and pupils or as parents and children. And O ye instructors and ye fathers and mothers what a meeting will that be for you and me. There perhaps we shall find some miserable soul who our unfaithfulness has cheated of everlasting happiness. O how can I endure to meet one of this people fixing on me the looks of despair and calling me the author of his eternal ruin. How can you O instructor of youth bear to hear the reproaches of one of your scholars whom your unfaithfulness has destroyed. And thou O parent how can you sustain the shock when one of your dear children cries out before the universe O my parents my parents thy unfaithfulness has destroyed me eternally.

Sermon 87 Neglect of Precious Opportunities

[Sermon No. 87, "Neglect of Precious Opportunities," I Kings 20:40, 1822 Jan,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 13]

I Kings 20:40

And as thy servant was busy here and there he was gone.

[Discussion of New Year; 21 church members have died. See reference to present revival of religion in the church, p. 15.]

The rapid and unceasing march of time has brought us my hearers to enter upon a new year. Another large and important portion of our lives is closed and with all its changes and trials with all its omissions and sins of commission and with all its deeds of benevolence and holiness it is sealed up unto the judgment. There is a faithful record on high of every unholy thought feeling and action in which we have indulged the past year and by the side of the catalog of our sins is put down a list of our prayers our holy desires our religious meditations and pious actions - and there must this record stand till the Lord Jesus shall come in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And that record cannot in one iota be altered - for there is written upon it, that which is let it be holy and that which is filthy let it be filthy still.

Such an important season as this ought not then to pass by without pausing and looking into our hearts and back upon our lives and forward upon the days to come. We have been at a loss to decide what direction to give your meditations this day. But have at least selected for the theme of discourse a part of an ancient parable proceeding from the mouth of an unknown prophet and directed to the wicked Ahab. He had conquered the Syrian blasphemer Benhadad and had concluded a treaty with him contrary to the express command of God, instead of destroying him as the law required. God therefore sent him a prophet who by a parable caused him to pass judgment upon himself as did David in the case of his adultery. The whole of the parable addressed to Ahab is thus: So the prophet departed and waited for the king by the way and disguised himself with ashes upon his face. And as the king passed by he cried unto the king and he said thy servants went out into the midst of the battle and behold a man turned aside and brought a man unto me and said keep this man: if by any means he be missing then shall thy life be for his life or else thou shalt pay a talent of silver. And as thy servant was busy here and there he was gone. And the king of Israel said unto him so shall thy judgment be, thyself hast decided it. And he hasted and took the ashes away from his face and the king of Israel discerned him that he was one of the prophets. And he (the prophet) said unto him thus saith the Lord, because thou hast let go out of thy hand a man whom I appointed to utter destruction therefore thy life shall go for his life and thy people for his people.

This statement of the prophet was doubtless a parable and not a real history of his conduct. And therefore it is not improper to extend its application beyond the original design which was to condemn Ahab. If applied to the misimprovement we all make of that previous time given to us to prepare for eternity it will condemn us all. And this is the use we intend to make of the text.

We begin with the Christian - with him who hopes he has been born again and that at death he shall pass into heaven. Such an one when he lays his head upon his pillow at night after a day spent almost without prayer and devoted to the world feels some reproofs of conscience and resolves that if God spare his life to see another day he will live more to his glory. God does spare his life: but the the concerns of the world press equally hard upon him and while he is busy here and there the day is gone and God is robbed of the service he requires.

The Christian too often realizes at the close of the week that he has not spent it as a child of God and he determines to do more for God should he live through another seven days. But so busy is he here and there that he finds no more place in his heart for God and no more time for religion.

The close of a year is another period which no man who is a Christian can pass by without solemn reflection upon his conduct a deep sense of his failures in duty and neglect of communion with his God - and most of us at such a period feel within us strong resolutions of beginning the new year and living through it more devoted to the cause of Christ. Yet with the greater part of us the farm the money and the merchandise or the honors and pleasures of the world so absorb our thoughts that our resolutions prove mere empty words and scarcely do we think of them again until we find that this year is gone. Professed Christians are sometimes also led to see that the general tenor of their lives does not comport with the Gospel and they feel as if it were high time for them to awake out of sleep. But they are not yet quite prepared for entering upon the work. They have such or such a piece of business to perform which they conclude duty will not permit them to neglect and then they shall be ready to engage with greater ardor in the course of Christ. But when the set period of reformation comes they have either forgotten their resolutions or feel indifferent about it or find other concerns pressing upon them and they do a little more than renew their resolutions removing farther forward the time of their performance and thus most professors pass on resolving and resolving until after having been busy here and there in worldly pursuits for a time they find unexpectedly that life is gone and that they are summoned to give an account of their stewardship. Whether those of us who live so far from what we ought will be accepted in that day the record of eternity can alone determine. Yet enough is revealed to cause us to tremble if we are more anxious for and more devoted to this world than the next.

We now proceed to apply the text to the impenitent and unrenewed part of society. With the greater part of such it is also true that while they are busy here and there in the concerns of the world their day of grace is gone forever. Yet most of this description have an impression that they shall attain religion before they die. And when they find that they have loved the world and neglected God till he has shown in his wrath that they shall never enter into his rest they feel the most tormenting agonies doubling the pangs of death and giving them a foretaste of what it is to feel the undying worm and the unquenchable fire.

The friendship of the world, says an apostle decidedly, is enmity with God. If any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him. Now the proof that unregenerate men do universally love the world is that they derive more pleasure from the pursuit of it than from the pursuit of religion. They engage in acquiring the riches honors and pleasures of the world much more eagerly and ardently than in seeking religion. They derive more pleasure from the conversation of worldly men than religious men. Time appear short to them when engaged after the world: but it appears long and tedious when employed in worshipping God. And it is because they love the world that impenitent men become so busy in its concerns that they have no time for God. For a man will find time to attend to that on which his heart is placed. Yet one man who is in full chase after honors flatters himself with the idea that when he has reached such a point of distinction before him he shall then pause and attempt religion. But alas so busy is he here and there that life is gone before he has any time or desire to take hold seriously of the work of experimental religion. Another man whose heart is set on riches feels confident that when he has effected such and such an enterprise then he shall have leisure to enter without distraction upon the acquisition of religion. He does not realize that his present neglect of religion proceeds not from the want of time to attend to it from a want of love to it - from a supreme love to the world. A third man who is a lover of pleasure more than a lover of God apprehends that when he has reached such or such a point of enjoyment his appetites will be closed and he shall have nothing to do but to enter upon a religious course. And it is indeed true that his worldly pleasures will soon lose their relish. But the difficulty will be no love for religion to succeed his gluttoned appetite and he will find that he has been busy here and there so long in pursuit of worldly point pleasures that his day of grace is gone.

Though many impenitent men may deny it it is nevertheless true that most persons of that description when they have the subject of religion pressed upon them do feel a thousand difficulties in the way of attending to it now - and they continue Felix like to flatter themselves with the hope of a more convenient season. But experience shows universally that the longer they neglect it the more busy they are and here and there and the greater part of them find before they are aware of it that life is gone and that their souls are gone.

We have applied the text to Christians and impenitent men and shown how it describes their misimprovement and neglect of the day of life God has given them for a day of grace. But there is a peculiar season with which some are favoured when this text is more specially applicable. I refer to a revival of religion. And although my hearers you may be disgusted by hearing this subject so often brought forward yet while I do most firmly believe that God's Spirit is striving with you in a special manner I must not I cannot I dare not refrain from calling upon Christians to awake and be active and to warn every irreligious man what a precious moment it is for him to obtain religion and in what a fearful state he will be in should the work cease and he be left impenitent.

I do feel brethren that I cannot urge these solemn exhortations upon you too often or too forcibly and plainly: for this is a most solemn day with the believers and unbelievers - and I have great reason to fear that neither of these classes realize how peculiar how responsible how awfully momentous is this condition. The truth is that every week nay almost every day probably decides the eternal destiny of someone of our neighbors or friends.

During a revival then the text is applicable to Christians. As the prophet had a man committed to his keeping on the day of battle for whom he was to be answerable even with his life so Christians are appointed by God to be the means of the conversion of their brethren and if they are unfaithful the blood of these souls will finally be required of them. Most professors of religion when the Spirit of God is specially poured out upon any place are led to form many resolutions. They determine generally to awake from their spiritual slumber: but are not quite ready. They resolve when they are awakened to have more close conversation with such an impenitent friend or neighbor or child and to be more fervent in their prayers and to exert themselves in every way more energetically. But while they are busy finishing such or such an enterprise and ere they get ready to enter upon the works perhaps that unregenerate friend or neighbor or child is gone out of the world - perhaps the Spirit is gone from him and his heart is proof against all admonitions. And why should not every Christian expect that when Christ his Divine Mentor has come so near him and he will not even forsake for a short time the trivial concerns of life to welcome him that to welcome him and improve his special visit why should he not expect that if he neglects Christ's time Christ will neglect his time?

We know indeed that during a revival a cry is not infrequently raised against those professors of religion who engage actively in the work because they are neglecting the worldly business. But if they really believe that they may be instrumental of saving their brethren – if they really believe that the Spirit of God will soon be gone and those friends be left to reprobate minds how can they if they do indeed feel the value of salvation how can they hesitate whether it is their duty to be active even if for a short season their worldly concerns should suffer! How can they hesitate when they feel assured that, the Lord will provide. And how can any man be unwilling to engage in some extra services in the cause of religion at such a time when perhaps the destiny of immortal souls is dependent on his efforts. How low must he estimate the value of a soul who is willing to have it run the risque of its damnation rather than spend a few extra hours or days for its salvation!

But if the text applies to Christians peculiarly during a revival much more pertinent and striking is its application to the unregenerate. As before observe most men of this character do not intend to die without religion. They expect a more favourable time will ere long arrive. No season can indeed be more favourable than the present of moment because the longer a man lives the harder is his heart. But those who witness a revival of religion do see to say the least a very favourable time for embracing a Saviour. And if they do not repent and be converted then the probability is certainly small that they will ever be. Whether we reason from the nature of the case or from the general course of God's providence this alarming conclusion focuses itself upon us that those who live unmoved through a powerful revival will probably never be converted. And the majority of impenitent men acknowledge this probability. They regard it as a rational conclusion that they are now receiving their last special call to prepare for eternity. Yet they do not feel quite ready to attend to it with all their hearts. Could they be excused a few days or a few weeks till they have finished such or such an enterprise they flatter themselves that they shall enter with ardor upon working out their salvation with fear and trembling. But alas while they are busy here and there the precious instrument of acceptance with God is gone - the Spirit is gone and they find no place for repentance though they seek it earnestly with tears.

And O my hearers I feel it my imperious duty as a watchman for your souls to lift up my voice this day and sound an alarm in this congregation lest this be the miserable case of some of you. Nay I have every reason to believe that some of you and great reason to fear that many of you will suffer the present revival of religion among us to pass away without becoming the subject of it. I fear that the love of this world will prove the ruin of your souls. Though you may calculate upon obtaining religion while the Spirit of God is striving with this people yet I tremble for you lest you should be so occupied in the affairs of this life that you will not arise to commence the work of your salvation till this precious season is passed. I feel greatly that when you enquired of at a future date whether you were a subject of this revival you will be compelled to say while thy servant was busy here and there he was gone.

But my dear hearers for whose salvation I feel an earnest desire will you can you suffer such a precious season as this to pass away and improved?

Can you so easily cheated of heaven and contented to go down to hell? Now Christians are earnest in prayer for you the conversion of many around you powerfully calls up your attention to the subject and we verily believe that God's Spirit is knocking at the door of your hearts. But soon will those prayers become languid - soon will you cease to remember the conversion of your neighbors and soon will that Spirit grieved by your stupidity be gone beyond return.

What then does the voice of wisdom dictate? The voice of wisdom is the voice of scripture and it says, escape for thy life, look not behind thee, neither stay thou in all the plain; escape to the mountain, lest thou be consumed. Does anyone feel disposed to look back upon the world after beginning to seek religion with longing regrets as and let such an one remember Lot's wife and take warning lest he be made like her an eternal monument of God's wrath. It is these lingering glances and desires towards the world - it is this unwillingness to give up all for Christ that has proved the ruin of thousands.

Again we ask what does wisdom dictate? And there is a voice coming from the grave of the past year on which we now stand crying to every unregenerate man, Now is the accepted time behold now is the day of salvation. While such have been busy here and there that year is gone and Oh, what a dreadful catalogue of neglected and abused opportunities has it carried to the bar of God! What madness to add any more to this dreadful list!

Again we ask the unregenerate man what does wisdom dictate? And a voice comes from the graves of twenty one of our neighbors and friends whom during the past year we have followed to the tomb saying unto us, prepare to meet thy God. Yes the united voices of twenty one come from the graveyards around us and were we not like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear would thrill through our souls till we had prepared to meet our God. And my hearers which twenty one of us perhaps I might properly ask which 30 or 40 or 50 are to follow in the same course the year we have entered. We know not who are the individual victims: but certainly they are some of us - and death that king of terrors knows who they are and he is now pointing his arrows at those whom he has permitted to make his prey. Can any man resist such an argument? Will you not all my hearers attend to making your peace with God ere another year shall be gone? Another year! Who has promised you so long period as that? Who has promised you shall live another month? Who has promised you another week? Who has promised you another day? Who has promised you another hour? Who has promised you another moment?

Sermon 88 Moral Value of the Services of the Wicked

[Sermon No. 88, "Moral Value of the Services of the Wicked," Proverbs 15:8, 1822 Jan, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 6: folder 13]

Proverbs 15:8

The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord.

This text leads me naturally to consider a subject concerning which there is much caviling and with which many are perplexed. I refer to the Christian so often asked in what light God regards the best actions and thoughts and feelings of unregenerate men? To give a scriptural answer to this enquiry is the object of this discourse. And it will be necessary in the first place to collect together the various passages of scripture that relate to this subject.

As just observed this is a subject concerning which men are disposed very much to cavil and dispute - and many are even irritable about it and can hardly bear to discuss it candidly. It is presumed however that there are none present at this time who will not be willing to assent to whatever is clearly revealed in the scripture - however opposed it may be to their opinions and feelings. If any will not take this course they ought in order to be consistent to reject the whole bible. And to such it will be useless to address any argument drawn from the bible. But to those who are willing to abide by the decisions of that sacred book we say in the first place that God hath declared therein that all the religious services of the wicked are an abomination of him. This is undoubtedly the meaning of the text. The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination unto the Lord. The many sacrifices under the spiritual dispensation were all symbolic of internal and spiritual duties: and the word is frequently in scripture applied directly to these. The Psalmist speaks of the sacrifices of thanksgiving. He also says, the sacrifices of God are a broken spirit. And that the word is used to comprehend every religious performance is evident from the remainder of the verse - The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord: but the prayer of the upright is his obligation. Here the latter part of the verse is set in contrast with the former: but it would not be in contrast unless the former included the latter. And if it be allowed that the term sacrifice includes prayer no one will doubt but it includes every religious duty the unregenerate attempts to perform.

It may however be objected that by the sacrifice of the wicked in this passage is not meant the sacrifice of all unregenerate man but merely of such as are not sincere in their religious duties and who perform them for the sake of effecting some base or selfish end. But it happens that Solomon himself has answered this objection. In the 21st chapter of Proverbs he says, The sacrifice of the wicked is abomination; how much more when he bringeth it with a wicked mind? Here a distinction is made between the wicked generally and those who bring their sacrifice of any kind to serve some base end, to cover some hypocritical design and although such a hypocrite is doubly abominable in the sight of God yet the sacrifice of the wicked in any case Solomon declares to be abominable.

We have but one more passages to produce on this point. Says Solomon, he that turneth away his ear from hearing the law even his some prayer shall be an abomination. That is he who refuses to listen to or obey the commands of God - his prayer is an abomination. And where is the impenitent sinner who does not neglect and reject God's first command to love Him supremely? And if the prayer of such be an abomination how can any other of his religious services be any better?

In the second place the bible separates all the actions of the ordinary employments of the unregenerate to be sin and an abomination to God.

The way of the wicked, says Solomon, is an abomination to the Lord. By the way of the wicked is doubtless meant the general course of his life – and as the inspired writer has made no exceptions and must be inferred that all the actions of the unregenerate are an abomination to God.

If it be objected that by the wicked in this passage is not meant all unregenerate man but only the most abandoned, we answer Solomon in the remainder of the verse has settled this difficulty. He says, The way of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord: but he loveth him that followeth after righteousness. That is evidently he loves him that earnestly desires and endeavors to be righteous - although he does not attain to perfect righteousness. So that if a man have at even the least degree of righteousness or holiness God loves him: but the course of life of all others however amicable and upright their worldly conduct is an abomination to him. And we know that it is the character of all unregenerate men that they have no righteousness or holiness.

There is another passage of the scripture we might address on the subject: The ploughing of the wicked, says Solomon, is sin. The word here rendered ploughing might be translated lamp or light and then the passage would read, an high look and a proud heart of the lamp of the wicked is sin. Now a lamp or light represents the rule of the wicked man's actions and if the rule that guide such be sin what must their actions be. So that the verse translated either way shows that in the view of God all the actions of the wicked are sin.

In the in the third place the Scripture declares that the thoughts of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord. You recollect perhaps that Solomon in the 15th chapter of Proverbs uses this very expression. The thoughts of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord. Further proof of the position is unnecessary.

There is however in scripture one general proof of all the propositions above laid down that all the religious services all the actions and ordinary employments and all the thoughts of the wicked are an abomination. It is presumed no one present will deny that no man loves God until he is regenerated and therefore unregenerate men do not do anything for the glory of God. Now the command of inspiration is whether ye eat or drink or whatsoever you do do all to the glory of God. This command evidently extends to every action and every word and every desire and to every thought and is binding on every man. But we have just seen that unregenerate men do not think nor desire nor speak nor act in any case to the glory of God. What is this neglect but sin: for sin consists not merely in transgressing the law of God: but in any want of conformity to it.

Such is the view my hearers the scripture gives us of the light in which God regards the thoughts actions and desires of the wicked or impenitent. In stating it I have endeavoured to adhere closely to the sense of the bible without straining a single passage. I am not sensible of any disposition to warp a single passage to favor any peculiar sentiments. I have endeavoured to adhere closely to the declarations of the unerring word of God - and there I find it assented that the sacrifice or religious services generally of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord that the way or course of life of the wicked is an abomination - that the prayer of the wicked is an abomination - that the ploughing of the wicked is sin and that the thoughts of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord. And now my hearers I will proceed to state the reason why the actions feelings and thoughts of unregenerate men are thus offensive in the sight of God. And the reason is obvious and sufficient to stop all cavilling on the subject. It is because such persons do not love God. Love to God is represented in the scriptures as the great turning point of salvation. The man who possesses this O he who possesses it not are totally different in the motives that govern them. The latter acts and feels and desires and thinks with a supreme regard to self. The former acts and feels and desires and thinks with a supreme regard to the glory of God. He at least endeavors in all things to be guided by this apostolic rule. And such an one although beset with many sins is yet acceptable to God because he has God's glory as the motive of all his conduct. But the other man is accepted in nothing because he does nothing speaks nothing and thinks nothing speaks from a regard to God's glory. Hence then we perceive that the abomination of the wicked men's sacrifice prayers actions desires and thoughts does not lie in the mere act of sacrificing or praying or ploughing or thinking: but in the motive with which these are performed.

This my hearers seems to be a scriptural answer to the enquiry made in the beginning of this discourse with what light God views the best actions thoughts and feelings of the unregenerate. Yet no doubt many will be disposed to say, this is a hard saying: who can hear it? And no doubt many ere this have drawn inferences from the subject. Methinks I hear the impenitent man saying - if it be true that the actions and thoughts of the unregenerate are an abomination to the Lord then all such persons ought never to pray to God nor saw the bible nor observe the Sabbath nor indeed attempt to perform every religious duty: for they will thereby only add sin and increase their everlasting condemnation. It is not perhaps to be wondered at the many men who do not look at this subject in all its bearings should be led from those passages of scripture we have quoted to draw such an inference. But I do myself believe it to be a totally false conclusion. I believe that the directly contrary inference is true and that unregenerate men are about to pray without ceasing - to read diligently the scriptures - to observe the Sabbath and every other religious duty enjoined in the bible. And you will bear with me with my hearers while I give you this reasons that have led to this opinion.

In the first place God has commanded the unregenerate to perform these duties.

No one will deny that men are commanded in scripture to pray – to search the scriptures - and to observe the Sabbath. And there is no distinction made between the wicked and the righteous and therefore these commands are binding upon every one in a Christian land. Indeed there are instances in scripture where holy men of old directed impenitent men to performance of religious duties. Christ directed those Jews to whom he said, ye will not come unto me, to search the scriptures. He told the young ruler who plainly was not a believer, to go and sell all that he had and give to the poor and to come and follow him. Peter also directed Simon Magus, to repent and pray that the thoughts of his heart might be forgiven.

My second reason for believing that the unregenerate are bound to pray etc. is that the same argument against it will apply with equal force to everything else which they do. If they sin in praying they sin also in eating and drinking in ploughing and even in thinking as we have actually we have already seen and if they neglect on this account religious duties they must also in order to be consistent neglect to eat or drink or plough or to reap or even to think reprieve and think. A principle that leads to such results cannot be correct.

My third reason is that unregenerate men commit more sin in neglecting than in performing religious duties. If a man sin in praying to God he sins more by living without prayer - if he sins in reading the scripture he sins more heinously by omitting it. If he sin in attempting to observe the Sabbath he doubles his transgressions by profaning it. Because in all these cases he violates a plain command: whereas no one will pretend that the scriptures command impenitent man to neglect these duties. A man commits a greater sin who robs and murders another man than if he had merely taken his purse and the thief is not as hateful in the eye of God as the murderer. Just so the man who prays though his prayer be not acceptable with God because it springs not from a right motive may notwithstanding by that prayer render himself less hateful in the view of God than if he neglected it - not because his prayer merits anything but because his sin is less heinous. If you allow the force of this argument my hearers it decides the question at once in regard to the duty of the unregenerate.

My fourth reason is that when men are specially enabled by the Holy Spirit they universally attempt religious duties. They are doubtless prompted to these by his influences and hence I conclude that these are the methods by which the Spirit brings them to repentance. And although, until they have received new hearts their services are as Solomon says an abomination to the Lord yet must we not conclude that to neglect them would be to resist the Holy Ghost and thus prove more abominable?

My fifth reason is that these religious sacrifices are eminently calculated to humble the impenitent. Let such an one attempt to pray remembering that the prayer of the wicked is an abomination and he will almost inevitably be led to see into what an awful state he is plunged by sin. Let him attempt to observe the Sabbath and his dreadful deficiency is total want of all holy feelings will teach him the same humbling truth. And so of other duties.

My sixth reason is that God usually blesses men when sincerely attempting religious duties. Probably more convicted sinners obtain relief when engaged in earnest sincere prayer than in any other state of mind. Not because their prayers are acceptable to God - but because they are not then sinning so heinous as when neglecting this duty. If God does bless men when attempting such a duty does it not show that this is the appointed way in which the Spirit leads enquiring souls to Christ?

My last reason is that God rarely if ever converts men when they neglect religious duties altogether. This man who does not pray nor read the scriptures nor observe the Sabbath can have no prospect of being converted. Experience shows that such men usually go on hardening and hardening in sin until they are given over to reprobate minds. But if it were a matter of indifference in the sight of God whether impenitent men attempt religious duties or not he would as often convert them when neglecting as when performing.

These are the reasons the word of God and experience furnish us to show that we draw the wrong inference from the subject we have been discussing when we conclude unregenerate men ought to neglect religious duties. On the other hand it clearly appears and it would seem no candid mind could resist the evidence that they are bound every moment to perform every one of these duties and that if they neglect them they have every reason to conclude themselves in the broad way to destruction. Having considered this the objection so fully because it is so often produced we have only time to make from the subject discussed two inferences.

And we learn from the subject in the first place that salvation is wholly of grace.

If as we have shown from the bible these religious duties may all the deeds words and thoughts of unregenerate men are to say the least not acceptable to God surely he does not convert anyone because he sees within him any goodness. It must be mere sovereign mercy that saves any. So that when any receives a new heart he must not impute it to his repentance or prayers or other duties none of these having been performed from a right motive and therefore not acceptable to an holy God. The convicted sinner too who is left month after month without regenerating grace has surely no cause for complaining that he is left: for he has never performed a single act through the influence of love to God and therefore has done nothing which God can reward. And should he be left finally he can have no cause for finding fault with the justice of God since while in a state of impenitence he does nothing to merit salvation.

In the second place the subject shows us onto what an awful state impenitent men are cast by sin.

If as the bible declares their prayers their general course of life and their thoughts are an abomination to the Lord then in all these things they must be guilty of committing sin without any holiness intermingled. When therefore the unregenerate prays he sins: when he neglects prayer he sins much more - when he attempts to repent he sins: when he neglects repentance he sins much more heinously. When he observes the Sabbath he sins – and when he neglects it he doubles his transgressions. Indeed in whatever religious duty he engages he is sinful and whatever religious duty he neglects renders him much more so. Such an impenitent man is the awful state into which you are brought by your ungodly disposition. You may complain of it - you may doubt whether the bible does not exaggerate when it thus describes your condition: but this will not help you – nay it will render that condition more deplorable because such complaints and doubts will prevent your exertions for escaping from it. And indeed here is the grand difficulty with sinners they will not believe their state is so bad as the scriptures describe it. Did a man really believe himself in such a dreadful state as we have described he could not rest a moment till he had made the most desperate effort to escape from the horrible pit and the rising clay. But is not this statement of your condition ye unregenerate taken from the bible and is not that the word of God? O do not then refuse to open your eyes - do not any longer neglect that almighty arm which has so long been stretched out for your deliverance. Do not any longer again spurn away that Saviour who is knocking at the door of your heart. Your condition is now awful and desperate: but trust in Him and it shall be safe and happy and glorious forever.

Sermon 90 The Present Moment the Accepted Time

[Sermon No. 90, "The Present Moment the Accepted Time," II Corinthians 6:2, 1822 Jan, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 1]

II Corinthians 6:2

Behold now is the accepted time. Behold now is the day of salvation.

The accepted time of which Paul here speaks is that in which man may be reconciled unto God. By nature we are all children of wrath because children of disobedience. We all are all shut up under sin. We lie under the sentence of eternal death. In order then to love God and be prepared to enjoy him in heaven the weapons of that rebellion must be cast down - we must bow our necks to his authority - must lament and weep that we have offended him and enter into a new covenant with Him to devote all our faculties to his glory forever and ever. To comply with these requirements God has given to man a day of grace and in the text the most favourable moment perhaps the only moment of this day of grace is described in the word now.

The salvation mentioned in the text is none other than that from the everlasting pains of hell to which we are all exposed continually until our peace be made with God. It is then a salvation then the most important and interesting to man that can possibly be presented to him. A deliverance from hell - from the gnawing of an undying worm and the flames of an unquenchable fire - men may not feel its value but were it offered to devils they would feel it. It is too not merely a salvation from those miseries hell contains: but it implies a restoration to the favor the love and the enjoyment of God forever in heaven. Men may not feel the value of such a salvation but angels feel it.

And yet great as is this salvation it is offered to every human being without money and without price. They have nothing to do but to accept it as a free gift of sovereign mercy. Yet so proud is the human heart - so fully set is it to do evil and so fastened to the world that there is in fact nothing more difficult than to persuade men to receive this gift from the hands of God. They cannot receive this without giving up their enmity to God and so deep rooted is this so woven is it around every fibre of the human heart that after all men prefer any sacrifice to the reception of salvation through a Saviour as an unmerited gift. Strange perversion! O how obstinate is human pride! How infatuated is it! to stand out against the threatenings and promises of an omnipotent God!

Yet notwithstanding it is the melancholy fact that the majority of men neglect the exhortations of scripture to be reconciled to God without delay and to terminate the shameful contest that is carrying on between God and their hearts notwithstanding this be true but very few are sensible that they are the persons who are acting this most unreasonable part. They can see mercy around them who are living thus infatuated and opposed to God: but they are doing all in their power to obtain salvation and they feel confident that before they die they shall have Christ for their friend. The persons who will fill hell hereafter have in general no idea that they are the persons described by Christ as going away into everlasting punishment. And why do they not know it? Because they will not faithfully search their hearts. Because they cannot get time to compare themselves with the law of God. And another important reason why they do not know that they are candidates for misery is because they flatter themselves that tomorrow or next week or next month or next year they shall most assuredly be converted and become religious persons. Yes every impenitent man whether anxious for wisdom for his soul or not who does not now submit to Christ and is not in a state of absolute despair does calculate upon tomorrow however he may flatter himself to the contrary. And it is this expectation that has filled hell with thousands. For an apostle speaking by inspiration of God hath said, Behold now is the accepted time: behold now is the day of salvation.

In proceeding to illustrate and enforce these words we shall first endeavor to see precisely upon the time that is meant by the word now.

And this with my hearers is a very important enquiry. If a criminal under sentence of death from an earthly judge were told that if he would confess his fault at such an hour his life would be spared he would regard it as of very great importance not to be deceived in regard to the precise moment - especially would he have cause to tremble were the time mentioned to him an hour later than the judge had appointed. So man lying under sentence of everlasting death from a righteous God and having an offer of pardon on certain conditions to be performed at a certain time cannot but feel anxious to know the exact moment - which God has declared to be an accepted time and a day of salvation. Especially ought we to be solicitous not to be misinformed of the accepted time so as to be a day or an hour too late. For if through carelessness we do suffer the precious moment to pass unimproved God may meet us in judgment instead of mercy.

In the first place and I remark that the exact time mentioned in the text as an accepted time for becoming reconciled to us is the first moment of our lives in which we have the offers of salvation clearly made to us and we are old enough to understand them. As soon as we can be made to see that we are accountable beings - as soon as we can realize that we are sinners - as soon as we can be made to see the need of a Saviour that undoubtedly is the moment most easy to be reconciled to God and the most acceptable to him. That is emphatically the day of salvation. It is a time when habits of sin are least rooted and when therefore God is most willing to assist and receive the impenitent. If then there be one person present who now for the first time is able to understand that he is an accountable sinful being this moment is the most favourable time for making his peace with God that he will ever see.

But if this view of the subject be true it follows that most and probably every one of the impenitent in this house have lost their most favourable and most acceptable time for submitting to God. For it is presumed that there are none of this description present who have not lived days and months in an unregenerate state after they had arrived to such an age that they were capable of knowing and did actually know their Lord and Master as well. Yet we would indulge a hope that though their most favourable time for making their peace with God be passed they are not yet given over to reprobate minds. And if they are not we remark in the next place that there is a second best time pointed out for the purpose by the word now in the text. For so great is the mercy of God that though scarcely an individual among all mankind listen to the terms of reconciliation he offers at the most favourable time yet he ordinarily does not terminate their lives or withdraw his Spirit until the opportunities of repentance are granted to them. Among these remaining opportunities it is of great importance that we point out the best that is the second best in their lives.

Let us then endeavor negatively to fix upon the measuring of the word now in the text as it applies to this audience. And we shall arrive at the point soonest by a course of negative illustration.

And first when it is said, now is the accepted time, it does not mean next year or next month or next week. Were we to judge by the practice of men we must suppose that they conclude the word now to comprehend a period of time of at least a year or month or weeks duration. For they almost universally presume upon a period as long as these before they submit to God. Yet many a man has been in eternity before the set time to attend to religion has arrived - and many others have been deserted by the Spirit of God ere that period arrived and they could find no place for repentance though they seek it earnestly with tears. So long then that life is uncertain so long as the day of grace is uncertain surely the phrase now is the accepted time now is the day of salvation cannot mean next year or next month or next week.

Neither in the second place does it mean tomorrow. When men feel the importance of religion so much as to resolve to attend to it or embrace it tomorrow they flatter themselves that they are not far from the kingdom of heaven. But when they put off the subject till tomorrow they do it at their peril. God has given them no license to do it. He has given them no promise that they will not be in hell before tomorrow. Go to now ye that say today or tomorrow we shall go into such a city and continue there a year and buy and sell and get gain - whereas etc. Today if ye will hear his voice harden not your hearts.

Again by the word now again by the word now by the word now is not met the next hour. The same uncertainty of life of continuance every reason and a thing of the Spirit will apply to the next hours the next week in the next year - only there is more probability of living an hour than a year. For the shore. There is no security no promise all is uncertain.

Again by the word now is not meant the next moment. Your reason or your life or the Spirit of God may be gone before another moment and then you are lost - lost forever - given over to lie under the eternal wrath of God.

We arrive then at the meaning of the word now in the text. It is this very moment now passing. This is the accepted time - this is the day of salvation. To make our peace with God requires only that we submit to him. And this submission is merely a single act of the will - and whenever we do submit it must be done in a moment. But the present moment is the accepted one. It is the only one of which we are certain the only one of which we have any promise. The word day is indeed used in the text as the time of salvation: but it means merely during this day - that is at this moment of the day in which the offer of reconciliation is clearly made to us: for we ask if you should die before the close of this day in an unregenerate state whether you would not go to perdition and we ask as before whether you have any security of living through this day.

As before observed impenitent men have nothing to do but to submit their wills to God's terms in order to be reconciled to him. Yet there are several exercises of heart implied in the act of submission which bring up in the heart if not simultaneously yet in such rapid succession that the order of time cannot be pointed out. And it will perhaps be profitable to mention briefly as a second law of discovery the fundamental requirement God demands of the impenitent this moment.

In the first place he requires them to love him supremely. And why is not this a most reasonable requirement? Can any rational being doubt whether he is bound - whether it is for his interest - or whether it will be for his happiness to give his heart to God. Every thing in His character is supremely worthy of our love and everything in our character renders it necessary for happiness and security to fix our affections upon him. Nothing but a criminal a vile indisposition - nothing but sin prevents our loving him. And if ever we do love God this sinful indisposition must be overcome - and when is there a better time for overcoming it than this moment? Surely the next moment cannot be so favourable because that indisposition will then evidently be stronger.

In the second place God requires the unregenerate man to repent of his sins. His language on this point is strong and decisive - Except you repent ye shall all perish. God now commandeth all men every where to repent. The now commandeth not next year or next month or next week or tomorrow or the next hour or the next moment - but now this moment - the final moment when he hears of the command. And indeed it is certainly easier to repent this instant than at any future period for the heart is every instant hardening and becoming more averse to repentance.

In the third place, God requires the impenitent man to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. And with what an awful threatening is this command accompanied! We that believeth not the Son shall never see life: but the wrath of God abideth on him. And what is there to hinder every man from exercising this moment a saving faith in the Redeemer? Surely there is no want of evidence to his divine mission and no man can be so blinded as not to see that he has sins that need his atoning blood. Why then delay! The difficulties in the way are every moment accumulating - and we know not how soon they may become insuperable. We ask again what is there to hinder every unregenerate man from exercising with the next thought a saving faith in Christ? There is certainly nothing which a man would not be ashamed to produce at the bar of God. And whatever excuse will not stand the trial of that day is worse than nothing.

These are the three grand fundamental requirements God demands of every man who would be reconciled to him. And can always be completed with this moment? Yes this moment impenitent sinners if your proud heart would permit you - What love God - repent of sin and exercise saving faith in Christ in a moment! It so happens in this case that these three things are inseparably connected: so that if a man love God he inevitably repents of sin and believes in Christ. If he repent of sin after a godly manner he inevitably loves God and trusts in Christ. And if he trust in Christ he inevitably repents of sin and loves God. It is evident then that a single act of the will is all that is necessary to produce these three fundamental exercises of the Christian. Let the heart be made submissive to God and the work is done.

But doubtless nearly every unregenerate man has a thousand excuses and reasons for delay. Indeed there is probably no one who feels it to be his duty this moment to give himself up into the hands of God. He feels that he is unable to do it without the Spirit of God and this is not at his command. He hopes that ere long his influence will compel his submission - and although in general terms he acknowledges his obligations to love God yet he cannot feel as if he were bound to do it this very moment. We do not expect to convince such an one of his immediate obligations: but we think it easy to show that the controversy on the subject does not lie between him and ourselves but between him and God. For has not God decidedly commanded man to love him and repent of sin and embrace Christ by faith? Probably none will deny this: but when are they to comply with these commands. If they defer them till the next moment they may till the third and fourth moment and so on forever. And to settle this question let us suppose a not improbable case. Suppose an unregenerate man to be taken dangerously sick and to call in a physician and a clergyman. The clergyman learns from the physician that the man has not more than ten minutes to live and the sick man declares that he has no hope of heaven and anxiously enquires what he must do to be saved. Now ought that minister tell this dying man that he must repent that very moment or should he tell him that he is under no obligation that moment to love God but must wait till God please to convert him although in ten minutes his soul will be in eternity.

Testing testing

For should this man not feeling his immediate obligations to love God remain inactive waiting till an irresistible influence compelled him and should die in this state, we ask would not God punish him? Surely if he had not repented he must perish. But God would be an hard master to punish him if he did not deserve it; and he could not deserve it if it was utterly beyond his power to repent during those few moments.

It is most evident then that God has commanded unregenerate men to love him this moment. Whoever therefore doubts this enters into a quarrel not with me but with God. In his hands I do not fear to leave him: for when man strives against the omnipotent God we know who must be conqueror.

The first remark I have to make in view of the subject we have been considering is that had an angel from heaven who knew nothing of man except that he was called a rational and immortal being had such an one been presently and merely hear the text knowing it to be the word of God, he would conclude that every person who sat down in the audience in an unregenerate state to hear this discourse would ere the close of it give his heart to God and rise a new creature. He could not suppose it possible that any reasonable being with think it not his duty and highest intent to love God the very first moment God commanded him.

But in the second place the remark the Christian would make in view of this subject is that probably not one impenitent man has submitted to God in this house this afternoon. And why would he draw so unfavourable a conclusion? Because he knows that, the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil and madness is in their heart while they live. And that the natural man scorneth not the things of the Spirit of God etc.

Yet in the third place if any of you my dear hearers do neglect to submit to God this moment you do it at your peril. You are certainly tempting God who has said behold now. And if you by this neglect provoke him to abandon you, your blood will be upon your own head. If you are not prepared to trust in a Saviour today probably you will be less prepared tomorrow and it is to be feared that you will never be ready. You may say this is urging you too closely. But it is not urging you harder than the word of God urges. Time too urges us now – death urges us now - and the wrath of God after death will urge a thousand times harder. Amen

Sermon 91 Marks of Friendship for the World

[Sermon No. 91, "Marks of Friendship for the World," James 4:4, 1822 Jan,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 1]

James 4:4

Whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God.

This is an alarming declaration and mere men faithful in applying it it would prove a caustic to eat away many of those strong cords by which they are fastened to the world. For did we realize believe that we were friends of the world in the scriptural sense and had us even a faint conception of what it is to be enemies to an omnipotent God we could no more rest easy than he, who, though lying on a silken couch surrounded by all the riches and pomp of eastern splendor, looked up and saw a glittering sword suspended over his head by a single hair. How important then for us to know whether we be indeed friends of the world - that we may thereby determine whether we are the friends or enemies of God. To this point my hearers we invite your attention in this discourse. Let us be faithful in this enquiry and if we are so we shall probably be able to determine whether our hearts have within them a friendship for our Father in heaven or an enmity towards him. Comparing ourselves with some other parts of scripture where some evidences of man's native hostility to God are pointed out we may perhaps be in doubt in regard to our opportunities to God but here we have a marker probably the plainest in the whole scriptures. A mark too that will doubtless surprise many a worldly minded man who does not suspect that his eager pursuit of the world furnishes any proof of enmity to God - a Being who is very rarely in his thoughts and toward whom therefore he feels no peculiar aversion.

The apostle James in the verse containing the text is addressing worldly minded professors of religion. Ye adulterers and adulteresses, says he, know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? By adulterers and adulteresses he doubtless means those who are such in a spiritual sense - a mode of expression not uncommon in the bible especially in the prophets. The Jews to whom the apostle writes were the professed friends of God: but they idolize worldly interests and pleasures and therefore were guilty of the grossest spiritual adultery. The text is the conclusion James draws from the position he has laid down, Whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God and what is of universal application it leads us to enquire do we idolize worldly riches or honors or pleasures? Let us compare our the tenor of our conduct and thoughts and feelings with those of one who is really a friend of the world and therefore an enemy of God.

It may be important however to state previously some things that are not inconsistent with being a friend of the world although at first thought we might suppose them to be so.

A man then may be a friend of the world in a scriptural sense who is disgusted with it. He may be placed in such circumstances that the world has lost its charms and he is satisfied that he shall never enjoy much happiness in it. But if such a man's affections are not transferred to religious objects he may still be the friend of the world. He may approve of the general practice and feelings of worldly men and he will probably find that the feelings he now possesses will soon be succeeded by an evident attachment to the world in some shape or other.

Again a man may be a friend of the world although that world treats him with neglect and oppresses him and although he haven't a single friend on earth. He may be poor and despised with scarce a place to lay his head and he may feel as if the world were a dreary and a tiresome place and still his feelings in regard to the most important of all concerns religion may be perfectly arguable to the feelings of unrenowned men generally and therefore in a scriptural sense he is their friend. All his poverty and trials may not have led him to embrace a Saviour and until this is the case although he may conceive himself hated cruelly by many of his brethren yet he is in friendly league with them and the Prince of darkness in opposing religion.

We remark too in this place that the man who has abandoned the friendship of the world for the friendship of God does not therefore cease to love his neighbor as himself. He is still a friend of the world but not a friend of the world. He is a friend to the souls of impenitent men: but not to their worldly habits and feelings. And this remark leads us to the true meaning of the phrase friend of the world. It implies that we approve and practice in most respects what the world does and that we neglect religion as they do – or that we are occupied supremely in seeking as they are the riches or honors or pleasures of the world. In other words it means that we prefer the world to God.

But what are the particular evidences that show us to be the friends of the world? To some of these let us attend. And it is evident from the experience of all men that for whatever object we have a friendship we shall manifest our attachment either by our actions or words or feelings or thoughts. Although a man may be compelled to be employed much about the world and converse much upon it and have his thoughts and feelings much engaged in it while he has a supreme attachment to God - and most persons are in fact so situated that they must necessarily attend much to the concerns of this life in order to provide things honest in the sight of all men: yet if they have a higher attachment to religion they will find their thoughts and feelings to run more readily towards the things of religion than the things of time and sense - even when their hands are employed in worldly avocations. So that in order to ascertain whether we are friends to the world we must compare our thoughts actions and feelings in regard to it with our thoughts actions and feelings in regard to religion.

And now my hearers we can all of us recollect in the main what we have been doing for a course of years. Does the tenor of our conduct then appear as if we had been more attached to the world than to the cause of religion? Have we are have we not pursued the riches or honors or pleasures of time and sense so ardently and exclusively as to leave little or no time for performing religious duties? We have probably by our conduct made it manifest to our fellow man that we took an interest in the worldly affairs we were engaged in: have we made it equally evident to them that we took a higher interest in religion? We have done probably almost as much as in our power to increase our property or learning or to the present ourselves and families from coming to want. Have we made as great exertions to increase in love to God and all the Christian graces are to prevent our souls and the souls of our families from perishing with a spiritual famine? Have we been as persevering and constant in praying to God and in observing all his institutions as in our worldly business? We have taught our children and dependants habits of industry and honesty between man and man - and have we set them as good an example in regard to prayer and have we taught them as faithfully to perform this duty and to be sincere and honest towards God as well as men? We have been cautious no doubt not to do anything that would diminish our property or reputation - and have we been as cautious to avoid those temptations by which our religious feelings would be diminished? We have been careful in looking over the accounts between ourselves and our neighbors: have we been as careful and faithful in looking into the much longer account between our souls and our God? My hearers there can be little difficulty in deciding from the answer conscience gives to such enquiries as these whether we have loved the world more than we have loved God. And if we have loved the world most we have not loved God at all: for he that is not for us says Christ is against us. No man can serve two masters - for either he will hate the one and love the other; or else he will hold to the one and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon.

Let us in the next place cordially candidly look back upon our world for a course of years. We can doubtless reflect reflect the general tenor of our conversation. We have all talked much no doubt upon our worldly concerns: and right was it that he should: but the question now is whether we have conversed more voluntarily upon the affairs of earth than those of eternity. Have we made it evident that we love religion more than we love the world? Have our nearest friends - our children and domestics - our husbands and wives been led to conclude from our religious conversation that we took a deeper interest in it than in worldly discourse? At those times and in those social circles where it was at our option to have the world or religion the topic of discourse which have we preferred? I do not ask whether we have not sometimes likened to speculate and dispute upon religion but have we loved that friend of conversation of which came directly to the heart and tended to make us look into our own bosoms? We have doubtless been fervent and engaged when our worldly rights were invested or when our worldly interests demanded: but have we been equally ready to maintain the rights of God as our Redeemer? Have we said as much against irreligious customs and habits and feelings of the world as we have said against vital godliness? Have we said as much to urge our friends and neighbors our children and domestics to attend to the concerns of their souls as we have said to induce them to make a respectable and honorable appearance among men? Conscience will give an answer my hearers to these questions and that answer will probably enable us to decide whether we have loved the world or God and whether it has been, by our own words we shall be justified or by our own words we shall be condemned.

In the third place what has been the tenor of our thoughts for a course of years? Most men are necessarily employed in worldly pursuits a great part of their time: but if their affections are supremely fixed upon another object their thoughts will not always be confined where their bodies are nor upon the pursuits of their hands. David meditated much upon the law of God because he loved it supremely - and so the man who loves the world supremely will meditate upon it much and upon the truths of the bible but little are our thoughts then involuntarily turned to the subject of religion and dwelt upon them when we were engaged in the affairs of this life? Or have they generally been occupied upon worldly plans or pleasures? When we lie down at night upon our pillows and when we awake in the morning are our reflections usually upon God and Christ and heaven and hell - our own hearts and the means of promoting the Redeemer's kingdom or are they upon the world - upon its riches or honors or pleasures? I do not ask whether we may not have had religious reflections at particular seasons of life as in adversity (are during a revival of religion) but has the general course of thought with us been religious or worldly? For our thoughts will run where our affections are placed and if they are placed on religion the thoughts will incline to religion: but if these fixed supremely on the world these will fasten upon the world. Where the treasure is there will the heart be also. We ask then again my hearers and we ask it with emphasis because we believe you may hereby decide whether you are the friend of God or of the world, we ask where have your thoughts been most naturally - into the channels of the world are into the channels of religion? Which seems most natural for you to reflect upon - the world or upon God and eternity?

In the fourth place let us make some enquiry concerning the usual state of our feelings. And here we may enquire properly what has been the motive of our conduct generally? We have perhaps been engaged in worldly pursuits considerably - and now did we usually stop at the beginning of every enterprise and enquire whether we could promote that for God's glory? Or did we feel pleasure in reflecting upon the personal gratification we should experience from its successful accomplishment. Have we felt a desire to become rich and that we might promote the cause of Christ more extensively and if we should become more eminent in society have we felt a desire to throw the additional weight of our influence into the scale that would favor religion? Which has caused us the most anxious feelings our worldly concerns or the concerns of our souls? Which has caused us the most sleepless hours the fear of failing in the acquisition of wealth fame and pleasure or the fear of failing finally of heaven? Which has produced within us the greatest anxiety and regret to meet with losses in our own temporal affairs or to see the cause of Christ declining? We have often heard religious conversations - has this afforded us more pleasure than conversation about the farm the money and the merchandise? Do we feel more animated and better pleased to converse upon practical religion with a devoted Christian than upon our worldly possessions with a man of business? In which kind of conversation would a stranger conclude us more interested? Do we take more pleasure in reflecting upon our property - or our reputation - or our anticipated sensual pleasures that upon the subjects of eternity? Which do we feel most willing to neglect our prayers are reading of the or our plans for growing rich and reputable? Which day of the seven is most pleasant to us the Sabbath or a weekday? On which of them do we feel most animated? To which are we most likely to be drawn by our own feelings - to a prayer meeting a (religious assembly or to a pleasure party) or a visiting party? Do we feel more interested that our children if we have any shall make a respectable figure in the world than that they shall obtain religion? Are we more prone to notice and remark upon a man's conduct if he neglects his worldly affairs than if he neglects religion? Do we feel more rejoiced at the increase of the Redeemer's kingdom among men than at the increase of our worldly treasures? Do we at times feel as great anxiety for the conversion of our children and friends and neighbors as we should for their rescue if we saw them asleep in a burning building? Do we take more pleasure in secret devotions than in reflecting in secret upon our plans of a worldly nature?

Now my hearers, if we put it to our consciences to answer all these questions relating to the general tenor of our current conduct our words and our thoughts and our feelings as in the fear of God and in view of his final judgment can there be any difficulty in deciding whether we are the friends of the world? We must forget whatever professions we have made to the contrary - we must be honest and sincere to know the extent truth on the subject - and it would seem we could not mistake whether we love the world or not.

And what if any of us are compelled to acknowledge (as there is every reason to fear very many of us ought to acknowledge) that we do love and have long loved the world - what is the conclusion? The apostle has drawn it - whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world is the etc. A dreadful conclusion! An enemy of God! An enemy of that Being in whose hands is our breath - who guides the lightning and rolls the thunder of heaven - before whom the nations are driven asunder the everlasting mountains are scattered and the perpetual hills do bow - an enemy to that omnipotent God who is angry with the wicked every day and who has prepared an eternal press where in his fierceness and wrath he will tread them down forever and ever.

But we have no time to draw out the frightful picture. We could describe to you the contest of man with man or of an inert weakness a lion's strength but we cannot describe the combat of man with his God. We can only say, let the potsherd strive with the potsherd of the earth: but woe unto him that striveth with his Maker. We cannot dismiss the subject without a few inferences.

And in the first place we see how very possible it is for a person who is amiable and upright among men and strictly moral to be nevertheless an enemy of God. Such an one may love the world - he may be the friend of the world and yet not have God in all his thoughts. His whole soul may be fixed upon the riches or honors or pleasures of time and sense and therefore in despite of all his amiableness in despite of his honesty and uprightness and feelings of honor he is an enemy of God. The proof of his enmity lies not in any positive opposition to God but simply in the fact that he is a friend of the world - and if the world of our text be true this is sufficient proof.

In the second place we learn from the subject why so many such persons find a difficulty in realizing and believing that they are the enemies of God. Such men (when charged with enmity to God) say that they do not feel within them any thing like an opposing spirit. They are not sensible of any hostility to God's character or laws. And the reason is they cannot conceive that enmity would exist within them unless it manifest itself by positive acts of rebellion. They expect if it be true that they shall feel their hearts rising against God with the most willful opposition. Whereas if the text be the truth they have only to enquire of themselves whether they are friends of the world and if they find that they are the bible declares them enemies of God. They may not feel any hostility within their bosom so long as God does not disturb their consciences as they do not trouble themselves to enquire about God - but if they love the world supremely their dispositions their thoughts and actions are in fact directly opposed to his will (for that which is highly appraised among men appraised among men is an abomination in the sight of God) and what can this be but enmity. We believe many moral and amiable man do feel it be an unjust and false charge upon them to call them enemies of God: but we apprehend if they will only attend to the proof of it God has given in the text they can no longer be in doubt.

And now my hearers what if the man seen by Ezekiel in vision clothed in linen and with an inkhorn by his side were commanded by God to go through this audience as he went through the midst of Jerusalem and to set a mark upon the forehead of every one of us who are the friends of the world! What if he were to stamp upon such living characters the inscription, an enemy of God! What blushing! What hiding of face should we witness! For there is every reason to fear my hearers that many of us are the friends of the world and therefore enemies of God. And if we are his enemies we cannot be happy without a change of heart. God never will submit to us and we must submit to him. Today the bow of mercy shines in heaven and the sword of salvation proclaims peace through a Saviour's blood. Tomorrow you may see the bloody flag rising on the portals of heaven. Tomorrow the storm of almighty wrath may be gathering in the skies - and on the third day of it may burst. And when you find the earth falling under your feet the burning vengeance of an angry Jehovah sweeping you down to the bottomless pit, closing upon you its iron gate forever and ever, then will you know what it is to be a friend of the world and an enemy of God.

Sermon 92 Characters Who Will Finally Perish

[Sermon No. 92, "Characters Who Will Finally Perish," Isaiah 33:14, 1822 Feb,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 1]

Isaiah 33:14

*Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire?
Who among us shall dwell with the everlasting burnings?*

[Very dramatic final paragraph: "Lord, Is it I?"]

Are these enquiries my hearers directed to us in this house? Yes - as much as to any other members of the human family. But can it be that there are any in this house whose fate will be thus awful? Yes there is every probability that some of us in this assembly when we lift up our eyes in hell being in torments shall recollect this day and this text - only to aggravate that devouring fire and those everlasting burnings. For certain it is if the bible be true that a part of mankind will go away into everlasting misery and we have never yet heard of that parish or town in which there were not many whose lives gave decisive evidence that they were not prepared for heaven and therefore must have gone to perdition. Nay we have never yet heard of a parish or town in which there was not a majority who would not themselves acknowledge that they have no gospel hope of happiness beyond the grave. And there is reason to conclude that where the Lord Jesus Christ to enter this assembly and enquire of every one of us whether we have been born again the majority of us should answer no. But except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God. And we know that if a man does not enter the kingdom of God at death he must enter the kingdom of darkness. Should our souls then be required of us now there is every reason to fear that a large proportion of us who are in this house would be the individuals who are to dwell with the devouring fire and the everlasting burnings. We know not indeed but God may convert many of this majority before we are actually called out of time into eternity and would to God all might be saved! But it is an undoubted fact that the majority of men on their deathbeds manifest no good evidence of regeneration - very few indeed in that trying hour remain unalarmed - but it is one thing to be alarmed and quite another to be converted. And if a majority of men in past generations have died probably the enemies of God - there can be little doubt but a majority of the present generation will die in the like awful condition.

If then the scriptures and experience render it certain that some of our souls will perish forever nay that some in every parish in every neighborhood and I might almost say in every family are of this number it becomes a most important and interesting enquiry - who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with the everlasting burnings? Who are the individuals in this place that will hereafter be cast into outer darkness? Is it you or is it I? My hearers, it is not from me to assume the prerogative of Jehovah to judge the heart and to set the mark upon this or that person as those who are given over to eternal destruction. But it is my duty because the scriptures have done it to exhibit as plainly as possible to the marks which he who is a candidate for external misery carries about him. For the truth is that in most cases the sacred writers have described the character of the men who will dwell with everlasting burnings as plainly as it is possible for language to express. And the reason why so many of those who are ripe for destruction do not know it is not because it is a hard matter to determine that they are enemies of God because their understandings are darkened being alienated from the life of God and they will not faithfully compare themselves with the scriptures.

What then are the marks by which a man may know assuredly that unless his character be changed he must be trodden down in the wine press of the fierceness and wrath of the Almighty God? These marks although essentially alike in all are modified in different individuals. We shall endeavor to point out the most prominent of them.

We might (in this place proceed) to state that the man who does not love God supremely and his neighbor as himself – who has never been regenerated and who does not repent of his sins is under eternal condemnation and must sink forever into misery if he remains unchanged. But this would be too too general a statement for my present purpose. I prefer to set before you some of those unequivocal indicators that evince men not to love God nor to have a new heart nor to repent.

And in the first place one mark a candidate for everlasting burnings often bears about him is an indulgence in habitual known sin.

Need I repeat my fears that he who is an adulterer - he who is a fornicator - he who is unclean - he who is lascivious - he who is effeminate - he who is an adulterer – a Sodomite - a covetous person - a thief - an extortioner - a drunkard – a reviler - that he is envious of others - he who indulges natural hatred towards his brother - or a spirit of unholy emulation and discord - a spirit of wrath and strife and heresy in the church – that he who practices unreasonable and immoderate surfeiting and revelling - that all such cannot inherit the kingdom of God? When we see men given over habitually to these palpable violations of the law of God we are all ready to pronounce of them that they are fitted for hell and must go there except they repent. They bear the marks of reprobation on their foreheads as distinctly as did Cain. And yet such is the infatuation and madness of the human heart that very many who practice daily some one or more of these sins and who profess to believe and read the bible live along totally fearless and careless about their eternal destiny.

A second mark of a heart prepared for the devouring fire is a spirit of unbelief. Were we to reason on the subject we should conclude beforehand that if Satan were ripening a man for eternal ruin he would fill him with a dark and deep rooted scepticism. For were the sinner really to believe in the great doctrines and declarations of the scriptures he could not but perceive that he lay under condemnation and was an enemy of God. And the man who really and distinctly perceives this to be his condition could not rest easy a single moment but would be in the greatest anxiety and distress until he was reconciled to God. But disbelief affords an admirable remedy for laying asleep the conscience and passing quietly on onwards to hell. And accordingly we find in many places of scripture that unbelief is one of the decisive evidences that men are to dwell with the cleansing fire and everlasting burnings. And scepticism is not like many sensual indulgences which are apt to cloy and leave the disgusted sinner time for reflection: but it grows with our growth and strengthens with our strength so that all of all descriptions of sin it is the least likely to be eradicated. And therefore habitual unbelief in the reality of fundamental doctrines of religion is the most decisive marks of a mind prepared for eternal torments. And from the scriptures we find the unbeliever and the hypocrite will have their bed together in hell.

A third mark showing that he who wears it is preparing for everlasting burnings is to have a form of godliness and to deny the power thereof. There have been not infrequent instances in Christian lands of those who would give their most hearty assent to every truth and every precept of revelation and who would profess to have been born again and to take a deep interest in religion and to be zealous in its promotion who nevertheless manifested by their conduct that they had neither part nor lot in the matter. They profess that they know God but in works they deny him, being abominable and disobedient and unto every good works reprobate. They have that kind of faith which exhibits no works - they say unto Christ Lord Lord but keep not his commandments. And there are others of this clan who observe a strict morality and attend perpetually to all the external duties and ordinances of the Gospel but who nevertheless deny that a man must be born again of water and the Spirit in order to enter heaven - and do not believe that Christ died for our sins - that is they deny his atonement and yet these professors hope soon to enter heaven. But this having the form of godliness while its power is denied is one of the most certain evidences a man can exhibit that he is a candidate for the devouring fire and the everlasting burnings. For rarely very rarely are such persons on undeceived and converted. Satan has drawn them into such a snare and wound around them so many cords that little short of a miracle is necessary to deliver them. When they say peace and safety then sudden destruction cometh upon them and they have not escaped.

And my hearers if there be any among us who bear those marks upon their foreheads it is by no means probable one of them will suppose that he belongs to the number of those who are to feel the devouring fire gnawing them in eternity. Neither is it probable that if there be any of us indulging such a spirit of unbelief as we have described as a mark of reprobation neither is it probable that such will feel that they are aimed at in the text. For most men have an idea that they have a full faith in all that is essential to their salvation. Nor is it likely that one of that one of us supposes that he indulges in such a course of open sin as on this account to be presented heaven. For men whose habits of transgression are not outrageously enormous are generally ignorant that things have such habits - and it is no infrequent case to hear a confirmed slanderer reprobating and evil speaking of an established drunkard or condemning intemperance. And as for those who are so far gone in open sin that even themselves cannot be ignorant of it, they are rarely if ever to be seen within the house of God. Some other marks therefore less difficult of application than those we have given above seem to be required. And we have two such marks at hand which are easy of application. We say then that the man who has gone through many scenes of deep affliction without being thereby led to embrace a Saviour without becoming religious has the utmost reason to conclude that he is one of those who are to dwell with the devouring fire and the everlasting burnings. For no other means under heaven are probably so powerful so calculated to produce convictions as those severe trials and separations of earthly friends by death which at once make tender the heart and show us the vanity of every earthly prop. And if at such a season our thoughts are not led to religion - if we do not then actually arise and enquire with the deepest earnestness what we must do to be saved, if in short our afflictions do not prove the means of our real conversion to God (and works out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory - certainly if a repetition of these afflictions do not produce this effect) there is evidently great reason to conclude that nothing else on earth will awaken us and that we are hardening and hardening for enduring the everlasting wrath of God. For again we ask what other thing is there on earth so likely to answer us as deep and repeated afflictions? God in sovereign mercy may indeed after all interpose by his Spirit and reach our learned consciences - but rarely does he thus interfere and alas facts show that such men usually pass on through life without God and without hope and die ripe for destruction.

The next mark we shall mention which is to be found will show many of us even in this place to be preparing to dwell with everlasting burnings is an unconcern and stupidity concerning our condition even when we know that we are unprepared for heaven. Of all the viles practised by the great adversary for deluding men to distraction this is the most effectual and certain. He knows that when men are once alarmed at their awful condition they will make every effort in their power to escape the flames of hell and he knows that very many who have been awakened have been brought to embrace religion. He therefore exerts all his energies to keep them in stupidity – and to hide then their situation from their view. He tries to lull asleep the voice of conscience and endeavors to divert their attention from their danger by spreading a brighter charm over the world by covering up the pit of hell and he conceals the glories of heaven from their view. He often persuades them to avoid religious meetings on the Sabbath and at other times and continues to turn their attention from the matter to the manner of the preacher and to dispose them to reflect upon the faults of his performance rather than upon those truths he has uttered with utterly condemn them. And so long as Satan can keep up this delusion and prevent men from being alarmed at their condition he has no fears that they will be plucked out of his hands. If he can lull them asleep and if he can prolong that sleep he has nothing to fear. While they slumber he can and he does entangle them more and more in his charms and rivet them forever and forever upon the miserable victims. While thus asleep he does not fear that the most alarming providences or the most awakening sermons will have any effect upon them - and while in a state of unconcern Satan himself knows that they have upon them the marks of his subjects and unless they are aroused he knows that he is sure of having them home for his companions in the everlasting burnings.

My hearers do look at this solemn subject again. There is a man who knows not but his truth may be stopped the next moment and who knows that he has never had a change of heart and is therefore unprepared to go to heaven and yet his awful condition does not alarm him. He can read his eternal doom in the scriptures with the utmost unconcern. He can hear the joys and glories of heaven described from the pulpit without any regret that he must lose them. He can have all the terrors of hell laid open before him - he can be told to look into the bottomless pit and see the smoke of his torments ascending up forever and ever - he can be shown the very bed in hell which he is doomed to occupy he can see the worm that is to gnaw him there and he can see the devouring fire flashing in his face and yet by all this be unmarked and unaffected. Nay in a single moment his thoughts can be diverted from this tremendous picture and be wholly occupied by this paltry world.

And now my brethren if such a man does not carry upon his forehead the marks reprobation - if he does not by the stupidity and neglect of religion give evidence that he is one of those who will hereafter lift up their eyes in hell being in torments - if he does not show that he is fully bent upon destruction we know of no evidence that can show it.

Certainly while he continues thus stupid and careless we have every reason to conclude that he will dwell with the devouring fire and the everlasting burnings - and not the shadow of any evidence to the contrary – (And doubly forcible is this conclusion if a man who knows that he is not prepared for death and eternity remains unawakened and anxious during a revival of religion-). The most abandoned of men the most openly corrupt do not exhibit any more decisive marks than such a man of being a candidate for eternal destruction. If God were to set his seal upon any of our race as given over to everlasting burnings we should presume that he would have them in precisely the condition in which we find the stupid the carelessly unconcerned sinner until we see such awakened therefore we have awful reason to conclude and to fear that they are thus abandoned of God and that they will weep and wail and gnash their teeth forever and ever.

To conclude this discourse let us make in a supposition.

Let it be supposed that a foreign enemy powerful and bloody makes war upon us and our national government sends into this place demanding then able bodied men to be detached to go forth to meet the enemy and that a bloody battle is soon expected and these men are to be placed in the forefront of it. How tremblingly anxious should we all be to know who were the individuals selected to the dangerous enterprise!

But suppose instead of ten men that an hundred were demanded. What anxiety and distress would pervade every bosom until the selection was made and how many tears would be wept over the victims taken.

And yet my hearers if it be true as stated in the beginning of this discourse that (a large proportion) the majority of men in every place of religious society die without hope then is it in fact true that there are not merely ten or an hundred but several hundreds of us in this place whom the Prince of darkness has already selected for dwelling with the devouring fire and the everlasting burnings. And although we know not the individuals yet God knows them all. He knows who of us will die without religion. He knows that a great multitude will die without religion. But although so many of us are soon to be cast into outer darkness yet how little conversation does it excite among us to know who these persons are - and how little anxiety for their fate. How much greater interest would be felt by the drafting of ten men for the army than by the drafting of hundreds for hell! Yet the day is coming when we shall hear the judge who makes the selection call them all by their names. And who is this that is called first? Ah it is a neighbor. Who comes next? It is an intimate friend. Who next? A wife - next? a husband? Who next? A father! Who next a mother! Who next a brother! Who next! A sister! Who next! A child! Who next! Lord is it I?

Sermon 94 Why a Revival Ceases

[Sermon No. 94, "Why a Revival Ceases," Nehemiah 6:3, 1822 Mar,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 1]

Nehemiah 6:3

Why should the work cease?

For several months (Sabbaths) I have chiefly directed my Sabbath discourses to those who are living without God and without hope. I have endeavored to hold up a plain and faithful exhibition of their situation. I have not disguised from them that their danger is imminent and have most earnestly solemnly and repeatedly announced to them that except they repent they must perish except they be born again they cannot see the kingdom of God. To alarm them to a sense of their desperate condition and the necessity of immediate escape from it I have striven to lay open heaven and hell: to hold up before them on the one hand the fruit of the tree of life and on the other hand the dreary abyss of damnation. These great truths and motives I have presented again and again before the impenitent but alas! It is to be feared that they begin to fall on their ears as an idle tale and that they do not reach the heart or the conscience. Solemn and tremendous as are these truths I have reason to fear that they are unproductive of any permanent influence upon the aggregate among us except to harden their hearts and that they are regarded as the ravings of a heated imagination and a deluded heart rather than the sober truths of God's word. This day therefore Christian brethren turn to you - and I have no address to make to the impenitent - not because I realize their condition to be less dangerous - not because I do not feel an earnest desire that all such may be saved - but because I have not the faith to believe that I can present any stronger motives before them than I have already presented and because I fear the Spirit of God given and resisted so long cannot consistently with the perfections of God accompany to the hearts the preaching of the Gospel. Under a view thus disheartening Christian brethren I turn to you. Your prayers and exertions are the last hope. Of you I enquire, Why should the work cease? Why should that work of God which he has been manifesting for a considerable time among us in snatching sinners out of the horrible pit and the misery day, why should this work cease and the Spirit of God that only comforts under heaven - depart from us - leaving us to follow on in our chosen way - leaving us to return from the enjoyment of religion to the beggarly elements of the world desiring again to be in bondage like the dog to his vomit - like the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire!

But previously to entering upon a reply to this enquiry a few words are necessary to explain the text. During the time in which the Jews were captive in Babylon Jerusalem was suffered to go to ruin - and the Lord purposing to rebuild it and thus prepare the way for a glorious reformation of manners and habits stirred up his devoted steward Nehemiah to fasting and prayer and at length at the command of the Chaldean monarch came to Jerusalem and began to rebuild its walls. But there he found powerful enemies among whom Sanballat Tobiah and Geshem were leaders. These at first scoffed at the idea that Nehemiah should be able to accomplish so great a work with such feeble means. But seeing it go forward prosperously they endeavored openly to drive the workmen from the walls. Being frustrated in this attempt they have recourse to stratagem - and writing several letters to Nehemiah invited him to a friendly conference on the plain of Ono having placed a party in ambush to murder him by the way.

Nehemiah however replied to them saying, I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down: why should the work cease whilst I leave it and come down to you? This work was the rebuilding and repairing of the walls of the city of Jerusalem. Now as the church is frequently called Jerusalem in scripture we may by an easy transition apply these words of Nehemiah to the work of God in His plan for building up Zion.

And in the first place if this work does cease it will not be because God is unwilling to continue it.

What is the will of God in regard to man's salvation? The scriptures declare that, He is not willing any should perish but that all should come to repentance. It may be said however that although God is willing all men should come to repentance yet when they have long abused his grace and resisted his Spirit his further demands that his Spirit be withdrawn from them and they be left to harden themselves in sin. This however is attempting to pry into the secret councils of God: but his revealed will is that by which we ought to be governed. The secret things, says Moses, belong to the Lord our God; but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children. Now it is the revealed will of God that all men every where be commanded to repent - we are therefore to urge this command upon all men and not secretly presume that they are given over to reprobate minds. It is the revealed will of God that the Holy Spirit shall be given to them that ask it - and unless God be a liar he will fulfill this promise. Christians are told that if they will ask they shall receive - if they will seek they shall find - and certainly if God gives over the impenitent to sin he will not neglect his own elect who cry day and night unto him and surely there is no need of his works of revival terminating among them if it cease among others. Indeed it is a scriptural doctrine plainly falling from the promises above alluded to that God never would leave his work of grace in any place were his children faithful on their part in cherishing the influences of the Spirit and in their duty to others. We doubt whether he would ever cease to convict and convert unregenerate men so long as any such remain - be it if it be supposed in any case that such might be abandoned to reprobation certainly he would carry on his works in the hearts of his children even to the end of the world. Nay do we not see instances of this around us? That some churches are more devoted and engaged in religion than others cannot be denied - and we shall all allow that it is the Spirit of God who maketh them to differ. Why then may not these churches most awake in the service of God be said to experience a constant revival? Indeed my brethren the declaration of God to Asa is strictly true in regard to all his children - The Lord is with you while you be with him; and if you seek him he will be found of you: but if ye forsake him he will forsake you. It is not the will of God that his work among us should cease and so many be left to destruction: As I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live. Turn ye turn ye for why will you die O house of Israel?

In the second place if this work ceases it will not be because there are no more souls among us who need its converting or sanctifying influences.

Are there none among us who profess religion who demand a continuance of the special influences of the Spirit to keep them from an undue conformity to the world? Are we all of us even in times of religious delusion faithful to our closets and to our compassions and piety? (If there be no others among us I can testify that there is one who lives so far from God even in this time of revival and who remembers how much farther in times of stupidity he did live from Him that he looks forward with anxious distress to that period and earnestly hopes it may never come when these gracious influences that are now showered down upon us shall be withdrawn and he shall be left to hardness of heart and again to desire to feed upon the husks of this world in preference to their spiritual manna from heaven.

And are there no more souls among us my brethren who need conversion? Are there none here who have no hope in Christ and who have withstood hitherto all the motives presented before them and all the strivings of the Spirit during this revival yet remain as unconcerned and have become more hardened than ever? Are there none who feel the importance of religion but who are still halting between two opinions and from whom the Spirit of God is insensibly withdrawing? Can anyone doubt the fact that there are many very many who are permitting this work to pass by without sharing in it? Come then and let us approach at a distance a dwelling in which reside Christian parents. It is midnight and as we listen at their door is it the voice of mirth and reveling that we here? Or is it the voice of prayer? It is prayer - that father and that mother now that their family have retired to bed are kneeling together and breathing out their earnest supplications to Almighty God for their unregenerate child a member of this institution who remains unanxious and stupid in this day of God's power. O with what fervency do they implore that an arrow of conviction may reach the heart of that impenitent son (or daughter) before this (term) work shall cease! How do the tears of anxiety and distress trickle down their cheeks as they (reflect again) implore mercy again and again for their offspring and feel as if they could not give over their wrestling without a blessing! (And yet the eye of God we trust sees daily many such prayers as this in this town. And with that they were multiplied – then might we still hope that this work would not cease.)

God will not withdraw his Spirit because he is unwilling to continue longer his work nor because he does not see any more souls and to revive or convert among us. Why then should the work cease? If it does cease the fault must certainly lie with ourselves Christian brethren. And yet it would seem scarcely possible if God were waiting to convert souls among us and nothing were wanting but our faithfulness one would suppose it impossible he could remain insensible when such momentous consequences are dependant. But alas! Although the Spirit is willing we fear the flesh is weak.

Permit me then in the final place to enquire whether this work must cease because Christian professors are beginning to neglect secret special prayer?

If it be the fact that we are less frequent in our closets and less earnest in our entreaties for sinners depend upon it brethren the work is about to cease: for God will be enquired of to do this for us. The exact state of a revival of religion may be estimated by the frequency and fervency of believers prayers. Why should God continue to convert souls when his children will not use the means of their conversion? And why should the Christian relax in his prayers when God answers them almost as soon as made? Whether it be the fact that fewer and less fervent prayers are just put up by this church and others who love the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ is not my brethren for me to say. But we can each one of us answer the enquiry to God – and if our closets do witness against us, O there must be a reformation.

I enquire in the second place whether this work must cease because Christians begin to lose their anxiety for the impenitent?

If the Spirit of God be withdrawing they will assuredly find themselves less solicitous about their unrenewed friends. And yet at such a time how much greater cause have they for anxiety and distress on their account! If they have lived through a revival unaffected how much harder have their hearts become! How much more powerful an influence from the Spirit is necessary to arouse them now than in the beginning of the work! How alienated are their feelings from all who have been active in the service of Christ and how disgusted with experimental piety! And how much less is the probability that they will ever become reconciled to God! Can it be then that any of you my brethren should not find within you an increasing instead of a decreasing anxiety for the impenitent?

In the third place I enquire whether this work must cease because Christ Christians have not faith in the power and willingness of God to convert greater number of souls?

What cause have we my brethren for increased faith in the readiness of God to carry on his work when he has performed such wonders among us notwithstanding our extreme unworthiness for such mercies! Yet how prone are we I know not from what cause to distrust such a merciful and forbearing and somber working God! And probably it is not among the least of our sins that we are faithless and unbelieving! And if it be indeed true as it often is the case that in proportion to the evidence we have had of God's willingness to carry on the work we find our faith in him to decrease it is an alarming evidence that the work is about to cease - Lord increase our faith - Lord we believe; help thou our unbelief.

I enquire in the fourth place whether this work must cease because our communion seasons have been kept so on unworthily?

Have we been faithful at such times to enter into a deep and thorough searching of heart? Have we seen more of an opposition to holiness than on other occasions - have we felt more hatred of sin - and more ingenuous sorrow for it when we saw the emblems of a crucified Redeemer set before us - have we gone from these communion seasons with new resolutions - with a renewed covenant with God and feeling new courage to encounter the enemies of our souls? Have we felt at those seasons more deeply than at any other how dreadful was the condition of the impenitent and have we had more earnest longings for their salvation? If such feelings as these have not possessed our hearts in an eminent degree during this work of God among us does it not furnish alarming evidence that the work must cease - unless indeed we resolve that this day by the grace of God shall see us come around the communion board more humble more prayerful more penitent than ever yet we have done. The Great Searcher of hearts knows our resolutions and may he give us grace thus to act and instead of ceasing may this day and the work of God revive anew!

In the fifth (fourth) place I enquire whether the work must cease because Christians are becoming tired of it?

It is a melancholy fact that such is sometimes the case. Nor is it more difficult to account for than the wish of the children of Israel to return to Egypt - to submit again to civil bondage could they but the fish and cucumbers the melons and leeks - the onions and the garlick - of that country. Although God led them by a constant miracle and fed them with manna - yet they preferred the bondage and ignominy of Egypt - rather than undergo the self denial of the wilderness. So the Christian during a revival of religion is fed with manna from heaven: and enjoys a peculiar presence of God and peculiarly bright evidences of eternal glory - yet it is a season of self denial and he remembers with fondness those unleashed pleasures of the world of which he is now deprived and charged to tell he often prefers to abandon his God and his communion and without those comforts he derives from a life of conformity to God for the fleeting purposes and unsatisfying pleasures of the world. It was a deep note depravity that caused the Israelites to wish to return to Egypt. It is a deep rooted depravity - a vile attachment to sensual indulgences that induces the professed Christian to wish himself free from serving God so constantly and fervently. And when this feeling prevails in a church it is an awful evidence that God will leave them to their chosen way. And it is a serious question whether he will not swear as he did to the Israelites that they shall never enter into his rest. For if the professed disciple of Christ can prefer the pleasures of this world to those high and pure pleasures he enjoys during a special outpouring of the Spirit is it not well worth his enquiring whether he loves God at all.

In the last place I enquire whether this work must cease because Satan will draw off professed Christians by stratagem?

You remember how many methods were taken by the enemies of Nehemiah to prevent his building Jerusalem. And Satan employs many more during a revival to induce Christians to desist and abandon the undertaking. At one time by scoffs and ridicule he endeavours to render it unpopular and helps thus to shame the believer out of it. At another time he calls it delusion and enthusiasm and urges the sober rational Christians to discourage it. At another time he describes its effects as tending to break up the closet friendships and array the dearest relations against one another and as contrary to the bible as did Sanballat to Nehemiah when he said, will ye rebel against the king? But the most dangerous method Satan takes to oppose this is by attempting to draw him off from the work and hold a parley with the world. He tries to persuade the believer that he can devote a little more time to worldly concerns than he has done he spreads an alluring charm over the objects of sense and strews flowers before him inviting him to tread such a path. He endeavours too if possible to direct his attention from experimental godliness to unprofitable disputations about speculative matters. He stirs up a thousand objections and cavils during a revival and endeavors to persuade the Christian it is his duty to answer them all by arguments - instead of doing as Christ did when asked, whether there were few that be saved - who replied strive to enter in at the strait gate: for many I say unto you shall seek to enter in but shall not be able. If once the adversary can persuade the Christian to leave his post and come down to have a parley with him on these subjects that moment the work ceases and the Christian is betrayed for there are murderers lying in ambush for him as soon as he abandons the revival. If Satan can stir up any petty dispute among the members of the church he knows that his point is taken and that the work will cease. We ought therefore Christian brethren to be peculiarly on our guard against this vile and cunning oppose of the work of grace among us. We ought not to be ignorant of his devices. Let us remember that during such a time as we have been enjoying in this place his malice is provoking to the utmost and he is indeed a roaring lion among us seeking whom he may devour and we ought to recollect too that if we resist the devil he will flee from us. And the armour with which he is most successfully resisted is faith and prayer. (And depend upon it brethren that he will assault us more.)

And now my Christian friends I ask your solemn attention to the questions I have proposed to you whether the glorious work of God among us is about to cease because you neglect secret prayer - or have less anxiety for the impenitent - or want faith in God - (or observe so unworthily the Lord's supper) - or because we are becoming tired of it or are drawn off from it by the stratagems of Satan? These are solemn enquiries for us all and it is high time we put them to our consciences as in the fear of God. For as a watchman on the walls of Jerusalem I cannot but warn you ever at the appearance of danger. I must in duty to God and young souls proclaim with a low voice that ere you are aware of it this revival will be gone unless you battle on more firmly the garrison of God. And Oh if we should thus grieve away the Spirit of God I see in imagination the judgments that will follow. I see (our much loved Zion sitting solitary as a widow - I see her ways mourning because none come to her solemn feasts - Yeh Zion spreadeth forth her hands and there is none to comfort her?) I see the abomination of desolation polluting the sanctuary of God. Already I seem to see you on your death bed weeping that you grieved away the blessed Spirit - thus brought darkness into your souls. Already I hear your children (companions) who neglects this revival crying in the agonies of a dying moment. O how have I hated instruction my heart despised reproof! The harvest is past etc.

Sermon 95 Works of God

[Sermon No. 95, "Works of God," Psalms 104:24, 1821 Dec,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 2]

Psalms 104:24

O Lord how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hath thou made them all.

David was an ardent admirer of the works of God in their three great departments of nature of providence and of grace. His view of the works of creation did not as with many modern philosophers lead to universal scepticism but inspired within him a deeper reverence for God's character and a more ardent zeal in his cause. Whenever he cast his eyes around him upon the universe his thoughts were constantly reminded of his Father in heaven - The heavens, says he, declare thy glory and the firmament showeth thine handy works. Day unto day uttereth speech and night unto night showeth knowledge - I meditate on all thy works I muse on works of thy hands. Solomon too it seems pushed his enquiries into every department of nature. For it is said of him that, he spake of trees from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto this hyssop that springeth out of the wall: he spake also of beasts and of fowl and of creeping things and of fishes. And the books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes testify how acute was his observance of God providence and grace. You remember too how frequently Job appeals to the works of God and how minutely and sublimely he describes them. Ask now the beasts, says he, and they shall teach thee and the fowls of the air and they shall tell thee. Or speak to the earth and it shall teach thee and the fishes of the sea shall declare unto thee. Who knoweth not in all these that the hand of the Lord hath wrought this?

And you well know that the book of Job is made up of a debate concerning God's providence and that it was the grace of God which enabled that patriarch to say, I know that my Redeemer liveth and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth. And though after my skin worms destroy this body yet in my flesh shall I see God.

The text we have chosen on this occasion naturally leads us after the example of these ancient servants of God to take a general survey of the works of nature - the works of providence and the works of grace. And first let us consider the work of creation that is the work of nature.

We have not time to examine the connection between the several parts and beings in the universe although this would be a most interesting work - nor have we time to trace the wonderful organization of any individual creature or thing. The Psalmist when he says, O Lord how manifold are thy works, was evidently contemplating merely the countless multitude and variety of the creation of God - and we wish now to follow this same thought and shall endeavour to set before you an enumeration so far as is possible of the organized and unorganized the animate and inanimate parts of the universe.

And here let it be remarked that in the works of God there is a wonderful succession or gradation from the most perfect and complicated to mere dead matter. There is a connected chain of beings from man down to the dust under our feet and every individual link in this chain differs but slightly from that next above it. In our enumeration we shall begin with man who evidently occupies the next place below angels and stands at the head of this lower creation and then endeavor to follow this chain throughout till we arrive at inanimate matter.

All the individuals of the human race constitute but one species all having sprung from Adam and Eve. That is if we believe the bible to be true we must suppose this to be the case. And the varieties in the human countenance and stature in different countries are with little difficulty accounted for by natural causes without supposing these varieties to constitute different species descending from different progenitors. It is impossible to know precisely the number of human beings now alive on the whole globe. A moderate estimate however will make them 800,000,000. We will suppose however that upon an average since the creation the population of the globe has been only 600,000,000 - and that a generation lasts but forty years - that is suppose during every 40 years 600 millions die.

On this supposition there have lived on the earth previous to this time 90 thousand millions of men. We know not how many more will be born before the earth is burnt up. But we know that the millenium will last a thousand years and supposing this to commence immediately and that as many inhabitants will be on the earth then as now we shall have the whole number of men who will exist on the globe from first to last amounting to 110,000, millions- 110,000 millions of immortal souls my heavens! Can you form any conception of such a multitude? And yet hearer you and I shall see them all at the day of judgment.

In descending from man on the scale of animated beings we come first to the quadrupeds (Class Mammalia). And the number of species of these that are known to exist or to have existed on earth is about 600 (562 plus). Here let it be noted that we speak of so many different species or kinds of animals and not of the real number of individuals that inhabit the earth. Thus we say that the tiger and the elephant are different species: but we pretend not to say how many tigers or how many elephants inhabit the wilderness. They may amount to millions. And this same remark ought to be kept in mind as we proceed to other descriptions of Gods creatures.

And we come next to birds - the inhabitants of the air. Not less than three thousand different species of these have been described in the whole world - reaching from the tall ostrich which the Arabs sometimes employ instead of horses down to the wren or swallow. Nearly 300 species (278) have been described in the United States and probably as many as 1000 exist in N. America. And here would we repeat the remark just made that we are giving the number of the species of different animals and not the number of the individuals of those species. In this country we know little of the countless number of birds in some of the most prolific species - a respectable traveller in the South Sea Islands affirms that in an hour and an half there flew over him a flock of a single species of bird containing not less than 151 millions. What then must the number in the 3000 species that are known to exist!

The next class of animals in the scale of being forming a link between birds and fishes is the amphibian - that is animals subsisting in air or water. These include turtles and serpents and the species are less numerous than the birds amounting to not more than 400 (375 plus). Probably less than 100 of these species are found in the U. States.

We come now to the fish which as Moses informs us in the account of their creation, the waters brought forth abundantly after their kind. Of these not less than 1000 different species are known to exist, 3 or 4 hundred of which are found in the U. States and of the immense numbers contained in these species we can form some opinions when we are informed on good authority that the shoals of the single species called herring which annually migrate from the northern ocean cover a surface not less than 130,000 square miles and are so thick that vessels are sometimes obstructed and stopped in passing through them. It is also stated by an eminent author that there are more animals in the milt of an individual of another species of fish than there are men upon the earth. That is more than 800,000,000. O Lord how manifold are thy works! The earth is full of thy riches so also is this great and wide sea.

The link we next meet as we descend along the chain of being towards inanimate matter is the insect tribe and these are very extensive. It is estimated that not less than 20,000 species exist. And how numerous particular species as you have all witnessed on many a summer evening when the air for miles around was filled with them. Among these insects there are not less than 1000 species of what we call butterflies (Papilio) and not less than 1500 of what we call millers (Phadena). You recollect too the many accounts in the Scriptures of the ravages of the locust. This insect constituted one of the plagues of Egypt and the Assyrians by Isaiah and Nahum are compared to locusts because they were so numerous and their march so desolating. These insects indeed in the eastern world are often so numerous as to hide the light of the sun for several hours and to render it night. Insects indeed are probably more numerous than any other of the creatures of God.

The next class of beings we shall proceed to notice is still lower in the scale of creation being intermediate between insects and plants. A part of these amounting to at least a thousand species (922 plus) are either inhabitants of the sea or of obscure situations and scarcely have names in common language. By naturalists they are called vermes. Another part of this class of animals is the various shells in the ocean and the seas and more than 2500 species of these have been named. Another part of these vermes amounting to about 700 species approach still nearer to plants than shells. Some of them are fixed to one spot like vegetables and yet have life and sensation and an animal organization. So that all the species of vermes known amounts to more than 4000 (4136).

The next link in the chain of creation carries us beyond the animal and introduces us into the vegetable kingdom. And it is a kingdom full of variety and beauty eminently displaying the wisdom of God. Previous to this time no less than 44,000 different plants have been discovered and described in the whole world. 6000 of these are mosses lichens funguses etc. which are also plants whose flowers and fruit are obscure. Of the remaining 38,000, seven thousand are found in Europe, 6000 in Asia, 3000 in Africa, 5000 in New Holland and 17,000 in America. And yet a man who is eminent for his knowledge of plants is of the opinion that not half of the species growing on the earth have yet been discovered and he supposes that there are not less than 100,000 in all. In the U. States between 4000 and 5000 species have already been described and the number that may be found growing wild in this immediate vicinity is somewhat above 1000.

Now in order to form some opinion of the immense number of individual plants in the 100,000 species to be found in the world take for example one of the kinds of grass growing in our fields and imagine if you can how many species of it grow upon a single acre - how many in this whole town - how many in the country and how many in the world!

The next class of objects in the creation of God is the minerals. In this term is included not merely the various ores of metals but also every rock and every sort of earth found in the globe. And here we would just remark that many will suppose that in minerals there is none or little order and very few marks of design and wisdom. But the truth is their regularity and construction when understood are truly astonishing; and although we cannot stop to elucidate this subject yet whoever will devote a little time and attention to it will find himself in a most wonderful field where new wonders will continually burst upon him and he will be surprised at the marks of the handy work of God in the most shapeless stone under his feet. And this same evidence of a creating God will meet him when he proceeds to examine those apparently confused and irregular masses of rocks that form the loftiest mountains of our globe. The whole number of the species of mineral at present known and described is 230 - and the whole number of species and varieties nearly 600 (570 described).

We are now naturally led to consider the earth as a whole: and here we begin to contemplate those works of the Creator that eminently display his almighty power. And when we learn with certainty that this globe is nearly 8000 miles through it and 25000 around it, especially when we are told that it contains 266 thousand millions of solid cubic miles - the thought forcibly strikes us how immense must have been the power that first created it and still upholds it. This idea too receives additional force when we are told that this immense mass of the globe is carried forward in space at the rate of 65000 miles every hour. That is to say my hearers before we reach our habitations this day (which cannot be less than an hour) we shall be carried 66000 miles from the spot we are now in; and by tomorrow at this hour of the day we shall be removed 1,585,000 miles from the place we now occupy. Nay during every minute we live we are carried over a space of 1100 miles and during every second over a space not less than 16 miles.

These facts may amaze us: and we might add others alike astonishing in regard to the air we breathe which appears so light and harmless. This air during the most violent storms moves not less than 100 miles per hour and as you all know is most destructive in its ravages. And as to its weight it is a certain fact that every man of an ordinary size sustains a pressure of not less than 30,000 pounds, and the weight of the whole atmosphere amounts to five thousand 357 trillions 147 thousand millions of tons.

Yet my hearers when we look beyond this earth and contemplate the sun moon and planets and stars these facts in regard to the globe appear small. The magnitude of the earth diminishes to a point and its velocity in its course round the sun is comparatively slow. Large as the earth may seem to you, what think you when you are told that the planet Herschel is 90 times larger - that Saturn is 1000 times larger - Jupiter 1500 (1479) times larger and the sun 1,380,000 times larger? And yet these are facts that cannot be doubted admitting of mathematical proof.

Does the earth appear of great magnitude? Yet how small is it in comparison with the circle the moon describes round it - which is not less than 480,000 miles in diameter. And how small is this circle when compared with that the earth yearly describes round the sun which is more than 190,000,000 miles. And how small does even this immense circle appear when we are told that the orbit of Herschel is 1800,000,000 of miles in diameter. Nay this immense circle diminishes to a point when we learn that the nearest fixed star cannot be less than 38 billions of miles distant from us! That is to say a cannon ball moving at the rate of eight miles an hour would not reach the nearest fixed star in less than nine millions of years. And yet if your imaginations my hearers are not already stretched to this utmost extent you may be told that the most remote of the fixed stars visible are 497 times farther from us than the nearest!

Does the velocity of the earth appear almost incredible? it is not as already stated but 66,000 miles per hour: yet the planet Mercury moves 105,000 miles in the same time and the comet that appeared in the year 1680 when nearest the sun moved 880,000 miles every hour. But this is a slow motion when compared with the velocity of the particles of light. These come from the sun to the earth at a distance of 95,000,000 of miles in eight minutes of time- that is they move 200,000 miles every second.

No doubt my hearers the vast number of species of animals and plants on the earth surprises you. But we are now speaking of suns and worlds - and here too do we find new matter of astonishment. Although not more than 2000 fixed stars are ever visible to us in the heavens yet when viewed with the most powerful telescopes so immensely do their numbers increase that we are authorized to say that there are not less than 75 millions in the universe - that is 75 millions of suns of which the fixed stars undoubtedly are and probably each of them is surrounded by several planets as is the sun whose light we enjoy - 75 millions do I say? So many are discernable by our imperfect glasses - but perhaps the creation contains 10,000 times this number: for who can say how far the universe extends or where are the limits thereof! Where the Creator stayed his rapid wheels or where he fixed the golden compass?

Here then my hearers do we rest. We have enumerated about 30,000 different species of animals and 44,000 species of vegetables that are known to exist on earth and we may safely conclude that double this number of animals and plants actually exist on the globe. We have also stated that there are not less than 75 millions of fixed stars. Now as every one of these stars is a sun which is very probable suppose that each one of them has as many as 20 planets and satellites revolving round it and this will make 1500 millions of worlds capable of being inhabited. Suppose each of these worlds to contain as many species of animals and plants as our earth and my hearers what an astonishing view have you of the power and wisdom and goodness of God! O Lord how manifold are thy works! In wisdom hast thou made them all.

We proceed to the second head of this discourse where we are to consider God's works of Providence. By the Providence of God we understand that watchful and gracious oversight which He exercises over all his creatures whereby they are supported in existence - favored with mercies and governed so wisely in all their actions that every thing is made conducive to God's ultimate glory and the best good of the universe. But there is not time on this occasion to take so extended a view of the subject. We confine our remarks therefore to those providential mercies we as a people have enjoyed the past year and for which we are called this day to make returns of grateful acknowledgement. And my brethren we may name among the first of these blessings a continuance to us of the offers of salvation. Though our sins have been innumerable they have not yet as we would hope cast us beyond the pale of mercy. The voice of God is yet calling us to heaven - the Saviour is yet interceding for us and the Spirit is yet striving with us. It is God in his merciful providence who has given to many of us a disposition the past year to unite from Sabbath in public worship in this house of prayer. It is He who has presented to us so much harmony of sentiment and feeling and suffered no root of bitterness to destroy the comforts of our religious privileges. And how great have been his temporal mercies the past year! Why have the fruits of the earth not been smitten with blasting and mildew? Why has not the former or the latter rain been withholden? O look upon your crowded storehouses and barns - upon the abundance the earth has poured forth from her lap the past year into your bosoms. Look upon these and on this day of Thanksgiving remember the poor and the needy. O remember the many millions that groan being burdened with ignorance - with sin and misery - and do not I beseech you use this world as abusing it - do not suffer the riches of the past year to be corrupted by an inordinate selfishness nor your gold and silver to be corrupted lest the rest of them be a witness against you and eat your flesh as it were fire.

It is the mercy of God too my hearers that has the past year defended us so remarkably from the pestilence that walketh in darkness and the destruction that wasteth at noon day. I see some among you indeed who are clothed in the garments of mourning and whose tears of sorrow for departed friends are mingled with your thanksgivings. But there are fewer of this description than usual. And it is fact well worthy of notice that for most of those called into eternity since the last annual Thanksgiving remaining friends have reason for indulging a hope that they are blessed in heaven. While among those who are unprepared how few have been called! What astonishing mercy that such are spared!

In the third place we hasten to consider briefly God's works of grace. By these we mean the execution of that wonderful method of salvation for lost men God has devised by the blood and spirit of his only begotten Son. When man was created, the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy; and when this unheard of plan of salvation was developed those same holy beings raised the song of, glory to God in the highest peace on earth and good will to men. If the works of creation appear great and glorious no less so does the works of redemption - and even now there is joy in heaven over any repenting sinner. The redemption of the soul is precious, and probably nothing in the works of nature can so illustriously display to the angels in light the glory of their Father as this - nor need we wonder that into this they desire to look.

*Nature with open volume stands
To spread her Makers praise abroad
And every labor of his hands
Shows something worthy of a God.*

*But in the grace that rescued man
His brightest form of glory shines
Here on the cross 'tis fairest drawn
In precious blood and crimson lines.*

To create this material universe and the innumerable beings that inhabit it must have been the works of a Being almighty power infinite wisdom and endless love. But to now create an immortal soul dead in sin demands no less an exertion of power - no less of wisdom no less of love. We have endeavored to set before you the wonders of creation but the wonders of redeeming love and regenerating grace cannot be unfolded by a mortal tongue. Go to Gethsemane and the cross and the price there paid for the souls will show you the value of its redemption. Go into the caverns of eternal despair and the spirits of darkness in them weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth will tell you what it is to be unredeemed and unregenerated. Go into the New Jerusalem above and there witness the joys and listen to the songs of the redeemed through all eternity and then only can you know the wonder and glories of grace which redeems and regenerates a soul.

Yet this grace has been poured out upon thousands and millions in our lost world. And many very many are now tasting the blissful fruits of their salvation at the right hand of God in heaven. And my brethren have we not witnessed this past year do we not now witness in this place the operations of this grace upon some of our neighbors and nearest friends? Are there not some who one year since lived as if there were no heaven or hell no soul to save or lose but who now have a new song put into their mouths, even a song of redeeming love? Are there not some within the sound of my voice who feel, although they have lived many years, that this is the first annual Thanksgiving in which they have had one truly grateful feeling to God? O if they have indeed passed from spiritual death into life and become new creatures during the past year what abundant cause have they this day to, serve the Lord with gladness - to come before his presence with singing - to enter his gates with thanksgiving and into his courts with praise! and to enquire with the Psalmist, what shall we render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards us? We will take the cup of salvation and call upon the name of the Lord. We will pray our vows unto the Lord now in the presence of all his people. O sing unto the Lord a new song: for his right hand and his holy arm have gotten him the victory.

Such my brethren are the works of God: and with what emphasis may we say - O Lord how manifold are they works. In wisdom hast thou made them all. And how interesting the thought that in this place we have cause this day for devoted thanksgiving to God because we have had such opportunity the past year not only to witness his works of creation but to experience a kind and most beneficent Providence - not only to witness his providence but also his works of grace! What could God have done more for us that he has not done! If we should live to witness fifty succeeding thanksgivings probably we shall never in so many respects have occasion to recount so vast a variety of mercies from heaven and this is a peculiar Thanksgiving such an one as many of us have never witnessed and shall never witness again. Let it inspire within us peculiar gratitude - a peculiar sense of our unworthiness and a peculiar spirit of prayer and praise. O give thanks unto the Lord for he is good: for his mercy endureth forever. O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness and for his wonderful works to the children of men. Blessed be the Lord forever more. Amen and amen.

Sermon 96 Victory Over Death

[Sermon No. 96, "Victory Over Death," I Corinthians 15:55, 1822 Feb,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 2]

I Corinthians 15:55

O death, where is thy sting? O grave where is thy victory?

[See reference to Hartford Hymnal last page.]

What a glorious apostrophe is this! What a triumphant conquest does it describe over the last enemy of man! Death has ever been represented as the Thing of Terrors and since the world began only two of our race have escaped the triumphs of his arm. Man has ever shrunk from a contest with him who is always conqueror and human ingenuity has been exhausted to erect some bulwark through which his arrows could not penetrate and behind which feeble man might repose in serenity. But there is no fortress so strong that he cannot penetrate it and no retreat so hidden that he can not lay it open and drag forth the miserable victims to the slaughter.

The grave too has ever had resting upon it a gloomy and a chilling darkness. Man turns from it with aversion and though often called to witness its jaws closing over his friends and neighbors yet you will perceive by his downcast look his startling tear and his heaving bosom that he dreads the hour when he must be cast into as a victim to its insatiable voracity.

But a new champion comes forth to contend with death and the grave. He takes upon him the breast plate of righteousness the helmet of salvation the shield of faith and the sword of the Spirit and advances to the conflict. Death and the grave eager for their prey rush forward and seize upon him whom they regard as their victim. And indeed for a moment he seems to be in their power wounded and subdued. But soon he rises with renovated strength and lo! a new spectacle! Death and the grave lie vanquished and he treads them beneath his feet. The dart dipped in mortal poison is broken by his shield and though they yet appear terrible their deadliest weapon is robbed of its sting. A spectator of the conflict seeing how complete is the triumph buckles on the armour of the conqueror and exultingly exclaims in defiance. O death where is thy sting! O grave where is thy victory!

But this is no idle boasting. That conqueror of death and the grave was no other than the Lord Jesus Christ in that spectator no other than the apostle Paul - and to one who followed so closely in the steps of his Master death could have no terrors and the grave no alarm.

In this same language of triumph may be and often has been taken up by many devoted followers of the like precious faith who had on them the same invulnerable armour. They too have not boasted in vain: but in the trying hour have found the sting of death extracted and they have conquered the fear of the grave. Indeed it is the proper language of all who have the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.

As remarked about the text is the language of triumph over the deadliest foes that ever scourged the fallen race of man. But it implies that to man unenlightened by revelation - and to those in Christian lands who do not embrace the Gospel there is a sting in death and a victory in the grave. Let us in the first place enquire in what that sting and that victory consist.

And in respect to the victory the grave obtains of a man who has no hope in Christ a few words will suffice. When you see the bodies of friends neighbors and acquaintances laid on the sepulchre you cannot but realize that whatever of strength of health of vigor or activity they possessed, whatever of beauty and gracefulness in their form and movement all these have now yielded to the grave. Men may deposit their friends in splendid tombs and strive to embalm their bodies yet the grave mocks all their feeble efforts. He summons to his aid corruption in the worm and reigns sole conqueror in his dreary dominions over youth and beauty and strength and activity.

The grave too when unsubdued by faith in Christ swallows up the hopes of man. Philosophy indeed with her feeble taper has often wandered about her dark and fathomless caverns to discern some vista through which the light of another world might enter and give support to the victims who is compelled to plunge into those dark abodes. But at the best the light which faces on the eye of unassisted reason from another world is feeble and glimmering - and the man philosopher in view of eternity must always be found to exclaim

*The wide the unbounded prospect lies before me,
But shadows clouds and darkness rest upon it.*

We now come to enquire what it is that constitutes the sting of death to the man who is not united by faith to the Saviour. And the Apostle in the verse following the text has answered thus enquiring: The sting of death says he is sin and the strength of sin is the law. This is a most satisfactory answer. The bodily pains which the hour of death brings could easily be borne - but to realize that we are sinners in that hour this is what poisons the dart of the great destroyer and gives a tenfold pang to the last agonies.

But sin itself would have comparatively little power were it not for the law of God. This gives it its strength. For says the apostle, sin is not imputed when there is no law. Though man had an unholy disposition yet if he knew not that God had prohibited its indulgence his conscience would not reproach him on a death bed. But all men do know that God has given a law that is exceeding broad against all ungodliness and unrighteousness. They know that so strict is this law that it demands a perfect obedience - a perfect conformity of our wills thoughts desires words and actions to the will of God and that for the least violation there goes forth from the councils of heaven a decree of eternal death. The soul that sinneth it shall die. The wages of sin is death. Whosoever keepeth the whole law and yet offendeth in one point is guilty of all. Now all men in a Christian land know all this and though they may not be much alarmed at their danger for years yet on the bed of death the scales fall from their eyes and they perceive that they have sinned and come short of the glory of God. And now the law thunders its terrors in their guilty consciences and adds an awful pang to the sting of death.

That great moral disease within us called sin is then what produces the deepest anguish of a dying hour. This is the sting of death. We shall get however a more distinct view of that state of feeling which constitutes the sting of a sinner's dying hour if we advert to those alarming views which then arise in awful distinctness before his mind. And the first thing in such an hour that awakens the most dreadful apprehensions in an unregenerate man's soul is the view of his past life. The general course of his thought feeling and action during his whole life passes in solemn yet distinct review before his mind and nothing is there discoverable which can afford him a gleam of satisfaction now that he is on the brink of eternity. He remembers perhaps many kind and amiable feelings he has had towards his fellow man and many upright and honorable deeds he has performed: but these all resulted from worldly motives - and among them all he can discover not one which was founded on the love of God. The glory of God he now perceives never to have influenced him in a single instance - and this is the most cutting and alarming consideration that the Being who upheld him and who presented so many motives before him to win his love has not had any share in his affections and now he is about to go into his immediate presence when the only enquiry will be what have you done to the glory of God? not what moral and amiable deeds you have performed? He now perceives indeed that his whole life has been spent worse than in vain and that it would, have been better for him never to know to have been born. Such a view as this surely must plant daggers in a dying man's bosom.

A second consideration that is agonizing in such an hour results as a consequence from the view the sinner takes of his life. It is that his day of grace is now past. He has visited all the motives to serve and love God heaven earth and hell could furnish till the Spirit of God has departed and his heart is hardened so that created powers cannot subdue it. He remembers indeed the penitent thief on the cross - but he had not revisited so many calls and warnings and threatenings and promises as one who has lived in a Gospel land - and therefore he takes no hope from this extreme instance. He feels therefore that all is over with him - that as he has neglected God - God now justly neglects him and there is, no place for repentance though he seeks it earnestly with tears. Now does he realize the awful import of the apostolic declaration that, if we sin willfully after that we have received a knowledge of the truth there remains no more sacrifice for sin but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and of fiery indignation that shall devour the adversary.

But the views of the dying sinners do not stop here. And a third circumstance that adds a poignancy to the terrors and anguish of death is that he is hastening to the judgment seat of Christ. Already in imagination he sees the earth giving up her dead - already does he see the books opened and therein trembling he perceives what an awful catalog stands recorded against himself - already does he feel his soul shrinking within him as the Lord Jesus his unyielding judge fastens his omniscient eye upon him and calls upon him before the universe to give an account of the deeds done in the body. And worse than all already does he seem to hear the voice of the Judge saying, depart thou cursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels. While the whirlwind of the Lord sweeping him away from hope and heaven. This is another constituent of the sting of death.

But the thoughts of the dying sinner are irresistibly carried beyond the judgment seat of Christ into the abodes of the damned. The picture of that awful world now presents itself in lively colours before his agonized imagination and although for so many years he has had no distinct perception of it yet now he finds it to be real and near. Only a few moments longer and his naked soul will pass the iron gate of hell and feel the gnawing worm fastening upon it and the unquenchable fire beginning its ravages. O dreadful to the dying sinner is the view he has of the lake burning with fire and brimstone of the spirits of darkness chained each one in his fiery bed and writing and groaning in the agonies of eternal despair - and then to realize that in a few moments he shall himself make one of their horrid society and that then year after year and unnumbered centuries after centuries will pass over his head not to bring him any nearer the termination of his sufferings but only to bring along with them new accessions of missed misery. O what a sting is there in such a dying thought as this!

These are the views and these are the feelings my hearers that constitute the sting of death. And although they may not be realized by every dying impenitent man in their full extent yet if there be not a lethargy or a delirium upon his soul in that hour they will be realized enough to harrow up within him a dreadful conflict of feelings. And is there any remedy for the sting of death - any shield that can turn aside the poison dart? O yes my hearers death is conquered - blessed be God the grave is conquered. Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. The Son of God has triumphed over these hitherto invincible foes. He has found the thing of terrors and come off victorious. He has entered the grave and found a passage through its dark caverns into heaven so that now the light of immortality shines along the path he trod to light all his faithful followers into the same happy world. In a word though all men must still submit to be cut down by the sword of death yet he has destroyed the sting of death in the first place by his atonement.

As before observed it is a sense of unpardonable sin that gives death its deadliest terrors. At such an hour man knows that he has broken the law of God and that therefore there has gone out against him from heaven a decree of eternal banishment and misery. That law cannot be broken with impunity nor can its penalty be annulled. How then with such a bar in the way between man and his God can there ever be reconciliation? The curse of a broken law lies with all its tremendous weight upon every son and daughter of Adam: but how wonderful is the plan! Christ has borne that curse for us and thus redeemed us from the curse of the law. The Father devoted his Son in the garden of Gethsemane and on the cross to bear the awful penalty which the law demands from a world of sinners so that now he can be just while he justifies the returning penitent. Unless that atonement (sacrifice) had been made it would not have been possible for God to have extended pardon to an individual of the human race however deep his repentance and however thorough his reformation. For the law of God had been broken in sight of the universe and that law must be magnified and made honorable or the universe must have regarded even God as a changeable being. The vicarious sacrifice of Christ did magnify and make honorable that law. For he is the end of the law for righteousness to everyone that believeth. The atonement then removed effectually this bar which lay in the way on the part of God and rendered it consistent with his attributes to pardon sinful man. It also removed another obstacle on the part of man. After the atonement was made and God could pardon man it still wanted something to excite in his alienated heart a love for God's character. And Christ by his redemption purchased the gift of the Spirit to be sent to operate upon the hearts of sinners and implant within them holy love. The terrors of God could not win the affections of a disbarred being: but the Spirit bids the anxious sinner look to Christ voluntarily bleeding on the cross and he cannot resist such a miracle of love. His heart which all the thunders of Omnipotence could not subdue is melted in view of a suffering Saviour and flows out in holy love toward all holy beings. Then are his sins forgiven and he is reconciled to God. And a sense of forgiven sin is the charm that can blunt the sting of death.

But in the second place Christ has rendered complete the victory over death and the grave by his resurrection from the dead. Could man ever have had an assurance that his sins were forgiven still there wanted something to satisfy him that his soul would not be lost in the dark valley of the shadow of death. Millions of men had been seen in every age entering that valley but no one had ever returned to prove that the soul was not destroyed in the boisterous passage. The Lord Jesus Christ was suspended on the cross and three long hours did he contend with the king of terrors while his anxious disciples longed to see him come down from it by a miracle, but at length he bowed his head and gave up the ghost and death seemed to have triumphed. The sepulchre received his remains and death and the grave and sin and hell exulted in their supposed victory. Three long and gloomy days did his disciples sorrow as those without hope. But at length the unwilling sepulchre gave up its charge and the Son of God came forth a conqueror over the tomb bearing on his forehead the inscription, O death when etc. The grave at the sight uttered a hollow murmur of despair through all her caverns that her victim had escaped death shrieking in anguish at his defeat and sin and hell shrieked affrighted from the spectacle. By his resurrection he evinced that death was not an eternal sleep and gave hereby an earnest that all who slept in him he would in like manner bring forth. Hereby he showed that he had the keys of death and hell: For to this end Christ both died and rose and revived that he might be the Lord both of the dead and the living. Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming in which all that are in their graves shall hear his voice and come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation. Was indeed as the apostle says, the first fruits of them that slept. Every believer in him has therefore the promise Him who has conquered death and the grave that he also shall be secured up to immortal life and glory. O death where etc.

The subject we have this morning discussed my brethren is full of interest as we could gladly dwell upon it many an hour. But a few remarks must suffice. And first what a debt of gratitude we owe to the Saviour!

The Gospel is emphatically the revelation of life and immortality to man. Without this all is darkness and despair - with it light and peace and happiness are continually within our reach. Death once so terrific becomes now only the messenger to summon us to enter into glory. The grave once so dark and hopeless now becomes a passage from earth to heaven. And for all this we are indebted to the Saviour's blood and the Saviour's resurrection! Who is there that will not bless our Redeemer! Who they can refuse to love him? Who that is not ready to consecrate all his time and faculties to the advancement of his kingdom. Who that will not join the hosts of heaven in saying, worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power and riches and wisdom and strength and honor and glory and blessing!

In the second place how full of consolation is this subject to those who are called to bring Christian friends!

They have made their peace with God through the Saviour's blood. Their sins are forgiven - they are clothed with the armour of the Gospel and though they must have their bodies in the tomb for a season yet the sting of death is gone and the grave can hold them no longer than the resurrection morning. Some real Christians indeed as death approaches feel their hearts sink within them. But in the trying moment if they are really the children of God surely do they fail to feel the kind hand of their Saviour extracting the sting of death and softening their dying pillow. And their momentary fears serve only to enhance the happiness of heaven. They sleep in the same bed in the grave in which their Saviour slept and we may rest assured that He will tend their sleeping dust till the morning of the resurrection. To part with friends under such a belief in their preparation and destination O how different must be the feelings of survivors from those which are produced by the departure of one who has lived and died without God and without hope and who has felt in all its bitterness the sting of death! To those in this place therefore who have recently parted with Christian friends we may address the words of Paul - I would not have you to be ignorant brethren concerning them which are asleep that ye sorrow not even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.

So let us now mourn for those etc. - Hartford Hymnal Hymn 380 [Source: The Hartford Selection of Hymns, 1823]

In the last place how dreadful will be the sting of death to those who have no Saviour! Such may live alone year after year regardless of eternity: but when disease and time shall have driven them to the verge of this world and just about to fling them into the gulf of eternity where then shall they turn for comfort? If they look backward a sinful life barren of every holy deed and a day of grace neglected and now gone forever will plant daggers in their bosoms. If they look forward they see a solemn judgment seat rising before them and a Saviour whom have slighted and insulted sitting on the tribunal and on the left hand side of the tribunal that they see all the workers of iniquity with whom they must now take up their abode in everlasting burnings. O sinner this is the sting of death which you must feel unless you fly to a Saviour. Fly therefore O fly, fly – fly for your life.

Sermon 98 All Holy Beings Engaged to Save Sinners

[Sermon No. 98, "All Holy Beings Engaged to Save Sinners," Ezekiel 18:31, 1822 Mar,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 2

Ezekiel 18:31

Why will ye die?

It is a melancholy fact that man is bent upon his own destruction. Though endowed with immortal faculties capable of expanding forever in holiness and happiness yet he carries within his bosom those perverse dispositions that innate power of corruption which drag down these faculties toward hell. We are of all of us by nature shut up under condemnation children of wrath and slaves to sin and Satan and although there is a way of escape pointed out to us our hearts are resolved to perish and unless the power of an Almighty God intervenes we inevitably rush into the jaws of eternal ruin. There is such a blindness of mind and hardness of heart within us – such a moral madness - such a headstrong tendency downwards that even when the internal Eternal and Almighty God condescends to say by himself that he has no pleasure in our death when he pledges his perfections that he is sincere - offering us salvation - we do not believe him but remain unmoved and unaffected by all his by all his invitations and stand out proof against all the threatenings which an almighty and avenging God can hold over our heads. For my hearers it is God who is speaking in the text. The God who made us – the God who secured this moment – the God without whose upholding arm every one of us should this moment drop into annihilation - the God who will finally judge us - this is the God who condescends to speak in the text. And to whom does he Speak?

Originally the words were directed to the Israelites - but they are addressed to every impenitent son and daughter of Adam. And what is the death of which she speaks? It is the everlasting destruction which the ungodly experience in hell. And if the case of the impenitent sinner be so awfully alarming as to draw forth an exhortation from Jehovah - if their hearts be so stupefied in sin and if the death which is coming upon them be so intolerable as to awaken the eternal God to stoop to expostulate with them, well may the ministers of the Gospel take up and repent and urge the affecting the earnest entreaty, why will ye die? Although without the accompanying influences of God's Spirit all our exhortations will only serve to harden the heart yet are we most solemnly commanded under pain of eternal damnation to lift up our voices like a trumpet to cry aloud and spare not to preach the word in season and out of season whether men hear or whether they will forbear and to save the wicked from his evil way by all the motives - by all the arguments the entreaties - the joys and the miseries - heaven earth and hell can furnish. And if after all men will die their blood is on their own heads and our hands are clean.

We propose then my hearers to urge the text upon the impenitent and to show that if they do die it will be their everlasting lamentation, we have destroyed our selves.

In the first place then if any of us perish it will not be because God does not desire our salvation.

My hearers shall any of us dare to charge God with insincerity in what he says to us in the scriptures? I presume not. O listen then to his kind entreaties to sinners - to his tender condescending reasoning with them and to his solemn oaths that he is sincere in his dealings with them. Turn ye unto me saith the Lord of Hosts and I will turn unto you. When the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness that he hath committed and doeth that which is lawful and right he shall save his soul alive. The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart and saveth such as be of a contrite Spirit. The Lord is long suffering to us and not willing that any should perish but that all should come to repentance. Come now and let us reason together saith the Lord though your sins be as scarlet they shall be white as snow: though they be red like crimson they shall be as wool. Can any say that God is not anxious that sinners should be saved? Hear him then again. Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die saith the Lord God and not that he should return from his ways and live? As I live saith the Lord God I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked: but that the wicked turn from his way and live: turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways for why will ye die O house of Israel? Yet saith the house of Israel The way of the Lord is not equal. O house of Israel the way of the Lord is not equal. O house of Israel are not my ways equal. Are not your ways unequal? Cast away from you all your transgressions whereby ye have transgressed make you a new heart and a new Spirit: for why will ye die O house of Israel. For I have no pleasure in the death of him that no pleasure in the death of him that dieth saith the Lord God: wherefore turn yourselves and live ye. If the wicked will turn from all his sins that he hath committed and keep all my statutes and do that which is lawful and right he shall surely live, he shall not die. All is transgressions that he hath committed they shall not be mentioned unto him: in his righteousness that he hath done he shall live. Thus it is that God speaks to the impenitent. And does he speak insincerely? Does he not desire their salvation? If these were the words of man what a deep anxiety would they manifest for our salvation! No less anxiety do they indicate in the God who cannot lie - who cannot dissemble. This language may my impenitent brethren is indeed wonderful. It is enough to melt an heart of stone. And shall it fall without any effect upon your hearts? Can you resist the entreaties - the expostulations - the reasonings - the tenderness and earnestness of your heavenly Father? It is easy to imagine how you can remain unmoved by the arguments of your fellow men - but how - O how - how can you stand it out against infinite kindness and love?

In the second place if impenitent men die it will not be because Christ is not anxious for their salvation.

Would he who thought it not robbery to be equal with God have condescended to take upon him our nature and suffer and die for men if that had not been desirous for their salvation? Would he have borne our sins in his own body on the tree if he had been indifferent to our deliverance from sin. Did he not come into the world to seek and to save that which was lost? He came not to call the righteous but to sinners to repentance. We are told that God our Saviour will have all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth. He came not to judge the world but to save the world. This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners. He is the propitiation for our sins and not for ours only but also for the sins of the whole world. In the last day that great day of the feast Jesus stood and cried saying if any man thirst let him come unto me and drink. Whosoever drinketh of these waters that I shall give him shall never thirst: but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life. Is there not a most earnest desire for the salvation of impenitent men manifested in such declarations? Yet this is not all. For when Christ ascended on high he led captivity captive and gave gifts unto men - that is he sent down the Comforter to convince the world - that is all men of sin of righteousness and of judgment to come. And would this have been done by the Saviour if he had no desire for the salvation of sinners? Why should the Spirit be offered to man unless the Redeemer felt an earnest wish for their conversion.

But far farther still that glorious Saviour is gone to the right hand of the majesty on high continually to intercede for sinners. How ardent must be that desire for their salvation which could lead him not only to die for them and grant them the offers of his Spirit the purchase of his agonies but also to be incessantly pleading with the Father for their forgiveness and conversion! If nothing were in the way of man's salvation but the want of disposition to save them in the Saviour not one of them would perish. Heaven would be full and hell would be cheated of its inhabitants.

And this willingness to save sinners who will be saved is in exercise every moment. Christ does not promise to save them tomorrow but to day - this hour - this moment. His arms are opened wide and he would fain embrace the vilest sinner would such an one come humble and penitent.

This willingness in the Saviour is accompanied by power to save. Verily I say unto you said he on earth the hour is coming and now is when the dead shall hear the voice of the voice of Son of Man and they that hear shall live. All power is given unto me in heaven and earth - him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out.

In the third place sinners will not die because the Holy Spirit is not desirous of saving them.

The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appealed unto all men. It shall come to pass in the last days saith God I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh. And the promise of God is most peremptory and final that he will give the Holy Spirit to them that asks it. And would the Spirit have undertaken this condescending employment of stirring with the hearts of the wicked if he felt no peculiar anxiety for their salvation? Behold says Christ I stand at the door and knock - in what manner is this performed? Doubtless in part by his Spirit. And what astonishing patience and forbearance does that Spirit manifest in continuing to knock though men resist him and slight him year after year? Still do the Spirit and the bride say come and whosoever is athirst to come and whosoever will to come and take of the waters of life freely. When God invites men to accept of his salvation his proud heart replies that he cannot unless he would be moved by the Spirit. God in tender mercy replies - behold I will pour out my Spirit unto you - I will make known my words unto you. And new heart also will I give you and a new Spirit will I put within you and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh and I will give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my Spirit within you and cause you to walk in my statutes and ye shall keep my judgments and do them. The Spirit is willing but the flesh is weak. Now can any man read such promises invitations and expostulations and yet believe that he remains impenitent because the Spirit is not ready to convert him! Be astonished at this O ye heavens and be horribly afraid. The unwillingness of God's Spirit to convert sinners offered as a reason for their remaining in a state of unregeneracy! Hast thou not poured this unto thyself in that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God when he led thee by the way? Behold the Lord's hand is not shortened that it cannot save neither his ear heavy that it cannot hear. But your iniquities have separated between you and your God and your sins have hidden his face from you that he will not hear.

In the fourth place if sinners will die it will not be because holy angels are not desirous of their salvation.

Are they not all ministering Spirits sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation? Did not angels lay hold of the hands of Lot and his wife and daughters to bring them out of devoted Sodom? Did not an angel of the Lord open the prison door to set at liberty the Apostles? Christ represents each believer in him to be under the care of an angel of God. Take heed says he that ye despise not one of the little ones: for I say unto you that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven. Indeed there are various passages of Scripture which represent holy angels as taking a lively interest in the salvation of sinners. There is one passage direct to the point: Likewise I say unto you says

Christ there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth. Those holy beings will know how stupefying is the malady of sin and how overwhelming and awful will be its punishment. If one soul therefore is delivered from its dominion by repentance they feel that a grand conquest is made and that an intolerable loss of misery is taken from it and they will know because they feel it what a full tide of happiness will flow in upon that soul forever and ever. Angels therefore must feel an earnest desire not that one sinner only be saved from perdition but that all might escape to the Saviour - and equally great would be their joy over any returning penitent even to the last. O yes no doubt those benevolent holy beings are now hovering about this house and watching the motions and feelings of our hearts in the fond hope that they shall have an opportunity this day to convey to heaven the news that another soul is born of God and delivered from the thralldom of sin. Would to heaven their benevolent wish might not be frustrated.

In the fifth place if sinners die it will not be because Christians are not desirous of their salvation.

Impenitent man may not believe it yet the records of heaven will one day bear witness that all who have tasted that the Lord is gracious and drank into his spirit feel a most anxious desire for all their brethren who are living without God and without hope. And such persons real ministers of Christ who preach the truth in the love of it? Then in all the commentaries and feelings of Jeremiah does he feel constrained to cry out to the careless and insecure. Hear ye and give ear be not proud for the Lord hath spoken. Give glory to the Lord your God before he cause darkness and before your feet stumble on the dark mountains and while ye look for light he turn it into the shadow of death and make it gross darkness. But if ye will not hear it my soul shall weep in secret places for your pride. O that they were wise that they understood this that they would consider this latter end! Like Paul they can say in regard to the unregenerate - I say the truth in Christ - I lie not my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost, that I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart. For I could wish that my self were accursed from Christ for my brethren my kinsmen according to the flesh. Often do they weep between the porch and the altar and say Spare thy people O Lord and give not thine heritage to reproach. And often do they can exclaim with the apostle. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ as though God did beseech you by us we pray you in Christ's stead be ye reconciled to God. Private Christians too partake of the same anxious desire for the salvation of their unrenewed friends. Frequent and ardent are their prayers that the Spirit of God might be poured out on all around them who must perish except they repent. Their closets testify and the records of heaven will hereafter testify to their strong crying and tears for the ungodly. And the consciences of very many of such can now testify to the faithful and affectionate warnings of their Christian friends. To hear of the conversion of souls is indeed one of the purest joys the believer finds in his weary pilgrimage through this wilderness: and when he actually sees friends and companions forsaking the low path leading down to hell and buckling on the armour of the Gospel preparing to fight the fight of faith and becoming their companions in their journey to the New Jerusalem. O this will cheer the most desponding believer and animate the most drowsy.

Indeed he has no claim to the name of disciple of Christ who does not feel and pray for his dying fellow men who are pushing with rapid strides to perdition. And if there be any soul in this place who does not pray for himself be it known to him that every day within this parish hundreds of prayers rise up to God in his behalf.

But if God the Father and God the Son and God the Holy Ghost - if holy angels and holy men are earnestly desirous of the salvation of sinners if all these are actually uniting their efforts to prevent their destruction who is there in the universe to desire and attempt their ruin?

There is in the first place the hosts of hell. The prince of darkness with his legions have roamed through this fallen world ever since their temptation of Eve seeking whom they might devour. The apostle indeed calls Satan the God of this world and he describes the impenitent as his faithful subjects led captive by him at his will. And this foul cunning and malicious adversary throws all the bars in his power in the way of the sinners salvation. He tries to persuade him that he will not surely die. And alas how many there are who believe him!

In the second place an ungodly world helps sinners on to destruction. The friendship of the world we are told is enmity with God. God and Mammon cannot both be served. Now all men are by nature the friends of the world and until they resolve upon breaking league with it and come out from it and be separate that world is assuredly luring them on by its temptations and pleasures to the chambers of eternal death.

In the third place the sinners heart by nature is resolved upon destruction. The heart of the sons of men is full of evil - yea also madness is in their heart while they live and after that they go to the dead. This heart hates holiness and put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter - darkness for light and light for darkness - calls evil good and good evil. We are told that their understanding is darkened because of the blindness of their hearts. The natural heart indeed is the great obstacle that stands in the way of sin the sinners salvation. For the natural man receive etc.

And must be that the hosts of hell and the temptations of the world and our wicked hearts shall defeat the desires and the united efforts of God of Christ the Holy Spirit holy angels and holy men for recuing the impenitent from eternal death? What could God do more than he has done for our salvation? Nothing my hearers. Yes God has done all that was possible for him to do for our salvation - all that was possible I mean in a moral sense. For there are certain principles in God's government of his rational accountable creatures which are unchangeable and eternal and it is morally impossible for God to violate them or act contrary to them since if I may so speak his attributes are founded upon them and could not exist without them. What I mean then is that God has done all that was possible for him to do in consistency with these fundamental principles of his government and his nature for man's salvation. What could have been done more to my vineyard that I have not done in it? Says God wherefore when I looked that it should bring forth grapes brought it forth while grapes?

Christ too has done all that was possible for him to do consistently with these principles to check the sinner in his mad career to destruction. The Holy Spirit could do no more then He has done and is doing to prevent this. For although in a natural sense he has power to convert every son and daughter of Adam yet in a moral sense he cannot convert those who resist his influences as multitudes do beyond a certain degree. Holy angels also are doing all in their power to hold back sinners from hell. And although Christians might do more than they usually perform yet they have done and are doing much to prevent the same awful catastrophe the death of the sinner.

Why then O ye impenitent, why will ye die? You see that all that is holy in the universe is leagued together to save you - while all that is corrupt and abominable and deceitful is leagued for your ruin. Your deceitful hearts may persuade you that all is not done that could be done to keep you out of hell. You may spend your life in quarreling with the decrees of God - with the doctrine of election or of that special influence of the Spirit whereby one is taken and another left and you may flatter yourselves that herein you find some excuse for your neglect of religion. But depend upon it as God is true that all this is a mere delusion of sin and Satan. The truth is you are fighting your way to hell. You are obliged to struggle against the stream of God's mercy and love which is running strong toward heaven and would fain carry you thither. You are compelled to make every step of your downward course through a Saviours blood. The Spirit of God too takes hold of your right hand and holy angels and Christian friends of your left hand try to hold you back. But you madly tear yourself away from them and bursting through every barrier infinite love and power could erect you rush upon your everlasting destruction.

Sermon 99 Sin an Infinite Evil

[Sermon No. 99, "Sin an Infinite Evil," Job 22:5, 1822 Mar,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 2]

Job 22:5

Is not thy wickedness great? and thine iniquities infinite?

This is a charge made upon the afflicted Job by one of his professed comforters. By some commentators the passage is thus translated, Is not thy evil great that is is not thine affliction a calamity because thine iniquities are infinite? And the words will bear this meaning. Eliphaz had the impression from God's calamities that he must have been guilty not only of the ordinary sins from which good men are not exempted but of others also of a big crimson dye – and he goes on in the succeeding verses to enumerate some of them. Yet there seems to be an allusion in the passage to the magnitude of the evil of sin in its very nature. For if Job's sins had been ever so enormous if they had exceeded even those of Alexander or a Nero they could not properly be called infinite unless there be something in the very nature of sin that deserves this appellation.

Without stopping to elucidate the text any further I propose to set before you some facts that will exhibit the magnitude of the evil of sin. And the first fact exhibiting its enormity is its effects in the present world.

Can we form an adequate idea my hearers what a world this would have been had the serpent never entered the bowers of Paradise? O look at the first happy pair in their happy garden - feeling their affections supremely and constantly drawn towards God – without any unruly passion or any stupidity to mar their sweet communion with their heavenly Father - tasting continually the richest of his mercies – seeing everything around them peaceful and happy - and they with no wish unrealized and no desire unindulged - never knowing the pains of excess nor the distress of privation: but having a full tide of unmingled holy delight perpetually flowing upon their souls. Imagine now this whole world to be but one extended paradise and the innumerable millions that have descended from Adam and Eve to have lived as they lived in the days of their innocence and to have never known disease or pain or sorrow or death. O what a world would this have been!

But look now at a contrast – at the actual condition of The world. See the briars and the thistles yet without the sweat of man's brow starting up on the surface. See discord and envy revenge jealousy murder famine pestilence pain and death rushing forth a mighty phalanx from the lower world and leaving desolation and misery in their march. See views of blood flowing in every generation from a thousand battlefields - measure if you can the oceans of tears that are arising from the broken hearted and distressed. Count the dying groans that continually fill the world – and number the millions that that are moldering away in this vast Golgotha. O you will find the world full of disease full of blood full of tears full of groans and full of skeletons. And notwithstanding these distresses you will find a firm and obstinate rebellion against God and a contempt of his authority – a total neglect of his love and service and an universal violation of his commands. O it is a miserable - a confused - a distracted – a weeping – a bleeding and a dying world. And it is sin that has made it so. Sin then is a tremendous evil.

And it was merely the eating of an apple in opposition to God's will that brought this overwhelming tide of misery upon us. For by one man sin entered into the world, etc.

In the second place the evil of sin may be estimated from the fact that it is a violation of infinite obligations toward God. Or rather this fact shows that the evil of it cannot be estimated.

The nature of God we know is infinite. And the essence is we are told by an apostle is love. This love flows out in a continual stream upon all his creatures and is calculated to make them all perfectly happy. But the nature of God is also infinitely holy. And this perfect holiness renders him averse to all sin. Nay there is between God and sin an infinite and irreconcilable difference. Hence does he say to all his rational creatures, O do not this abominable thing which I hate. Whoever therefore sins in the face of such a tender and earnest entreaty certainly violates his obligations to God and those obligations are great beyond all calculation and therefore infinite. It must then be a dreadful evil that can cause any of the creatures of God to be guilty of such black ingratitude towards him even at the moment when his mercies are more than they can number.

But this ingratitude my hearers appears peculiarly aggravated in man. Or rather man has had a display of God's boundless love towards him which at present appears more glorious and wonderful than anything we know of which he has done for any other beings in the universe. The incarnation the sufferings the death the resurrection and intercession of his only begotten and clearly beloved Son that whosoever believeth on him might not perish but have everlasting life. This is a manifestation of his love more grand and astonishing than ever before or since appeared to our world. One would suppose indeed that every human being need but look to the cross of Christ to have his heart melted into the tenderest gratitude towards the God and Saviour who could do so much to save sinners. This man therefore can do that abominable thing which God hates in the face of all this kindness and mercy surely it is no exaggeration to say that he violates infinite obligations. Yet there is not a just man on earth that doeth good and sineth not. O there is then in sin a malignity and a baseness and a stupefying which no words can express and no human faculties conceive.

In the third place the magnitude of the evil of sin appears from the fact that it is eternal opposition to the happiness of the universe.

Holiness is the only thing in the universe whose invariable tendency is to produce happiness. It is the invariable tendency of it when not obstructed to produce unmingled and perfect and eternal happiness among all rational beings. And hence too God has made holiness the foundation of all his plans for the happiness of the universe. Such a plan might be the result of infinite power and knowledge and wisdom: but unless it had holiness for its basis it could not make rational beings happy - God therefore has made holiness the great object of all his dispensations to his creatures. When he says to men, be holy for I am holy, he expresses the great end for which Christ died for which the Spirit is sent into the world for which his word was given and for which the whole system of all the means of grace which have ever existed in the world has been instituted.

Now in direct opposition to all this are the effects of sin. Its tendency - its inevitable tendency - its sole tendency is to produce misery - and when not checked to produce unmingled and extreme and everlasting misery. Hence Satan and his angels are supremely miserable not so much from any positive powers exerted by God to make so make them so: but from the necessary and inevitable effect of sin within them. Hence too wicked men on earth are miserable in proportion as they are free from restraints and sin is permitted to rain within them. Hence in hell they will be entirely and eternally miserable because there sin will reign within them without restraint. Hence too Christians cannot be entirely happy in this world because sin has yet a place within them and counteracts the blessed effects of holiness.

Now this opposition between sin and the happiness of the universe is utterly unconquerable. There is no such thing as mixing them together. For wherever human sin exists holiness does not exist and happiness cannot live a moment where holiness is wanting. Men on earth have indeed often attempted to reconcile sin with holiness and endeavored to give both a place in their hearts. But they have always found that they could not serve two masters and they have found in the end that they have served sin entirely and what they have supposed to be holiness has turned out to be sin under a milder name.

And this opposition between sin and holiness and consequently between sin and happiness will exist forever. Never can they approximate to an union until their natures be changed - and we are assured in Scripture that there is no work nor device nor knowledge in the grave whither we are going and that he that is unjust will be unjust still and he that is filthy will be filthy still and he that is holy will be holy still. So that through all eternity there will be a ceaseless opposition between between heaven and hell. In the one sin and misery will reign supremely and tyrannically. In the other holiness and happiness will spread their golden sceptre over the blind inhabitants.

And now how dreadful must be that evil which first attempted to throw a bar in the way of the designs of Omnipotence to render all beings holy and happy - and which still maintains an obstinate resistance to infinite benevolence standing in the way of the advancement of the kingdom of peace and holiness and even pushing its ravages into those regions that are holy and happy - and which will through eternal ages stand out in grim and increasing opposition to all that is holy and all that is happy! O it is sin that has dug the pit of hell. It is sin that will build a wall of separation between it and heaven so thick and so firm so deep and so high that eternity will not see it demolished.

The last fact I shall mention to show the evil of sin is that it ruins the immortal soul.

The soul of man is so constituted that it is capable of loving God more and more through all eternity - and this will make it more and more happy through endless ages. It is capable of increasing without end in knowledge and holiness. The time will come in eternity when a single glorified human soul will be possessed of more knowledge than is now possessed by all the angels in heaven. Time will come in eternity when this same human soul will have enjoyed more happiness than all the angels of God have yet enjoyed. In view of such astonishing facts no wonder Christ should exclaim, what shall a man give in exchange for his soul! What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?

Yet my hearers sin has a power to view such a soul as this - a soul of boundless capacities for knowledge love and happiness - a soul that will live forever. It has ruined many such a soul and it is daily ruining thousands more. Multitudes there are in every age and every land who are the servants of sin and who alas are urging on their infatuated way to destruction. In defiance of the warnings of the bible - in defiance of the tears entreaties and prayers of pious friends they persist in their mad course while sin is ruling in their hearts and making havoc of their souls - it chokes and strangles every noble feeling and general resolution and spreads silently a deadly mortification (gangrene) through all the faculties - until the immortal mind besotted and stupefied in all her powers has left a chaotic mass of ruins - unfitted for the enjoyments and employments of heaven and therefore prepared to be food for the undying worm and fuel for the unquenchable fires. In that world of outer darkness the soul indeed still lives to misery - but it is a living death - it is an eternal death. Yet it not only lives not only lives but it increases in its capacity for misery and for the endurance of misery. Such a state may emphatically be called the ruin of an immortal soul. It is called in the scriptures everlasting destruction. Yet this is the work of sin - it is the natural the unavoidable effect of sin. What a dreadful murderer is this monster! What a loss of holiness - what a loss of knowledge - what a loss of happiness - what an accumulation of misery - and anguish and fiery despair does it produce! The loss of happiness holiness and knowledge is literally infinite and the suffering to be endured is literally infinite because the soul is infinite in duration! It is this view of the subject above all others my hearers that shows us the immeasurable evil of sin. Who could not with propriety say to the impenitent sinner, Is not thy wickedness great and thine iniquities infinite?

The inferences that urge themselves upon the mind in view of this subject my hearers must not all be neglected.

And first the facts that have been exhibited show that sin is an evil too great to be estimated or comprehended.

If we look at its effects in the present world remembering that it is the source of all the misery pain sickness and death among us - if it be a base violation of infinite obligations to God - if it be in eternal opposition to the happiness of the universe - and finally above any other consideration if it ruins the immortal soul - what limits my hearers can we set to an evil which produced such results? Certainly the effects of sin will be endless in duration and immeasurable in degree - not only because they oppose the designs and will of the infinite God but because the accumulation of misery which sin will produce in eternity will be great beyond all calculation.

But in the second place he cannot set any limits to the evil of sin then sin is an infinite evil.

The only way in which we prove any thing to be infinite is by showing that we cannot set any limits to it. This is all the proof we have of the infinity of God's nature. We cannot limit the power that could create this universe and therefore conclude it to be unlimited - that is infinite. But this is all the evidence we can obtain that God has Almighty Power. And if we cannot estimate or limit the evil of sin surely by the same kind of reasoning we may conclude that evil to be infinite.

In the third place if sin be an infinite evil we see the propriety of many most alarming declarations of scripture which to some appear irreconcilable with God's benevolence and parental character. If sin be such an evil it must appear immeasurably hateful in his sight - and carrying this idea in our minds we need not wonder at such declarations as these, The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men - our God is a consuming fire - it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God - I have trodden the wine press alone and of the people then was none with me; for I will tread them in mine anger and trample them in my fury: and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments and I will stain all my raiment. For the day of vengeance is in my heart and the year of my redeemed is come. If I whet my glittering sword and my hand take hold on judgment I will render vengeance to mine enemies and will reward them that hate me. I will make mine arrows drunk with blood, and my sword shall devour flesh. For a fire is kindled in my anger and shall burn unto the lowest hell. God is angry with the wicked every day. Behold the name of the Lord cometh from afar, burning with his anger and the burden thereof is heavy; his lips are full of indignation and his tongue as a devouring fire. Tophet is ordained of old; yea for the king it is prepared: he hath made it deep and large; the pile thereof is fire and much wood. The breath of the Lord like a stream of brimstone doth kindle it.

Such passages as these coming from a benevolent God would stagger us did we not bear in mind the immeasurable evil of sin and the consequent obviousness of it in the eye of infinite purity. When we remember that it is the abominable thing which he hates we regard these declarations as the just indignation of an holy God

Fourthly if sin be an infinite evil it demands an infinite atonement in some sense before it can be pardoned. Now could any being make satisfaction for an evil unless his nature were commensurate with that evil? What was the curse of a violation of God's law? Surely everlasting punishment. Now then could any being be made a curse for the offenders the merit of whose suffering was not in some sense equal to the curse? And what other being has a nature exalted enough to render his atonement thus efficacious except he who in the beginning was with God and who was God? Accordingly we find that this very word was made flesh and dwelt among us and finally bore our sins in his own body on the tree. Blessed be God that he did not spare his only begotten Son from the shafts of violated justice but gave him up to endure for us those agonies under which a mere man an angel or an archangel would have fainted.

Fifthly if sin be an infinite evil how just in God to punish it with everlasting misery!

We do not see how it be possible for any one who acknowledges sin to be an evil of this immeasurable magnitude to doubt a moment whether it deserves eternal torments. For it is a self evident maxim in judiciary transactions that a man should be punished in proportion to the mischief his crime has produced. That is he must as the Jewish law required render an eye for an eye and a tooth for tooth, etc. Now if a man who sins has caused a mischief that exceeds all limits surely he deserves a punishment that exceeds all limits and what is this but eternal misery?

Sixthly – if sin be an infinite evil how deep ought to be the penitence of Christians for it and their hatred of it!

There is not a just man on earth that doth good and sinneth not. Nay Christians are guilty of sinning every day and every hour of their lives. That is guilty of that whose evil no numbers nor words can express. O what ingratitude is this towards an holy God who has promised to believe the Holy Spirit! And can any one, who is renewed by divine grace, realize that such an evil exists within his heart without feeling towards it a constant and unconquerable disgust and hatred and groaning under the filthy and intolerable load and crying out in the bitterness of soul with the apostle, O wretched man that I am who shall deliver me from the body of this death!

Lastly - if sin be an infinite evil infinite is the folly of neglecting to washing in that fountain set open to wash in from sin and uncleanness. The blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin and the man who neglects his blood is permitting the deadliest poison the universe can furnish to rankle in his veins and to spread death – eternal death through his soul. He is nourishing in his bosom a monster that will soon bite like a serpent and sting like an adder. He is warming into life the worm that will never die and preparing fuel for the fire that never - never - never can be quenched.

Sermon 101 Convictions Not Followed by Conversion

[Sermon No. 101, "Convictions Not Followed by Conversion," Luke 17:32, 1822 Mar, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 3]

Luke 17:32

Remember Lot's wife.

[The story of Lot's wife and its application to all sinners.]

The history of the destruction of Sodom contains many important lessons of admonition to all who read it. For although none of us may ever be placed in the same circumstances as the inhabitants of that devoted city, yet sin is of the same nature in every age and country and there is a general resemblance or analogy between all its exhibitions its effects and its punishment.

Our Saviour has directed our attention in the text to one of the sufferers in that awful catastrophe whereby Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed. Let us see then what warnings may be derived from the case of Lot's wife.

The wickedness of Sodom had risen to such a height of enormity that the cry of it had gone up to heaven and called forth the judgment of God upon it. At the earnest intercession of Abraham however God promised not to destroy it if within its walls could be found ten righteous persons. But Lot was the only one who feared the Lord. And him God had propose not to destroy unto the wicked. Two angels were sent to warn him to us escape with his own family and the families of his sons in law. But to his sons in law he served as one that mocked. Lot too appears to have been thunderstruck at the intelligence and he lingered unwilling to abandon his kindred and possessions to ruin. But while he lingered the men (that is the angels) laid hold upon his hand and upon the hand of his wife and upon the hand of his two daughters the Lord being merciful unto him; and they brought him forth and set him without the city. There they delivered to him a most strict and alarming message. Escape for thy life: look not behind thee neither stay thou in all the plain; escape to the mountains lest thou be consumed. It might indeed have seemed a severe command to be compelled to flee from their native city leaving their possessions and children to destruction and not be permitted even to cast upon it one farewell look.

But God knew that their irresolute hearts could not without all the tender recollections that would rush upon their minds were they to gaze upon the devoted city. And the result showed that even as it was the temptation was too great for all of the party. The wife of Lot at first lingered while he and his daughters pressed forward feeling no doubt her heart drawn by a thousand ties toward Sodom and beginning to forget the opening and unquenchable command of God. Lot entered Zoar at the rising of the sun: But, says the same great historian, his wife looking back from behind him and she became a pillar of salt. The command of God not to turn her eyes toward Sodom was clear and peremptory and therefore its violation was followed by an immediate and awful punishment. It may be profitable to enquire more particularly in what the sin of the woman consisted. What was it that tempted her in the face of such a command to pause and turn her eyes towards the devoted city? And perhaps actually begin to return towards it? For many writers suppose that she not only looked towards Sodom but really set out on her return thither. And the words of Christ in the context rather favour such a supposition. He is speaking of the approaching rule of Jerusalem and says, In that day he which shall be upon the house top and his stuff in the house let him not come down to take it away: and he that is in the field let him likewise not return back. In these cases we perceive Christ mentions an actual return either from the house top or the field. Yet he immediately adds a parallel case and a warning, remember Lot's wife.

It is of small importance however whether this woman merely looked round on Sodom or began to go towards it. For in either case she violated a plain and urgent command of Jehovah. What was it that tempted her to do such a deed?

Perhaps in the first place she was prompted by restless curiosity. The destruction which the angels announced was so awful and the warning she had of it so short that she might have excited within her an almost unconquerable desire to know the exact moment and the precise manner in which it was accomplished. The human heart has an almost irresistible propensity to witness any thing that is new. And a miracle especially so awful as a storm of fire and brimstone from heaven must have called into action this propensity in the highest degree. It would not indeed be wonderful if the curiosity should prevail even in this instance over such a solemn command. It has always been represented that it was a lawless curiosity to know their gratitude of the forbidden fruit that prompted the first woman of our race to pluck and eat it - and surely in the case of Lot's wife the curiosity must have been still more strongly excited. It might therefore have tempted her to the deed which was followed by such an awful destruction.

But it is difficult to suppose that mere curiosity was the only temptation that beset this woman. Other strong feelings must have been excited within her by so wonderful and dreadful a command as the angels delivered. And in the second place it might have been a spirit of unbelief that prompted her to violate the mandate of Jehovah. The angels who delivered the message appeared in the form of men and although they wrought a miracle in striking the Sodomites with blindness yet she might have thought this to be mere magic or delusion and perhaps these men had invented this mode to alarm Lot and his family. Besides although she knew Sodom to contain much wickedness yet probably she knew many persons there who were kind and neighborly and whom she regarded as not deserving so dreadful a calamity as a shower of fire and brimstone: for we must conclude that this woman was herself unreconciled to God and she would not therefore judge others very severely since this would be to condemn herself. Under the circumstances upon which she was doubtless meditating as she followed her husband toward Zoar, she probably found doubt arising in her mind about the reality of the threatened judgment. And the prohibition she was laid under not to look back would appear to her unreasonable and unnecessary and tend to increase her unbelief. For what could be the mischief of looking back for a moment to see whether God had fulfilled his sentence upon Sodom. Surely if he had they should have no wish to return thither but should be quickened in their escape. This command then appearing unreasonable might seem to her to be a crafty plan of these two men to conceal their real designs and to draw Lot and his family to a distance from the city where perhaps they intended to destroy them. These doubts rising in the mind of the woman led her perhaps at first to slacken her pace and follow her husband at a distance and thus did she place herself beyond his protection: for he could not look round to urge her forward. Separated from him therefore and indulging her doubts perhaps the great Adversary increased them and persuaded her to turn her eyes towards the devoted city. Alas! deluded woman! You are lost! The transforming power of an insulted God is upon you and you become in a moment a lasting monument of the righteous judgment of Jehovah! while your unfortunate husband hearing perhaps your dying shriek cannot even look back to behold your last agonies nor stretch forth his hand to your relief because he must obey God rather than men.

Yet in the third place it is not probable that curiosity or unbelief operated so powerfully upon the wife of Lot as did an unwillingness to abandon forever her possessions and friends who were left to be overwhelmed and destroyed in Sodom. When the angels took hold of her hand to hurry her departure from the city telling her that inevitable destruction awaited it and its inhabitants the fear of so immediate destruction overcame her love to all other objects and she did not resist the urgent importuning of the heavenly messengers. For the love of life is the most powerful of all loves and the fear of death will conquer every other feeling. But that fear as she went from the city would gradually subside and there would be room for other feelings to spring up in her bosom. She had left in the city dear friends and children and they must perish. Yet perhaps by returning thinking she could persuade them to follow her and escape. Why then might she not be permitted to make the attempt? She perhaps felt herself to deserve destruction as much as those children and friends. And hence she might conclude a merciful God would permit her to go and urge them to escape since he is no respecter of persons. Urged by these feelings and these considerations she might have presumed to turn here eyes and perhaps her steps towards the devoted city and thus violated the unalterable command of God and brought upon herself swift destruction.

But it is still more probable that this woman was led into the fatal temptation by an attachment to those possessions she had left in the city. When the fear of immediate death had in a measure subsided as she fled from the place for attachment to her property would return upon her with a powerful attraction. Why are we compelled would be her reasoning, why are we compelled by a just and merciful God to abandon everything to ruin even those things absolutely necessary to our support? We are now going forth we know not where with nothing to supply the wants of nature and we are in the utmost danger of perishing with famine. But we have left enough in Sodom to render us comfortable and independant. We could be contented to lose a part of our property: but it does not seem right to be compelled to abandon the whole. Besides were we to save our possessions we might be more useful in the land where we shall go. If we go forward we must almost inevitably perish and if in return we shall but die and perhaps God in compassion will withhold the fiery storm until we have collected and secured the most valuable of our possessions. I am therefore resolved to return and do my best.

Such probably were some of the temptations either singly or unitedly that overcame the resolution of Lot's wife and tempted her to violate a law of God whose finality was awful beyond description. There is something chilling and terrific in being converted in a moment from a rational being into a pillar of salt - and thus be made a standing monument of God's displeasure against sin to succeeding generations. For we are told by Josephus and even by much later historians that this pillar was standing in their days - between 2 and 3000 years after the event.

We now proceed to apply the case of this woman as an admonition to those who in a spiritual sense have begun to escape from Sodom. For by nature we all are in a world that lieth in wickedness in a world which lies under condemnation of eternal death from God and every individual of us originally formed one of those who are thus condemned and lost. Yet while we are in a natural state we are ignorant that such an awful catastrophe awaits us. God therefore in infinite compassion has sent us messengers to warn us of our danger and pointed out the path of escape. He has given the bible containing a clear description of our lost condition and is full of exhortations and motives to persuade us to come out of Sodom and not be consumed. He sends to us also his ministers and his merciful and afflicted providences to enforce the admonitions of the bible. But notwithstanding all these warnings we remain unalarmed and take not one step towards escaping. Nay to very many of us all these messages appear as did Lot to his sons in law like those that mocked. They seem to us to be delivering an idle tale - and we refuse altogether to listen to them.

But God does not leave all men thus to perish. He sends another messenger even the eternal Spirit to take some by the hand and as it were compel them to escape. He convinces them of sin of righteousness and of judgment to come. He opens the eyes of the impenitent and they clearly discern that there is a heaven and a hell and that they are going forward in the broad road that leadeth to destruction. They no longer doubt that God is preparing a strange punishment for the workers of iniquity and that he is preparing a storm of fire and brimstone for all who do not repent and become converted. Their imminent danger alarms them and they arouse and follow the Spirit who is leading them. At length he delivers to them the message of God in the most urgent terms. Escape for thy life; look not behind thee neither stay thou in all the plain, escape to the mountain lest thou be consumed. This alarming message meets the eye of the convicted sinner on almost every page of the scripture and for a time he presses on toward the mountain of hope - toward Mount Calvary not daring to look back upon the world which he has now abandoned. And some there are blessed be the grace of God who never look back upon the world till then arrows are thrown around the cross. But alas others like the wife of Lot begin at first to linger in their escape and look back with longing regret upon those temporal pleasures and possessions which they formally enjoyed and finally return to them in violation of the solemn command if any man, draw back my soul shall have no pleasure in him. In other words those who are brought by God's Spirit under deep convictions of their sin and danger do often instead of escaping to the mountains tarry in the plain for a time and thence return to the Sodom from which they fled. And the very same temptations seem to beset such persons as proved the ruin of Lot's wife.

Sometimes an unlawful curiosity produces proves the ruin of the convicted sinner. He must stop before he has reached the mountain of hope and pry into the recent counsels of God. He will not proceed until he can determine whether he would be one of the elect. Or he will not advance till he can reconcile his absolute dependance upon God's grace with the liberty of his own actions - questions which are the strongest meat and not the milk of the Gospel and therefore not to be solved by the novice during a season of conviction.

But more frequently an anxious soul is tempted through unbelief to abandon seeking salvation and to return to mire again inside him. He has been trying long to reach the mountain of hope but in vain and he begins to suspect whether he has not been deluded to follow a phantom. He begins to suspect he can be religious without so much painful mortifying exertion. He suspects God not to require striving so difficult of feeble man and he is led to question the necessity of a change of heart. He enquires of himself whether this deep and distressing anxiety he has felt for his soul was not all the effect of fear. And my hearers there can be very little doubt that the conviction of such a man are chiefly the effect of the fear of hell. He has not probably had a deep sense of sin and his sinfulness. The man who is convinced of sin and righteousness as well as judgment to come whether he obtain a hope in God's mercy or not will find his belief of the reality of religion and the necessity of regeneration by the special influences of the Spirit, he will find this belief increasing every month and year he lives. Whereas he who is moved to flee from the Sodom of this world chiefly by that fiery stone which is coming upon it will when his fears begin to subside begin to be filled with his former unbelief - and no wonder that such an one should in defiance of God at length go back to the world and there be more active in rebellion against God than ever he was before. But O let him remember Lot's wife! Let him look at the pillar of salt that stands on the plain of Sodom and view his doom.

But the temptation which most usually most usually induces the anxious enquirer to return to his wallowing in the mire is a secret love for those worldly friendships hopes and possessions which religion requires him to abandon. When first his attention is aroused he views himself a candidate for perdition he feels as if he were willing to resign friends wealth fame and even life if he can obtain an interest in Christ. But after having abandoned these for a few weeks or months he finds rising within him a secret harkening after them again. He begins to feel as if it were a hard requirement to forsake everything friend riches pleasures and home for Christ. He would willingly resign a great deal for religion but why must he give up every thing? Perhaps he has some companions who remain dead in sin and must he altogether abandon their former conversation? By continuing to frequent their society and conforming in part to their prejudice may he not by the means of doing them some good? And where is the harm of mixing in some of the harmless amusements of the world? In short he now resolves to make an effort to serve both God and Mammon- to indulge to a certain extent in worldly pleasures and yet not go so far as to prevent his obtaining religion. For the idea of losing his convictions and returning again to the world strikes him with dread. Satan takes care to keep up this fear within him until he has succeeded in inducing him to turn his face towards the world and thus grieved away God's Spirit and then he will know that this fear will never trouble him more.

And is it indeed true that the convicting sinner is in as much danger of looking back with longing desires and of beginning to return to it as was the wife of Lot in regard to Sodom? And will the consequences be as dreadful in the one case as the other? The convicted sinner is indeed if it be possible in a state still more dangerous than was the woman and the consequences of every looking back world will probably be more dreadful. What is it to become a pillar of salt in comparison with becoming a vessel of wrath fitted for destruction? What is it to become a monument of God's wrath on earth in comparison with becoming a monument of his eternal wrath in hell? The command of God to the awakened sinner is certainly as urgent and binding as it was upon the wife of Lot - and if he does even look towards the riches honors and pleasures of the world with a wish to return to them to the chase after them again if he feels unwilling to abandon them for Christ - there is every reason to fear that he is lost and that a judgment much more severe than that visited upon the wife of Lot will ultimately fall upon him and make him an eternal exhibition of God's justice to men and angels

And here we cannot help remarking how similar was the case of Lot in regard to his wife to the case of the Christian in regard to the convicted sinner. Lot knew that his wife lingered in her escape and what an anxious apprehension must have possessed his mind lest she should violate the command of God and be destroyed. But he could not stop to warn her or strengthen her resolution - nay he could not even look round upon her but must press on in distressing uncertainty. It might be he heard her dying shriek but he could afford no succour. So the Christian may see the convicted sinner beginning to linger in his course and he will feel a most earnest solicitude lest he is about grieving away the Spirit and returning to the world but he cannot do anything to prevent his destruction. Perhaps he may see such an one at last on his death bed mourning that it is over with him forever and already beginning the wailings of perdition - but he can do nothing to rescue him - the Spirit is gone and vain will be his tears and his prayers.

Another remark with which we close is this. We have every reason to fear that this subject shows us the cause why so many persons live careless and indifferent about their condition in eternity. Is it not because when under convictions for sin they violated the command of God and looked back with longing desires after the riches honors or pleasures of the world! There are very few perhaps none we believe in Christian lands who do not feel at some time of life the stirrings of God's Spirit. Now if these do stifle these convictions and resist the grace of God why should we not expect that the judgments of God would follow them and they be left to harden themselves for final ruin? If the violation of a command of God brought such a sudden and awful destruction upon the wife of Lot leaving her a dreadful warning to future times why should not those who resist the Spirit of God be left to hardness of heart and blindness of mind, to treasure up wrath against the day of wrath and to stand forth as a warning to all those who are awakened, to escape for their lives neither to stay in all the plain nor to look behind them but to escape to the mountains lest they be consumed!

Sermon 103 Delusions of Satan

[Sermon No. 103, "Delusions of Satan," Genesis 3:4, 1822 Feb,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 3]

Genesis 3:4

And the serpent said unto the woman ye shall not surely die.

These words are a part of the conversation which decided the fate of our world. The tempter had already insinuated himself deeply into the heart of Eve and was leading her captive at his will. Leaving therefore his cautious manner of address he boldly declared in opposition to the declaration of God that death would not follow the eating of the forbidden fruit. Already must she have been far gone from her original purity and holiness or such a bold and blasphemous declaration would have opened her eyes. Alas the poison of sin had even then stupefied her moral discernment and brought her to be an easy prey to the arch destroyer. The conquest was gained - holiness and happiness and Paradise were lost - the barriers between earth and hell were broken down - disease and death and sin with their ghastly train poured in upon our world like a flood - and at the watch word of their great Captain legions of evil spirits rushed from the chambers of hell spreading abroad on the face of the globe from the east to the west from the north to the south and occupying every convenient station for ambush and beguiling the miserable souls of those whom the serpent deluded. Alas! how dreadfully successful have been the arts of these apostate angels in every generation from the beginning until now! And that first temptation has borne a close resemblance to all that have followed it. In every effort of Satan there appears a wonderful combination of cunning and boldness. So that after he has by well planned stratagems thrown the miserable victim off his guard he pours in upon him feeble and unresisting a flood of the most wanton abuse of God and his laws urging him with motives to the commission of flagrant enormities. In every age after a certain preparation - after having thrown into the soul some poisonous stupefying drug - whereby conscience is laid asleep Satan always declares to men ye shall not surely die.

The fact that there is a mighty influence exerted by the Prince of darkness upon our alienated world is so clearly and repeatedly announced and men are so often guarded against it in the bible that it would seem nothing but the most infidel scepticism could doubt it. For I see no reason why there is not as much ground for denying the existence and the works of Christ as the existence and works of the Adversary - since the existence and works of both these are related in the same manner by the same witness. If we may suppose that the terms Satan Devil the Serpent etc. are merely personifications of the evil dispositions we have within us we have equal reason for supposing that the terms Christ Messiah Redeemer etc. are merely personifications of the virtuous dispositions within us. The fact is the scriptures unequivocally describe a real prince of darkness now working in the children of disobedience and as a roaming lion going about deciding whom he may devour. Against his poisonous influences we are repeatedly cautioned to be on our guard, lest Satan should get an advantage of us. It is the object of this discourse to point out some of his ambushes and stratagems for ruining souls that you may not be ignorant of his devices.

The Christian although professing to have renounced the hidden things of darkness is notwithstanding often exposed to the influences of Satan. And no doubt this adversary to the believers peace will harness and torment him as much as he is permitted seeing he has abandoned his cause and cannot be tormented by him in another world. But it is not my intention at this time to point out any of his wiles that are exercised upon the believer. I wish to exhibit some of those modes by which he leads those who are impenitent captive at his will. That all unregenerate men are peculiarly under his influence cannot be doubted by one any who believe the scriptures. He is said to be now working in the children of disobedience: and who are these if they be not the children of unregeneracy? All men in that state are said by Paul to watch according to the Prince of the power of the air and are taken captive by him at his will. And in another place Satan is called the God of this world an expression evidently implying that the men of the world are his subjects.

If then men in a state of alienation from God are subject to an influence from Satan we may safely conclude that he will exert that influence most powerfully on those occasions and those subjects in which men are most likely to see their danger and abandon his cause - and in which his hand will be least liable to be discovered by the miserable victims. Does the sinner love the world Satan knows how to spread over it a brighter charm and to lessen the apparent magnitude of difficulties. Does a man love fame or pleasure? He knows how to sharpen his appetite for these objects and to conceal the danger of disappointment. Is a man brought by trials to reflection and does he begin to see his lost condition? The tempter is not wanting in artful devices to divert his attention from his head and fix it upon something that will cause forgetfulness of religion. But there are some peculiar points upon which the adversary is most successful which we wish to notice particularly. And we may remark in general terms that his deadliest efforts and hatred seem to be directed against the law of God. We see this sage bursting forth in the words of the text, Thou shalt not surely die. The unbending law of God was, in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die. But Satan abhorred so short a penalty and probably he ate of the forbidden fruit himself before he made such a declaration to the woman.

And it is no wonder that the Prince of darkness should feel a peculiar bitterness of malice and hatred towards the strictness and perfect holiness and goodness of the law of God. For its perfection in these respects had proved his own eternal ruin. It is the law of God that will be his chief tormentor forever and ever. He cannot therefore avoid feeling towards the law a peculiar aversion. And well he knows that if he can persuade men to form too close an estimate of its holiness and extent they will not be alarmed but rest easy under his dominion. He therefore in the first place endeavours to persuade the impenitent that sin is an evil of small magnitude.

Satan made light of the sins of eating the forbidden fruit. And he said unto the woman, yea, hath God said ye shall not eat of any tree in the garden? And the woman said unto the serpent, we may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden. But of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden ye shall not eat of it neither shall you touch it lest ye die. And the serpent said unto the woman ye shall not surely die. How exactly does this language of the serpent agree with that which we often hear in the mouths of infidels on the same subject! They too despise the idea that the mere eating of an apple should have brought such miseries upon this whole world. We are told also by thousands in every age that sin is a limited evil and that to represent it as infinite and evil the least sin to deserve everlasting torments is exaggerated unscriptural and enthusiastic. If any reply as thousands do that they believe the least sin is an evil that cannot be measured and that for their least transgression they deserve eternal misery if they say they decline this because they feel it and feel it as strongly too as they do their own existence - the answer to such is that they are deluded and know not whereof they affirm. Now did not this disposition to represent sin a small evil begin in Paradise with the serpent? And does not every subsequent attempt of the like kind appear as if the same artful tempter were at the bottom of it. For so long as he can persuade men that sin is a small evil in the sight of God so long as he can even keep them in doubt on the subject he well knows they will not be greatly alarmed at this danger nor make any effectual efforts to escape his pangs.

A second method by which Satan persuades men that they shall not surely die is by persuading them that they are much better naturally than the bible represents men and that God will not be over strict in punishing their transgressions.

It seems almost impossible to a man who is brought to see the deceitfulness and depravity of his heart, that any one can doubt that by nature he is a child of wrath and that in him there dwelleth no good thing. For the evidence of such corruption is impressed as and strongly upon his mind as the reality of the light of the sun. And if there be any who are disposed to consider the charge of such deep and entire depravity so unjust and untrue Christian is led to conclude that Satan must have blinded his eyes and closed his ears. Yet there are thousands who do really quarrel with the representation made of their corruption in the bible - and who feel that although they are sinners yet their sins are not very numerous nor aggravated. They conclude that the unsparing representation of sinners in the scriptures are by no means intended for them but for those extremely corrupt characters who are given over to such wickedness greedily: while they who live morally and regularly are by no means in a state of such awful corruption. And although the bible declares that God looked down from heaven upon the children of men to see if there were any that did understand and such after God. But he said that they had all gone astray - that there are none righteous no not one: notwithstanding this unlimited declaration of man's corruption yet Satan so covers up the hearts of many that they have not the slightest conception they are so alienated from God and that their lives have been little else than a series of sins against him. We say Satan covers up their hearts for were men left to themselves in a Gospel land it would seem impossible they should remain long so ignorant of their hearts as to suppose themselves small sinners are that their sins were not aggravated. But this great adversary gives them low and inadequate conceptions of the law of God. He persuades them to believe that if they are moral and decent and honorable in their dealings with men they are not guilty of many violations of God's law although they pay no attention to the first and greatest of the commandments to love God supremely. And so long as he can hide from them then that total deficiency towards God - so long as he can keep them ignorant that God's law extends to secret thoughts desires and motives - so long is he here they will serve him faithfully.

The third delusion of Satan is to persuade men that they can enter heaven without a change of heart.

There are many men who will acknowledge that they have never experienced a regenerating change but notwithstanding have an idea that they shall enter heaven at death. We have endeavoured say they to live as well as was in our power we have always attended to the wants of the poor and needy - we have supported religious institutions - we have observed the Sabbath and no man living can say that we have not been upright and honest and plain hearted in our dealings and we cannot fear that an infinitely benevolent God will punish us for all this and cast us away with the wicked into hell. Many others are resting in such a view of religion as this though they do not openly declare this to be the ground up their hope. But how is it possible for any person to entertain a single moment such a delusive expectation unless his mind be blinded by the adversary. For he reads in the scriptures from the mouth of Christ himself that, except a man be born again he cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven, and also that, not by works of righteousness which we have done but according to his mercy he saved us by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost. Now how is it possible I say for a man who knows that he has never been regenerated to read such passages and yet hope he is going to heaven, how is this possible unless Satan be deluding him? In order to delude him he has only to keep him ignorant of the extent of God's law and when this proclaims death to calm his fears by denying, thou shalt not surely die. God is a Being so much mercy and compassion that he can never cast into hell one who possesses so many good qualities. Hell is provided for the openly wicked but was never intended for the more moral and amiable – thou shalt not surely die.

A fourth delusion of Satan is to turn the attention of impenitent men from their own unregenerate hearts to the sins and faults of professed Christians.

It is astonishing how sagacious unrenewed men are in discovering whether professor of religion live agreeable to their covenant vows. They talk as if they demanded and expected of such a sinless obedience. A man of the world can sin greedily and yet meet with little censure from his impenitent brethren: but the sins of the professed Christian are regarded with a microscopic jealousy: as often their imperfections are magnified into sins.

I am not desirous that men should be less vigilant in spying out the iniquities of those of us who profess to be on the Lord's side. But there is one thing which impenitent men ought to know that in the sight of God they are bound just as strongly as the professors to perform every one of those duties which are incumbent on him. The commands of God are not binding upon one man while another is exempted: and it is no excuse for the nonperformance of one of the least of the commandments of God to say that we are unregenerate and do not profess religion: for God has commanded us to be converted and to profess his Son before for the world - and that too without delay.

Yet notwithstanding this alarming from the view of the subject many impenitent men can give no other reason for not attending to religion than that professors of Christ do not live according to their vows. They feel as if they should repent of their sins were professors more strict in their lives. But now they are led by the conduct of Christians to doubt the whether there is a reality in religion. And they do not feel any inclination to be converted if such is the effect of conversion since they live better with their present view than many do who can relate along experience. That impenitent men have such feelings and professors of religion such feelings cannot be doubted - but the mystery is how any man can feel as if the bad conduct of professing Christians afforded him any excuse for remaining impenitent when in fact this is a most powerful motive for him to embrace religion. For if the church of Christ is so corrupt and the members of it are so remiss in their discipline and if this man has so clear a view of the bad lives of individuals he ought to feel an ardent desire to profess religion that he may be the means of purifying the church. He ought to feel as if it were a solemn duty he owes to Christ. He is the very man to take up the business and if he does not come forward to the task he must account for his neglect to God. If he neglect this course and on this account neglect religion he is following not the dictates of reason but a temptation of Satan. The adversary hides from him the extent of the divine law and leads him to conclude that there are some commands binding upon professed Christians which are not binding upon him: whereas there is not one iota of the law from which he is liberated a moment any more than the professors.

A fifth delusion of Satan is to persuade men that they are not bound to submit to God and embrace Jesus Christ by faith until the grace of God compels them to it. The adversary thus argues with men and indeed by an audible voice as he did with the woman in Paradise but he throws in such reasonings into their minds. The Scriptures says he declare that, salvation is wholly of grace though faith and trust not of yourselves: it is the gift of God - and also that, no man cometh unto Christ except the Father draw him. It is evident then that no man will ever become religious unless God's Spirit be sent to take away his heart of stone and give him a new heart. Hence therefore no man is under obligation to love God and embrace religion until he is moved to it by the grace of God. He has that native aversion to God which effectually prevents his loving religion unless the Spirit draw him - so that he is bound to wait patiently until that Spirit be given.

By such reasoning of the great adversary of souls many have been persuaded to sit down in moping stupidity waiting for the irresistible influences of the Spirit until they found themselves in hell lifting up their eyes being in torments. For whatever be a man's creed if he will read the bible he cannot but see that God commands him to repent and love him now and that there is no condition and annexed to these commands. God does not say, make you a new heart and a new Spirit provided I give you my Spirit - but make you a new heart and a new Spirit. It is not said, God now, commandeth all men every where to repent, provided his Spirit be given unto them - but, God now commandeth all men everywhere to repent - except ye repent ye shall all perish. God does indeed as we believe strive with all men by his Spirit but if he did not men would be under obligations to love him and repent immediately: for it is nothing but their own sinfulness that stands in the way - and this furnishes no excuse whatever. Whoever therefore can believe in the face of all the positive the repeated the unqualified the unconditional commands to love God and repent that are found in the bible whoever can believe that he is not bound to obey these commands unless God grant his Spirit must be in a very dangerous state and it is greatly to be feared is deluded by the adversary. Satan began his temptations upon our race by insinuating that the commands of God were unreasonable. How well calculated to excite the suspicion that God was a hard master was his sarcastic address to the woman, yea hath God said ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden? And so he would still persuade man that he demands an impossibility in requiring them to repent and love him without his Spirit. It is time indeed as we firmly believe that regeneration is alone the work of the Holy Spirit and that man never will obey the commands of God until that Spirit disposes them. But this fact does not lessen by one iota their obligation to repent and love God. To say that anyone is thereby released from his obligations is fatalism. It is following our own feeble reasonings instead of the word of God. It is joining the enemies of the doctrine of man's entire dependance on the grace of God. In short it is yielding to the sophistry of Satan instead of the declarations of God. So long as he can persuade them to believe that their depravity releases them from the obligation to love God until they have the Holy Spirit so long he knows that they are safe in his hands. Indeed until men do feel their immediate obligations to love God they never will love him. The moment they face these they will see their own inability and that moment they will be converted.

These are some of the delusions Satan practices upon men in those things in which they are least suspicious of him. We might swell the list of his delusions to a volume. But we have only time to exhort those who feel their case to be pointed out in any of the preceding cases to arouse from their stupidity and burst forth from their delusions. Long enough my friends have you have you been the willing subjects of the Prince of the power of the air. It is high time to cast off his shackles. It is high time to have your liberty. Resist the devil and he will flee from you. Take up arms against him - rebel against him - fight against him - a little longer delay and his chains will be wrested upon you too firmly to be severed and you will feel his iron yoke galling your neck forever.

Sermon 105 Morality Not Inconsistent with Entire Depravity

[Sermon No. 105, "Morality Not Inconsistent With Entire Depravity," Psalms 58:1-2, 1822 Apr, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 3]

Psalms 58:1-2

*Do ye indeed speak righteousness, O congregation?
Do ye judge uprightly, O ye sons of men? Yea, in heart ye work wickedness.*

[The sequence of the last 5-6 paragraphs is unclear.]

No doctrine of revelation is more frequently misunderstood by those who do not believe it than that of man's depravity. And there is an unqualified and sweeping manner of describing it sometimes used that conveys very erroneous and exaggerated views concerning it and tends to prejudice men against it. For men cannot be made to believe that which is contradictory altogether to their everyday experience. Even the phrase total depravity which is often applied to man's native corruption has often been grossly misinterpreted. It has been said if man be totally depraved he is as bad as he can be. Even devils can be no worse. Now this is by no means the meaning of this phrase. There is a sense indeed in which depravity is total. It is total because it extends to all our faculties. It is total because it consists in an entire alienation from God. But it is not total in such a sense that it could be no greater. For the scriptures and observation do certainly declare devils to be worse than men and some men to be worse than others.

Again it is said if men are totally depraved then there is nothing in their natural character that is honorable or upright or kind or amiable but they exhibit one unalleviated picture of crime and corruption. And since this is contrary to facts this doctrine cannot be true.

But the truth is my hearers that this is a very wrong view of the subject. There are in the human heart many things that are innocent in themselves. Among these may be named the fear of suffering and the desire of happiness. There is surely nothing wrong in the wish all men possess to be free from pain and to possess perfect happiness. So on the other hand in these affections there is nothing holy. They become sinful or holy only through the motives by which they are governed - which may be love to God or hatred of Him.

It is contrary also to all experience to say that there are not in the human heart by nature some characteristics that in this world are amiable and praiseworthy. Among all the depravity that appears in young children who does not sometimes perceive a sweetness of disposition and a tenderness of affection that challenge our affections? Who can dispute and who would wish to dispute that there is much that is interesting and amiable in the tender affection of the parent for the child or of the child for the parent the husbands for the wife or the wife for the husband - the brother for the brother the sister for the sister or the friend for the friend? Instances are certainly numerous where the friendships that result from these affections have given rise to deeds the most generous and noble. Sacrifices of one friend for another have been witnessed not only of ease, wealth, and reputation but even of life as the apostle testifies - peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die. A man also by his modesty and diffidence may draw from us admiration and love and readily for this be praise worthy. He may also be eminently compassionate and may take a lively interest in alleviating the miseries of his fellow men and weep with them in affliction and rejoice with them in their joys. He may indeed spread around him so liberally his charities and bestow them with such a seeming disinterestedness that he may draw towards him the love of the poor and needy and the admiration of the world - and so high may he stand as a compassionate and kindhearted and benevolent man that the wretched are never turned away from his door without carrying his charities - and no object of public beneficence solicits his assistance in vain. He may carry with him a heart so tenderly alive to a cry of misery and so full of compassion and tenderness for his fellows that he finds a spontaneous effort within him to lend a helping hand to soften the wretchedness and increase the happiness of society. He may possess a high minded generosity that puts his name always among the first in the amount of his benevolent acts. And so firmly have taken possession of his soul that he scorns whatever is mean or vicious or intriguing and exhibits an unyielding and independant course of conduct in his dealings with men. So that his word is sacred and his faith is confided in as sincerely as if he were bound by ever so many written contracts - and so far may he be from duplicity and overreaching that in a bargain he does precisely to others as he would they should do unto him. In short so strong and fixed may be the sense of doing that which is right that it operates uniformly upon his conduct and settles down into a constant principle of action - and he is regarded by all around him as indeed he may be a compassionate, tender- hearted, charitable, upright, honorable, generous, honest and strictly conscientious man - in whom so far as this world is concerned all confidence may be placed. And for these qualities he may obtain as he deserves the respect and love of society and contribute by his exertions to spread peace and comfort and civilization and good order over the face of society.

All this may a man be - all this have many been - all this was the ruler in the Gospel whom Christ loved - all this were many in Pagan Greece and Rome - all this may a man be who nevertheless carries in his heart the essence - the root of that universal depravity from which the scripture declares not one is exempt - no not one. We do not deny to the unrenewed man all the interesting qualities that have been enumerated - neither do the scriptures deny him these. What then is the element - the essence of that depravity which holy men of old speaking as they were moved by the Holy Ghost charge upon us with such emphasis and solemnity. The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men - for what? Not to see whether there were any who were kind neighbors - faithful friends - compassionate, upright, and charitable men - but to see if there are any that did understand and seek God. And did he find any such? They are all gone aside, they are altogether become filthy: there is none that doeth with God no, not one. Although there were many who were amiable and honourable in the things of this world there was none righteous no not one. Here then we see in what their depravity chiefly consisted - viz. in neglecting to love and to serve God - in neglecting the first and the greatest commandment. And this is the charge that is made upon every son and daughter of Adam: for the scriptures say the Lord looked down upon the children of men - not upon a part of them - and this neglect to love obey and worship God - this denies the creature more than the Creator - this is the essence of depravity - this it is that makes us children of wrath - this is it that causes God to be angry with us every day. We may take up this charge which the scripture makes and carry it now to the whole human family and alas it will be found awfully true. Among all that is kind and benevolent and amiable and generous and noble in this world how common is it to find that the God who gave all these fine affections and faculties and continues them in play is forgotten and his first and chief commandment neglected. Yes this is a view of the subject which unrenewed men rarely take. It is one of the most difficult lessons men ever learn to be convinced that if they fulfill their duties toward their fellow men never so exactly and conscientiously this is no proof that they are religious if they do not love God supremely. And thousands there are who go into eternity expecting to enter heaven because they have been so kind and charitable and upright towards men although they have not complied with the greatest commandment to give their affection supremely to God who have not lived in the habit of prayer and repentance and actively striving to promote God's glory - and who therefore are no more fit for heaven than the most abandoned outlaw on earth - since both are wanting in that only thing that can render heaven a happy place viz. love to God. But it is next to impossible to convince moral and amiable men of this grand distinction between worldly morality and love to God. There is on the subject a deep slumber resting upon the men of the world so deep that the Spirit of God only can break it. Yet we should never neglect making the effort in the humble hope that God's Spirit may render effectual our words.

It appears from the text that the same mixing together of worldly morality and holiness was common in the days of David. It seems men asserted themselves to be righteous merely because of their external actions without a regard to the motives by which they here moved. And never was there a keener specimen of sarcasm than the question put in the text - for they certainly are sarcastic although this is a very uncommon mode of speech in the Bible. Do ye indeed speak righteousness, O congregation? Do ye judge uprightly O ye sons of men? That is do your professions of kindness and humility and honesty and sincerity and exalted benevolence and generosity and candor and charity do these things indeed prove you to declare righteousness? Do ye judge uprightly ye sons of men in regard to the nature of God's law and character and of holiness and of heaven? Do ye indeed judge uprightly from right motives in regard to your fellow men? Yea in heart ye work wickedness. Your motives are not right in the sight of God. The love of God does not lie at the bottom of all your works and your judgments and therefore in your hearts you are devising wickedness. For God regards the motives of men: he looks on the heart and if a regard to his glory be not the governing principle of your conduct whatever may be your professions you are in fact working wickedness. Your outward conduct cannot recommend you in the least to God unless your hearts be right with him.

It is by some suspected that David referred in this passage to Sarah and other of his enemies who might have professed to try him in a legal manner. And yet he seems to have a more extensive meaning since he speaks of the sons of men an expression which normally denotes all mankind. And he seems here to be describing the wickedness of the natural heart: for he proceeds to say the wicked are estranged from the womb: they go astray as soon as they be born spreading lies. But whether the Psalmist had so extensive a meaning certainly the world will apply thus externally and they contain an admirable sarcasm upon the supposed righteousness of those who although moral and amiable do not love God.

Let us apply them for instance to the man of delicate sensibility and compassion for the distressed: but who neglects God. And does such an one indeed speak righteousness and judge uprightly? Certainly it is right to enter with a lively interest into the distresses of our brethren. But alas many a man who has felt his soul poured out within him like water at the spectacle of distress in man has never yet felt on one emotion of compassion or tenderness at the spectacle of a bleeding Saviour. His sensibility may never have been awakened within him when contemplating, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us that we should be called the sons of God. The joys of heaven and the pains of hell - the glorious character of God and the interesting relations and we bear to him. These most sublime and interesting subjects may not awaken within his heart a single emotion of love or gratitude or penitence! And yet this man is admired among men as a pattern of tender and compassionate feelings. But how does he appear in the sight of his God? totally insensible as he is towards the purest holiest and most interesting objects in the universe. We do not say that his sensibility and compassion are of no avail. They avail much in this world - and they have too their rewards. But limited as they are to this world they do not prove anything like righteousness in his soul. Yea in his heart he works wickedness. For the God who gave him all these fine and tender feelings and who requires of him that he devote them to religion - that God is forgotten - and treated with cold neglect. What a meeting then will there be between the man and his God in judgment!

But suppose these sensibilities and this compassion for the miserable have led this man to pour forth his liberal charities upon all the poor and deserving around him and made many and great sacrifices to the public good and all this apparently from a sincere desire for others happiness - will not these noble acts be of some avail to recommend this man to God in the judgment? If in performing these deeds he has acted from a regard to the will of God - if he has loved and served God at the same time - certainly these actions will avail much. But if he has neglected God in all this let the apostle answer the question - Though I bestow all my goods to find the poor and though I give my body to be burned and have not charity it profiteth me nothing. And you all know my hearers that by charity in this passage the apostle means supreme love and devotion to God as well as to man.

Let us apply the text to another description of merely moral man. Take the man who in all his dealings with his fellows aims at the most perfect righteousness - who scorns to overreach his neighbor in the least - who regard his verbal promise as binding as a written contract and who conscientiously endeavors in all his worldly dealings to do unto others as he would they should do unto him. Now cannot such a man in the day of judgment look all the men in the face without trembling knowing that all of them are ready to bear witness to his honesty and integrity and will he have any thing of fear from a just God? Alas the justice of God is that from which he has every thing to fear. Nothing would be more awful than that God should do him strict justice. Nay if God should do him strict justice - Nay if God should treat him as he has treated God his case would be hopeless. For he has neglected the first great commandment all his days without feeling any compunction. While he was so very exact in sending to everyone their dues and so strict in balancing the accounts between himself and his neighbors - he was neglected that much longer and more important account between his soul and his God. To God he owed himself. And yet he has never taken one step towards adjusting that account although God has all along invited and urged him to it. He has been guilty of the blackest injustice towards God. He has been robbing God of what was his due viz. his heart and affections. And now if God executes justice upon him he will deliver him to the Judge and the Judge to the officer and he will be cast into prison and come not out till he has paid the uttermost farthing.

In like manner we might apply the text to every other description of merely moral men who neglect the love and service of God and Christ and show that notwithstanding their smart and elevated morality they do in their hearts work wickedness because their apparent good deeds are from defective and rotten motives and in them all God is neglected. But no doubt there are many who find themselves in the possession and practice of such an elevated morality as has been described and who imagine this to be an evidence that they do love God: since they cannot conceive how such kind and compassionate and benevolent and conscientious feelings should spring from anything else. No doubt this most delusive notion has sent many a deluded man to perdition. Let the following illustrations show how groundless is the supposition.

Let it be imagined that the whole world were under the dominion of a just and benignant Prince who had enacted a most powerful and equitable and reasonable system of laws reaching to all the conduct of his subjects. Suppose now that the inhabitants of a certain island revolt against this prince and cast off every one of his laws. In the course of time these rebels would find it necessary to establish by mutual consent some laws of their own. They could not exist as a society unless it were regarded as necessary to be kind and compassionate and charitable to one another - upright and honest in their dealings - and honorable and open-hearted and benevolent in their conduct. And there would very soon be established in such a society a certain standard of morality and those who lives the nearest this standard would be regarded as the most worthy among them and be most honored and beloved - while he who neglected the standards would be despised and punished. In short there would be among these rebels the worthy and the unworthy - the moral and the immoral. - virtuous and the corrupt - just as strongly marked as among the subjects of the Prince from whom they have revolted. But the standard of their morality would differ in one important respect from that which exists among the subjects of this Prince although in most things they might coincide. These rebels would regard it perfectly justifiable to maintain their rebellion against their former Prince; and that man would be most celebrated for his virtues among them who would be most forward and zealous and daring in defense of their rebellion. Whereas at the court of the Prince their rebellion would be regarded as an act which rendered them deserving of the severest punishment.

Suppose still farther that this Prince should neglect for many years to subdue these rebels - even until the generation that originally broke loose from his authority were all passed away and the children had taken their place. It is easy to conceive how far this revolted society might have advanced in civilization and morality. And as their former Prince had not for many years molested them they might perhaps have almost forgotten that he was their enemy. But in the court of that Prince they would still be regarded as rebels and let him only renew his demand upon them to submit to his laws and authority and all their enmity would be awakened and stir them up to the most determined and obstinate resistance.

Now my hearers how exactly does this representation suit the case of the rebellious and alienated world. We see much that is kind and compassionate and upright and honorable and noble and benevolent on the face of society - and there is a very wide difference between the man who exhibits these interesting and praiseworthy traits of character and the man who exhibits the opposite of all these. But at the same time how very possible is it that in the court of heaven we may every one of us be regarded as revolted from God and therefore deserving the blackness of darkness forever! The man in whose character all worldly virtues are conspicuous may nevertheless be totally regardless of God - and live without communion with him or any abiding sense of his presence. And although until God urge him by his Spirit to cast away the weapons of rebellion and to submit to his laws and authority he may feel no peculiar opposition to his character yet until a great moral renovation be wrought upon him is he in fact destitute of that only thing which can qualify him for the society of heaven. He does not love and serve God. Alas how many there are of this character! How many there are who win our love by their amiable and upright conduct but who give no evidence that they love God! How many who seem determined to make no distinction between worldly morality and love to God!

The subject we have at this time discussed shows us the reason why the profligate and openly corrupt man is often convicted and converted while many amiable and moral man remains unaffected. If an abandoned man can once be made to turn his eyes upon his heart for a moment he sees his iniquity and he is alarmed at the awful prospect. Thus cut off at once from all hope from within he is led forth with to look to Christ and to seize upon his cross and save him from sinking into the abyss of hell. But not so the man of many moralities. His heart although not entirely free from sin appears to him not very bad - and long will he build upon self righteousness and feel unwilling to believe that he is a candidate for perdition. And thus will he go on month after month and perhaps year after year trusting to that which will not stand him one moment in the day of judgment.

In the second place we learn from this subject what is the first question that will be put to us at the day of judgment. It will be have you observed the first commandment? to love the Lord your God with all your heart and mind and strength? The moral man may reply that he was honest and upright and compassionate and benevolent in all his dealings on earth and he always revered religious institutions. But the judge will admit no such replies as these for a man might have done all this and yet have been an enemy of God. The Judge therefore will repeat the enquiry – have you loved and served God? And if we cannot answer this question in the affirmative He will never enquire whether we have kept the second commandment. Our eternal destiny will turn upon the point whether we have loved God. This consideration ought to make those of us who mix together worldly morality and love to God tremble. It will be an awful disappointment to go to the judgment seat of Christ loaded with the applause of an admiring world for our amiable qualities and exalted deeds of morality and yet hear the Judge declare – I know you not whence ye are – depart from me ye worker of iniquity.

Sermon 106 Universal Obedience Necessary

[Sermon No. 106, "Universal Obedience Necessary," I John 2:3, 1822 Apr,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 3]

I John 2:3

And hereby do we know that we know him, if we keep his commandments.

The question, Am I a Christian?, is the most important that can be proposed to the human mind. It is no wonder that he who realizes the infinite consequences depending upon it should come to the examination of it with a trembling and awful solicitude. The man who is given up to the control of his ungodly lusts and is by them reduced to such a hardness of heart and blindness of mind as to disbelieve or be insensible to the day of judgment may indeed treat this question with a contemptuous indifference. So the man of the world who is too much occupied with its pursuits to spend time for its examination may put it off to a more convenient season. But the sober engineer after enquirer after truth the man who has a just sense of the shortness and uncertainty of life and who believes there is a judgment to follow death and that every man will be rewarded according to his works such an one cannot sit down to sum up the evidences of a Christian character without a deep solemnity and an anxious intent in the application of it to himself. It is not as the world too often imagine the mark of weakness and cowardice to be concerned for our souls if we find any reason for supposing ourselves to be destitute of a Christian character. It is on the contrary an evidence that our minds are beginning to break the shackles of sin and to act according to their true dignity when we feel within us a deep anxiety. The world may indeed ridicule such feelings: but of what consequence is this if God and holy angels and pious men regard them as marks of the truest wisdom! To feel indifferent whether we bear about us the marks of true piety is indeed to scorn immortality. When God has threatened us with everlasting destruction unless our characters be changed it is not a mark of courage to treat his threatenings with unconcern: but it is an evidence of foolhardiness - of a beastly stupidity - of a real madness.

And can the important question whether we be really children of God be satisfactorily decided? Certainly it can or the apostle had never said, Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith prove your own selves. Know ye not your own selves how that Jesus Christ is in you except by reprobates? Nor would John have said, we know that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren - nor could he have uttered with propriety the text - hereby do we know that we know him if he keep his commandments.

It is not my intention however at this time to set before you the numerous evidences of regeneration the scriptures and experience furnish. A particular part of this evidence will occupy our attention. The following proposition seems to be contained in the text that and unreserved and universal obedience to the commands of Christ is necessary to prove that we are believers in him to the saving of our souls. That is to say no other evidence can prove us to have been born again if it be not accompanied by this entire obedience.

The first proof of this proposition is the express declaration of scripture.

The text certainly conveys this idea - hereby do we know that we know him if we keep his commandments. And the succeeding verse yet plainer - He that saith I know him and keepeth not his commandments is a liar and the truth is not in him. If ye love me says Christ keep my commandments. He that hath my commandments and keepeth them he it is that loveth me. Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you. If ye love me keep my commandments. Not every one that saith unto me Lord Lord shall enter the kingdom of heaven: but he that doeth the will of my Father that is in heaven. Ye shall know them by their fruits. And every one that beareth these sayings of mine and doeth them not shall be likened unto a foolish man which built his house upon the sand: and the rain descended and the floods came and the winds blew and beat upon that house and it fell: and great was the fall of it. Says Paul. This is a faithful saying and many things I will that thou affirm constantly that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works: these things are good and profitable unto men. Says James - Be ye doers of the word and not hearers only deceiving your own selves. What does it profit my brother though a man say he have faith and have not works? Can faith save him? Wilt thou know O vain men that faith without works is dead? Ye see then how that by works a man is justified and not by faith only. Whosoever shall keep the whole law and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all.

These texts of scripture manifestly teach these two things - first without obedience to the commands of Christ all other evidences of our intent in him are of no value - and secondly that this obedience must be unreserved and universal. By this phrase I do not mean a sinless obedience: for this is not possible and there never yet has been on earth a just man except Christ that did good and sinned not. I mean merely an obedience that aims to be universal - that does not indulge habitually in any course of conduct or in the omission of any duty that is known to be contrary to God's will. It is not an obedience that reserves the right of keeping the weightier matters of the law and of neglecting the smaller: but which feels an obligation to comply with every one of the commandments and actually endeavors to comply with them and which does comply with every one of them though infrequently. Without such an obedience no man has a right to expect he shall know that he has an interest in Christ.

The second argument proving the position that universal and unreserved obedience is necessary to prove that we are regenerate is that every other evidence of piety has its counterfeits - that is to say there have been those in every age who for a time seemed and really believed themselves to possess every other evidence of their interest in Christ except good works who have nevertheless found at last that they had neither part nor lot in the matter.

One good evidence of a change of heart is deep convictions of sin. A person perhaps is brought most deeply to feel how exceeding sinful how vilely ungrateful he has been in the sight of God. He has an overpowering sense of the vileness of sin before an holy God. He is astonished how forbearance of God could have been exercised towards him so long. He feels that he richly deserves everlasting torments for his sins and unless the sovereign mercy of God be exercised towards him he knows that everlasting torment will be his portion. He is brought as he imagines to throw himself upon the mercy of God in Christ and receives comfort and has a sense of forgiven sin. And when he looks back upon his exercises he is led from scripture and the conversation of his brethren to regard his deep and pungent convictions as a good mark in favour of his having experienced a change of heart. And indeed such convictions as I have described are very favourable evidence: for they are the feelings every real Christian has within him and it is not very often that a man is deceived by them. Yet the difficulty is they are in some instances wholly delusive. Instances are not infrequent in which men with just such convictions as they really supposed do after a time apostatize and thus prove that they are wholly deceived. So that convictions however favourable in appearance are not sufficient to rest our hope upon unless they be succeeded by a disposition to keep the commandments.

Another evidence on which men are apt to rely as proof of regeneration is the remarkable and sudden change they recollect to have passed in their feelings. After experiencing for a time such convictions as have been supposed above they find at once their distress suddenly to leave them and tranquility and peace to succeed and perhaps also a remarkable degree of joy. Now they find their views of God's character to be radically altered and Christ seems to them the chief among ten thousands and the one altogether lovely. The scriptures appear a new book. Passages are plain to them now that formerly were unintelligible. Every thing around them in the nature and providence assumes a different aspect. God seems to be in every thing and his presence is no longer painful. Christians appear the the excellence of the earth and their affections are drawn out towards them so far as they are like Christ. In fine they can appropriate to themselves the declaration of Paul that, if any man be in Christ he is a new creature old things are passed away behold all things are become new.

Now such a change in the convicted sinner's feelings is perfectly agreeable to the scripture as the case of the converted jailor will show. And many a real Christian though not all such have experienced such a mighty and sudden revolution within them. And it would be a decisive mark of a real change of heart were it not for the fact that many instances are on record in which all these feelings have been supposed to be experienced and yet the persons have at length returned to the world like the dog to his vomit thus proving their feelings to be delusion. And this consideration shows the necessity of having something to corroborate the reality of genuineness of such a change in the heart. And this something is an obedient life.

The same remarks might be applicable to all those exercises which are supposed to furnish evidence of a new heart - such as an anxiety for the impenitent - an unusual spirit of prayer feeling of ardent affection towards everything religious - a spirit of humility etc. We say they are not to be confided in without some corroborating evidence - not because they are not real Christian exercises: for they most certainly are such; but because they have sometimes been counterfeited. Satan can and sometimes does transform himself into an angel of light and he has been able to produce in the hearts of some individuals something so much resembling real religious exercises that men in an unguarded moment have been deluded into the belief that they were really converted when in fact they remain in the gall of bitterness and then bond of iniquity. But the text applies a test of these supposed religious feelings. If they lead to unreserved and universal obedience they are the work of God - if they do not lead to this they are the work of Satan.

It may be urged however in reply that these considerations although they show the security of obedience in general terms still do not prove universal and entire obedience to be necessary. And perhaps a man may have a firm assurance of his piety if he feels disposed to observe the great fundamental commandments of God's laws although he neglect some others of minor importance. But what ground is there in the scriptures for making any exception in regard to any - even the least of God's commandments? Surely the text furnishes none: for we might as well suppose according to the text that a man might neglect the most important commands and observe the lesser ones and yet have evidence of piety. Christ does not say to his followers - observe the principal part of the commandments and give I give you and you shall have conclusive evidence that you are my friend: but he says, ye are my friends if I do whatsoever I command you. But there is a passage of scripture conclusive on the point: whosoever shall keep the whole law and yet offend in one point he is guilty of all. That is to say he who knowingly and habitually violates one of God's commandments shows that his heart is not right and entitles as real (evidences as much) disregard and contempt of the Lawgiver as if he violates every command of the decalogue. Hence then we may conclude most certainly that not only a partial but an universal and unreserved obedience is absolutely necessary to accompany other evidence of our Christian character or we can never know can never have an assurance that we are the friends and servants of Christ. It is presumed my hearers that not one of you have any doubt on a point so clear and essential. I propose therefore to draw some inferences from the subject.

In the first place I suggest a caution. Let no one conclude from what has been said that the mere performance of good works is in itself conclusive proof that we are new creatures in Christ Jesus and that all other evidences are of no value because they are sometimes counterfeited. So are good works counterfeited. Many a man who had little doubt that his supposed observance of the commandments of God would furnish him with a sure passport to heaven has doubtless found in eternity that his obedience was merely external and not from a supreme love to God. Obedience is however necessary to show that our exercises are not delusions; and exercises are necessary to prove obedience to be founded on right motives. There is not any one evidence of a Christian character that may not be counterfeited: yet when they all meet together in an individual the conclusion is inevitable that such a person is a Christian. They form a constellation too bright for Satan to imitate. Religious exercises therefore such as conviction for sin - a sense of unworthiness and demerit - a spirit of prayer and humility and patience - these are as necessary as religious deeds to prove us adopted into the family of God. But still the one without the other does not afford any satisfactory ground for hope.

In the second place that subject shows us that no degree of conviction for sin and no ecstasies of joy succeeding - nor any degree of assurance in young converts afford any conclusive evidence of their regeneration unless these things be succeeded by an entire and universal obedience. When such persons find within themselves a disposition to take up the cross daily to follow Christ - when they find taking hold of the work of religion not from a momentary impulse but as a business for life - when they find themselves more desirous to do the will of God than to obtain visions and revelations of their interest in Christ - in short when they find themselves, adding to their faith virtue and to virtue knowledge and to knowledge temperance and to temperance patience and to patience godliness and to godliness brotherly kindness and to brotherly kindness charity - then do such persons begin to exhibit a conclusive evidence to themselves and others that the work of religion is really begun in their hearts and especially as weeks and months pass away, these things be in them and abound so that they be neither barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of their Lord and Saviour, then may we be, confident that he which hath begun a good work in them will continue it until the day of Jesus Christ.

In the third place let not the young convert be discouraged because he finds himself so far deficient in his obedience to the commandments of Christ. Let him not be discouraged I say if he finds within himself earnest desires and sincere endeavors to obey every one of the requirements of scripture. He has but just entered the Christian course and it is to be expected that he will find great difficulties in the way of his obedience arising from a wicked and deceitful heart an opposing world and a subtle adversary from the lower world. This Christian who has long been engaged in the conflict may be expected to exhibit a more perfect obedience because he is better able to cope with this spiritual enemies. And if the young convert find a sincere and ardent desire to fulfill all righteousness and a deep penitence for his deficiencies he may hope also to go on unto perfection and be a successful soldier of Christ. Let his deficiencies (shortcomings) in duty lead him not to despair and sloth but to renewed and more diligent exertions. Some in such case give up their hope and abandon all efforts.

In the last place the subject discovers to us a probable reason why very many real Christians are left to doubt and darkness.

It is because they live in the habitual neglect of some known duty. And perhaps they are sincere in this neglect assigning is a reason that before they attempt to performance they want a brighter evidence of their interest in the merits of Christ - lest by attempting to perform the duty they shall be guilty of greater sin than they now are in neglecting it. If they could only obtain conclusive evidence of their change of heart they feel resolved to enter vigorously upon this neglected duty. But the text cuts such persons off from any reasonable expectation of obtaining evidence of their piety so long as they neglect to observe the least of Christ's commandments. For it is implied in the declaration, hereby do we know that we know him if we keep his commandments, implies that we shall not know that we know him unless we keep his commandments. To observe these in the way and the only way in which in ordinary cases evidence can be obtained that we are the children of God. If we neglect therefore the least of Christ's commandments we cannot expect that our doubts will ever be removed - but that they will increase every succeeding month.

These remarks will apply to the omission of any known duty: but there is one case of neglect that is of very frequent occurrence and which deserves particular remarks. I mean the neglect of many who indulge a hope that they are Christians to make a feeble profession of religion. There is scarcely a person who has any degree of hope that he is a child of God who does not believe it his duty to comply with the command of Christ respecting the Lord's supper, this do in remembrance of me, and therefore we need not stop to show that this is one of God's commandments. But the reason generally offered in such cases for not taking the vows of God upon them in public is that their hope is too feeble and their doubts too many. But if the text be true to neglect of such a command of life is to continue in doubt - since a strong faith is promised only to those who do whatever Christ commands them. And we would ask those who neglect this duty on such grounds whether as weeks and months and perhaps years pass away they do find their evidences brightening? Do they not rather find them becoming firmer and fewer? It is we believe almost generally the fact that those who neglect this solemn duty on such grounds do find that instead of becoming more fit for the ordinance of the Lord's supper they become less so and find their darkness to increase. At this rate how long will it be before they will be ready to take up the cross and follow Christ.

But persons of this description may reply do you wish us to profess that religion we do not possess? Certainly not we answer. But there are very many who, though they feel unfit for coming to the Lord's table, still indulge hope that they are Christians. That is to say in plain words they feel as if they should join his perfectly pure and holy church in heaven whenever they die but still feel as if they were not fit for joining the church of Christ on earth. Strange contradiction? and yet frequently to be found!

But say they we may be deceived and then we shall apostatize and disgrace the profession. This may be the case but in nine cases out of ten it is merely a delusion of sine metu - to prevent men from doing their whole duty. The truth is it is no small cross to profess religion before an ungodly world and it brings along with it much scoffing and reproach and imposes new restraints upon our worldly inclinations and therefore our hearts shrink from the undertaking. We do not love in have any additional restraints put upon us. Yet so deceitful are our hearts that we imagine that are our neglect of professing Christ proceeds from a fear that we shall wound him in the house of his friends. Whereas we feel but little anxiety that we should dishonor Christ by remaining in the midst of a world lying in wickedness and neglecting to come out from it and be separate. This reflection does not distress us half as much as the fear of disgracing him by apostasy. I do not say that this is the fact in every case: but it is to be feared that in too many cases our hearts do deceive us in this manner.

And can it be that there are any real children of God who are willing to remain in the ranks of his enemies? And to be counted by the world as on their side? Are there any who have felt the love of their Saviour and yet neglect to come up to his help against the mighty? Christ has a cause on earth to be maintained against powerful enemies and he looks to those whom he has regenerated and washed from their sins to take upon them the whole armor of God and fight manfully in his service. And now is it not ungrateful - does it not look like cowardice to neglect to come forward boldly and decidedly to enlist under the great captain of our salvation and maintain his cause to the utmost of our powers and abilities?

My friend let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter - it is this. We are born either to profess publicly our faith in Christ or to abandon altogether every hope that we are Christians. There is no consistent middle course. For he who is really born again ought to let the world know it and come out from it and be separate and touch not the unclean things and come to the table of his Redeemer and he who is not born again ought to know it and to feel that he is in the gall of bitterness and the bonds of iniquity. And he ought to feel this soon so that he may repent before he dies. Let us all therefore come to a decision one way or the other. Let us come to a decision soon! For time is hurrying us with an eagle swiftness to the bar of God and what we do must be done quickly. Delay and indecision are the two great instruments by which Satan has led millions to ruin.

Sermon 108 Unworthy Reception of the Lord's Supper

[Sermon No. 108, "Unworthy Reception of the Lord's Supper," I Corinthians 11:29, 1822 May, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 4]

I Corinthians 11:29

For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body.

In writing a discourse for these words it is highly important in the first place that we ascertain what is the nature of the damnation here spoken of as a consequence of unworthily partaking of the Lord's supper. It has been the opinion of some that it means nothing else than the eternal damnation of hell. And if this be the sole meaning this is a most alarming passage to those of us who are members of the visible church. For who among us is there who is not conscious of having sometimes eaten and drunk unworthily?

But the after examining the point critically my hearers we feel confident this is not the meaning. Dr. Doddridge thus paraphrases the passage, For he that eateth and drinketh in an irreverent profane and unworthy manner must certainly displease and provoke God; so that it may truly be said that he eateth and drinketh judgment to himself: he takes the readiest way to bring down the judgments of God upon him, not distinguishing the Lord's body, nor making that proper difference which he ought to make between that and common food. And in a note he remarks, I think is the most unhappy mistake in all our versions of the bible that the word κρίμα is here rendered damnation. The apostle afterwards says we are judged (that is as he afterwards explains it if we are corrected) that we may not be condemned; which plainly shows the judgment spoken of might be fatherly chastisements. This sin, as sin, does indeed expose us to condemnation, should God be extreme to mark it as an irreverent behaviour under any other ordinance does; but it is superstition to set this at so vast a distance from all the rest as many do.

Dr. Macknight an eminent critic has this paraphrase of the text. For he who eateth and drinketh the Lord's supper improperly subjects himself to punishment because he does not discriminate the symbols of the body of the Lord from common bread and wine designed for the nourishment of life.

Dr. Scott translates the phrase, eat and drink judgment to himself: his very attendance on this ordinance says he would offend God and expose him to his righteous judgment because he had made no proper discrimination between the bread and wine which represented the Lord's body as offered on the cross to be a sacrifice for our sins to be received by faith and an ordinary meal. This irreverence being a heinous crime would doubtless subject a man to final condemnation if he did not repent; but it is evident that apostle did not mean that it was in its own nature unpardonable or sealed a man's damnation as many have supposed; for he uses addressing Christians and warning theme to beware of those temporal judgments with which God chastised his offending servants. The scruples and consequent negligence of numbers who seem in other things to obey Christ have no ground in this passage except in the apparent harshness of our translation in which the word that signifies judgment is hardened damnation which commonly means eternal punishment. Thus he -

Let any one look candidly at the text and context and we think he will allow these comments and explanations to be consistent and scriptural. You recollect the apostle is here reproving the Corinthians for abuse of the Lord's supper. They did not it seems make a suitable distinction between this and a common meal. They brought their own provisions and devoured them apart from their brethren in selfish loneliness and some made this sacred feast an occasion of excess and drunkenness. These abuses were surely very great and received accordingly the marked reprobation of Paul. And he took occasion to exhibit to them the true nature and design of the ordinances and then added the text as a general warning against future perversions of it. But certainly he had his eye principally upon temporal judgments in the passage. For in the next verse he says, for this cause many are weak and sickly among you and many sleep. It seems then that the consequence of eating and drinking unworthily had been to some of them sickness of body and to others it had been death. If the latter did not repent before they died doubtless the consequence of eating and drinking unworthily was eternal damnation - just as this might be the consequence of any other sin. But it is most evident that some of the offending Corinthians were only punished with sickness for unworthily partaking of the Lord's supper and therefore the apostle did not mean that the inevitable result of this sin would be the pains of hell forever. It is manifest too that some were more unworthy than others since some were only sick while others were dead. And such doubtless has been the case in every age. No doubt a man may eat and drink so unworthily as to seal up his everlasting damnation. No doubt too a man may do this unworthily and yet have a space left for repentance and suffer nothing but temporal evils for his offence. And so between eating and drinking most unworthily and least unworthily there may be very many degrees and of course different degrees of punishment. I proceed in the second place to mention instances in which professors of religion eat and drink unworthily beginning with those cases which are most offensive in the sight of God and proceeding to those that are less heinous.

The case of Judas Iscariot is probably the strongest that can be mentioned. He sat down to the Lord's Supper knowing himself not only to be destitute of religion but being also resolved to betray his Master. In other words he observed this supper for the purpose of perpetrating a deed of villainy. He was a hypocrite in the most comprehensive sense of the term. Under the cloak of friendship he hid a dagger. He betrayed his Lord and Master and friend with a kiss. No doubt such a man by observing the sacramental supper with such motives did eat and drink to himself damnation without measure and without end. And we have reason to fear that in every succeeding age there have been those who approached the table of Christ knowing themselves to be actuated by no other motive than a wish thereby to promote some worldly selfish object - men perhaps who carried a concealed dagger to plunge into the vitals of that very religion they thus professed to honor and love. But such men must expect they have every reason to expect the by thus hypocritically and abominably eating the body and drinking the blood of Christ they shall be given up, to strong delusions to believe a lie that they may be damned. Whether those who profess religion merely because it happens to be fashionable and that they may not lose their popularity without any other motives whether such belong to this class of hypocrites I would not certainly decide. But surely they approximate closely to this class and it would be difficult to draw the line between them.

This case of Judas and his imitators is the only one which we should dare to say will inevitably result in the everlasting destruction of men. We shall proceed to enumerate some other instances of eating and drinking unworthily - and although in certain circumstances some of these cases may be particularly aggravated and may perhaps provoke God to sneer in his wrath that the subjects of them shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven yet ordinarily we believe they like other sins render us liable to everlasting punishment but if repented of will through the rich mercy of God in a Saviour be forgiven.

The second case of an unworthy partaker of the Lord's supper is when a person has united himself with the church in the sincere belief that he was a Christian but finds afterwards that he has deceived himself with a false hope and that he has neither part nor lot in the matter. Most certainly such an one cannot discern the Lord's body and therefore eats and drinks damnation to himself. But he was sincere in his profession of religion and perhaps the injudicious urgency of some Christian friend led him to suppose himself born again when he was still in the gall of bitterness and the bonds of iniquity. And although it was not withstanding a sinful act because he ought to have examined himself more thoroughly and prayerfully yet there is no reason to believe this to be one of the most aggravated kinds of sins and therefore not the unpardonable one. Certainly it will not compare in heinousness with those open and scandalous offenses the apostle reproves in the Corinthians. Yet as we have already remarked some of these were punished only by sickness and if that sickness led them to repentance doubtless they escaped everlasting perdition. Certainly then those persons who in sincerity profess before they possess religion have no reason to conclude themselves given over to destruction but that there is some space and a call to repentance. Their sin is not in ordinary cases the unpardonable one.

But persons of this description who are satisfied that they are still unregenerate will immediately enquire whether they ought not upon the discovery omit to attend the communion service until God be pleased to convert them. The answer we should give to such an enquiry is that it is their duty immediately to repent. But they will say until we have repented ought we not to keep away from the Lord's supper. Again we reply, except ye repent ye shall all perish. Now is the accepted time; behold now is the day of salvation. But we remark in passing that these members of the visible church who live along month after month and year after year in a distressing anxiety lest they are not Christians and who come to the Lord's supper with so deep a sense of their unworthiness that they are almost induced to stay away these are not usually the persons who are eating and drinking damnation to themselves. On the contrary they are generally the most worthy partakers of the body and blood of Christ - and those who sit down to his table as carelessly and unpreparedly as they go about their ordinary business and this not once or twice merely but uniformly these are the members that ought not to have a hope if they have one - and these are eating and drinking damnation to themselves although we have every reason to suppose that in general the door of repentance and mercy is not closed against them if they will rise from their stupidity.

The next instance in which the professor of religion eats and drinks unworthily is when he does not feel the need nor even believe in the doctrine of Christ's atonement. To hold up that grand fundamental principle of revealed religion was the great object in the institution of this sacrament as is evident from the symbols used in it. The Lord Jesus the same night in which he was betrayed took bread; and when he had given thanks he brake it and said, take eat; this is my body which is broken for you. And he took the cup and gave thanks and gave it to them saying, drink ye all of it; for this is my blood of the N. Testament which is shed for many for the remission of sins. This doctrine that the sufferings and death of Christ procured pardon for believers is mostly forcibly illustrated by the breaking of the bread and the pouring out of the wine and it is only the only thing to which Christ directed the attention of his disciples when he instituted this supper. Now he asks whether the man who denies this doctrine of Christ's vicarious sacrifice can worthily observe an ordinance the grand object of which was to present this doctrine and impress it on the senses the memory and the heart? What would be the object for such an one to commemorate the Lord's supper? There would certainly be no more propriety in it than to observe a feast in commemoration of the death of Paul or Peter or James. Take away from the Christian system the doctrine of atonement and you reduce the eucharist to an unmeaning ceremony. The bread broken and the wine poured out which are so beautifully and forcibly appropriate if that doctrine be true become upon a denial of it totally unmeaning and inapplicable. Indeed this doctrine in its pure unsophisticated form constitutes the life the essence the glory and this saving efficacy of the Gospel. If this be gone the grand distinction between Christianity and reason is done away. Indeed without this the Christian religion can no more exist than a man whose heart is taken from him. Surely then the man who rejects this truth cannot but eat and drink unworthily although in ordinary cases the door of repentance is still open to him and that precious blood which he has so daringly trodden underfoot may prove the life of his soul.

In the fourth place he eats and drinks unworthily who does not feel his unworthiness.

Certainly brethren we are unworthy of a seat at the Lord's table. For by this transaction we are sealed the children of God that is if we partake in a proper manner. And let us only look at our characters such as they are by nature such as they were when Christ died for us – and let us also look at our lives since we were reconciled to God and if we do not realize that we are unworthy a place where the presence of Christ is so peculiarly felt we must be in a state of awful stupidity. Yet it is no unfrequent thing for communicants to have very inadequate ideas of their vileness in the presence of God. No one indeed as trust will in so many words deny that he does not deserve a place around the sacred board. But very many of us think of ourselves above what we ought to think. We are willing Christ should have part of the glory of our salvation if he will leave us the other part. But the truth is that lower our views of ourselves the more sinful and vile our hearts appear to us the more glorious will Christ's character and redemption seem to us. The lower too shall we lie in his peculiar presence and the higher will he exalt us. But if we are puffed up with a conceit of our native or acquired goodness surely that Lord who knows that at our best estate we are untitled and poor and miserable and blind and naked will again I will regard us as eating and drinking unworthily and therefore eating and drinking damnation to ourselves. We ought therefore brethren to pray earnestly to God that he would search us and try us and discover to us the deceitfulness and depravity of our hearts

* (See over the leaf)

The last thing that causes us to eat and drink unworthily is the neglect of a due preparation for the ordinance. And this deficiency no doubt will apply to more professing Christians than any we have mentioned. It is a melancholy fact that very many of us come to the table of the Lord without having made any special prayers previously – or gone into any special self-examination. The little interest the majority of the members of a church feel in the subject of preparation for their solemn communion seasons is evident from the fact that usually more than half of them do not attend the lecture which is appointed for that particular object. We know they will plead the pressing of worldly concerns. Men however do not usually plead this when called to attend to the things they love ardently. And besides if it be the fact that Christians are so occupied in the world that it is not possible for them to spend two hours in the week in special preparation for a solemn ordinance of their religion it is high time such lecture were given up. It has not however been thought proper to abandon this by the most devoted Christians in our land. Such usually find no difficulty in attending upon the preparatory lecture and there is reason to fear that others would find their difficulties to vanish were they to be more zealous for God and less ardent in their attachment to the world. Is there not also reason to fear that those who neglect this public means of getting their hearts ready for communion do also generally neglect private preparation? Will not the same degree of attachment to the world which will keep a man away from God's sanctuary keep him away from his closet.

But brethren can it be that he who does not pray specially secretly and earnestly in his closet and does not go into close self-examination previously to his approach to the sacred elements can such an one avoid eating and drinking unworthily and therefore eating and drinking damnation to himself? And what will be the nature of his damnation? It will be an awful judgment of God viz. a continuance of his stupidity. The ordinance will prove to him a dead letter to say the least. More probably it will prove the means of hardening him still more. And finally it will prove everlasting destruction except he repent.

* The fifth circumstance that causes us to eat and drink unworthily is the want of brotherly love.

*If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. If a man say I love God, says John, and hateth his brother he is a liar for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen? What hypocrisy then is it what absurdity for a person to set down to the table of his Lord and Master in token of his love for Him and yet carry within him a hatred of a brother who is seated with him at the same table so strong and so bitter that he cannot peaceably transact with him the ordinary concerns of his life! Such an one without any question eats and drinks damnation to himself and it is a damnation not of the mildest character. For we are told that *whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment; and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council; but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire.

And now brethren in the service of the subject let the timid and doubting and fearful though sincere and humble believer take courage. Let the bold and confident professor tremble. Let those of us who have made no preparation for the Lord's table we are about to approach remember that the probability is we shall not this day discern the Lord's body and that we shall go away as unfeeling and unhumbled as ever. God grant none of us this day fill up the measure of damnation - God grant we may none of us be given up to strong delusions to believe a lie that we may be damned!

Sermon 109 Spring

[Sermon No. 109, "Spring," Song of Solomon 2:11-13, 1822 May,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 4]

Song of Solomon 2:11-13

*The winter is past the rain is over and gone: the flowers appear on the earth;
the time of the singing of birds is come and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land;
the fig tree putteth forth her green figs and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell.*

The most irreligious and corrupt men are often watchful observers of the changes that take place in the creation around them. Their views however extend no farther than the actual phenomena unless it be to examine how far those phenomena affect worldly concerns. But the Christian when he observes the changing seasons the waxing and the waning moon and the approaching and receding sun has his thoughts directed irresistibly to his heavenly Father and he sees in every change his almighty and merciful hand secretly directing and upholding all. This thought gives a double relish to his views of nature. Without the presence of God creation would seem a mere skeleton a body without a soul. But to an irreligious man the thought that an holy God is manifest in every object is painful and he endeavours to banish it from his mind.

Among the revolutions of nature none strikes the attention more forcibly than the return of spring. The frozen bonds of winter are unlocked - the hoar frost and the snow are scattered before the winds from the chambers of the south and the increasing heat of a more vertical sun. The brown and deathlike aspect of the fields is changed into a delightful green - and the green plants of the north are exchanged for the mild and fragrant zephyrs of May. Gone is the dreariness and silence of the landscape and in their place we see the expanding bud and the opening flower and hear the voice of melody from the airy songsters who have returned from their southern retreats. But it is idle to attempt a description of spring when there is one given by the pen of inspiration so sweetly simple and interesting. The winter is past the rain is over and gone the flowers appear on the earth the time of the singing of birds is come and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land. The fig tree puts forth her green figs and the vines with tender grapes give a good smell.

This description needs no remarks to explain it except perhaps to observe that the word translated turtle means a turtle dove or a ring dove which in the eastern world is a bird of passage as appears from a verse in Jeremiah – The stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed times and the turtle and the crane and the swallow observe the time of their coming. We now proceed to make a religious improvement of the season of spring. And it is calculated both to reprove us and to afford us some striking emblems of many important changes that are experienced in the condition of men. Let us first look at the spring for a moment calculated for our reproof. This interesting season reproves us for our remissness in duty. Jeremiah makes this use of the prompt and regular return of certain birds of passage in the verse just quoted: The stork knoweth her appointed times and the crane and the swallow observeth the time of their coming: but my people know not the judgment of the Lord. Solomon points us to the industry of the ant as a model for our imitation. Go to the ant and thou sluggard consider her ways and be wise. Which having no guide overseas or ruler provideth her meat in the summer and gathereth her food in the harvest. How long wilt thou keep O sluggard when wilt thou rise out of thy sleep. Yet a little sleep a little slumber a little folding of the hands to sleep. So shall thy poverty come as one that traveleth and thy want as an armed man.

*The little ants for one poor grain
Labour and toil and strive
Yet we who have a heaven to obtain
How negligent we live!
We for whose sakes all nature stands
And stars their courses move
We for whose guard the angels band
Come flying down from above:
We for whom God the Son came down
And labored for our good
How careless to secure that crown
He purchased with his blood! [Source: A hymn]*

We may refer also to the words of John to illustrate this point (although perhaps they were not intended by him to apply immediately to this subject). But ask now the beasts says he and they shall teach thee; and fowls of the air and they shall tell thee. Or speak to the earth and it shall teach thee and the fishes of the sea shall declare unto thee. The beasts of the field and the fowls of the air do indeed teach us at this season if we will attend to the lesson. They delay not a day to commence the active exertions necessary for their future comfort. They have never learned from man who professes himself to be the Lord to put off till tomorrow what can be done today. How forcibly does the morning song of the lark and the robin (wakeful birds) reprove those of us who neglect to offer up our morning sacrifice of prayer and praise to God! O prayerless men can you listen to their morning notes without feeling the strings of conscience! Can you see them displaying the glory of their Creator while you are dishonoring him. And come can you impenitent man can you see unaffected these beasts and birds improving the very first hours of that season allotted them to provide for their future wants while you are making no improvement of that previous day of grace you now enjoy! Their spring their summer and their harvest will soon be past: but they will improve them in such a manner that they will be provided in winter with habitations and food. So your spiritual spring and summer and harvest will soon be past – and the night of eternity will settle upon your souls. But alas you will then have no building of God no house not made with hands eternal in the heavens into which you can enter. You are neglecting to lay up treasures in the heavens where no thief approacheth neither moth corrupteth and soon will you have to take up the unavailing and bitter lamentation the harvest is past the summer is ended and we are not saved.

Ye who are young O remember that you are now in the spring of life and that the birds and flowers of holiness should now be expanding in your hearts if you hope for fruit in old age and for glory in heaven. The husbandman expects no harvest if he suffer himself to sit idle in spring and casts no seed into the ground. And if we neglect religion while young we have no more reason to hope for a Spiritual harvest. We must expect on the contrary that our hearts will uncultivated and be choked with weeds which in the autumn will be burned with fire unquenchable.

I proceed in the second place to mention some of these things in the moral world of which the spring of the year is emblematical.

In the first place is a lively emblem of the introduction of Christianity into the world. For four thousand years had the earth lain a desolate and cheerless moral waste. A spiritual winter and encircled it with its deathlike embrace. Save in the little kingdom of Judea the whole earth presented nothing but an unalleviated moral ruin. Everywhere else and often even there men had changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man and to birds and fourfooted beasts and creeping things. They had changed the truth of God into a lie and worshiped and served the creature more than the Creator. To these senseless idols these storks and stones men bowed in ignominious and polluted worship. They worshipped and served too uncontrolled their own vile lusts and appetites – being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness, full of envy murder, debate deceit malignity, whisperers, backbiters, haters of God despiteful proud boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant breakers, without natural affection, and implacable unmerciful. In short, they had all gone out of the way - they were together become unprofitable. There was none that did good no not one. Their throat was an open sepulchre: with their tongues they used deceit the poison of asps was under their lips: whose mouth was full of cursing and bitterness: their feet were swift to shed blood. Destruction and misery were in their ways. And the way of peace they knew not. There was no fear of God before their eyes.

Such is the awful description the pen of inspiration has given not of one kingdom but of the whole world before the introduction of the Gospel. And not only were men thus given up to uncleanness and vile affections but there was a darkness like that of the deepest midnight hanging over the grave. If a momentary ray of light from another sometimes crossed that dark valley it was speedily lost in the Egyptian night and men were left to ignorance of their immortality groveling their wretched way through life and in the emphatic language of scripture being without Christ having not hope and without God in the world.

But when the sun of righteousness arose on the world it might truly be said the winter is past the flowers appear on the earth and the time of the singing of birds is come. Christ entered the dark recesses of the grave and threw open its chambers to the light of immortality. He passed through them into heaven leaving a bright and glorious path open for all his followers. On the ruins of pagan abominations the flowers of hope and holiness and immortality sprang up and threw abroad their delightful fragrance from sea to sea and from the river to the ends of the earth. The moral world arose in renovated beauty and although that spring has had to struggle with many a cold wind and many an icy mountain yet has it gradually advanced even unto this day and is now rapidly extending its empire from the rising unto the setting sun.

In the second place the spring of the year is a beautiful emblem of the regeneration of a soul.

You recollect how cheerless is the season of winter when creation is locked up in strong fetters and no opening bird or flower cheers the landscape. Nature seems to be in her grave and unless the hand of Providence be stretched out to produce a change it seems if she must sleep in her grave forever.

Just so it is with the soul of man while unregenerate. All the affections are locked up in icy selfishness and the flowers of holiness are wanting. No love to God – no well-founded hope of future glory spring up and adorn the heart - but the soul presents a dreary ruin where spiritual death and desolation reign in gloomy and undisputed sovereignty.

And you hath he quickened, says Paul to the Ephesian Christians, who were dead in trespasses and sins. We know, says John, that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren. Indeed natural death is a state of privation and insensibility aptly representing the spiritual state of the unanswered heart. And the season of winter is a lively emblem of death which whether natural or spiritual.

Look now at the heart on which the Spirit has shared his life giving influences and you will be constrained to say the winter is past the flowers appear on the earth and the time of the singing of the birds is come. The soul has burnt its selfish fetters and the streams of holy affection flow and overflow in their passage towards God and towards men. The plants of holiness seem to be taking a deep root in the heart and their rising branches already present the opening flowers and promise an abundant harvest. A new song is heard bursting from the regenerate land – worthy is the Lamb that was slain to secure to wisdom and honor and power and blessing. Not half so invigorating and sweet are the briars of spring as are the influences of the Spirit upon this new born soul and not half so pleasant to the eye is it to gaze upon the diversified beauties of the vernal landscape as it is for the man who loves God to look upon one who exhibits evidence that his soul has been renewed after the image of him that created him.

A third object of which spring is strikingly emblematic is a revival of religion.

In the winter season so dormant is the vegetable kingdom that it requires much attention to be able to distinguish those trees and plants that have life in them from those that are dead. To a general observer indeed they all appear to be dead – shorn of their leaves their flowers and their fruit. And there are seasons and these not infrequent when the Church of Christ in a particular region is in precisely such a state. Professors of religion have mingled with the world so that little difference appears between the religious and the irreligious.

When the spring of the year opens up on the vegetable world however it is then made manifest what trees and plants have life remaining in them and which are utterly dead. The living ones shoot forth their foliage and flowers and the dead ones remain unaltered barren and leafless and flowerless. So when the divine influences produce a revival of religion in any place the real children of God are made manifest and also the children of darkness. The Christian comes out from the world and becomes clothed with the rich foliage of flowers and fruit of religion - while the sinner remains as stupid and dead as barren and desolate as before. The contrast between the two is so striking that it cannot be mistaken by the most careless observer. It is manifest at once that the one is the friend and the other the enemy of God. And as in the spring the warm showers and sun cause many new plants to spring up from the dead so do the showers of divine grace in time of a revival cause the seed of God's word which has been sown in mercy an unregenerate heart to expand and send forth the plants of holiness which soon exhibit their flowers and will produce fruit in succeeding years.

My hearers the spring of the year has now opened upon us in all its enticing beauty – and this land of hills and valleys is beginning to be clothed with all its rich variety of verdure.

We tread in our walks upon a floral carpet and we are saluted by the cheerful songs of the birds. But there is one circumstance that spreads a melancholy over the scene. But with some of us there is little difference between the state of the earth and the state of our hearts. Alas! Alas! There is a winter still resting upon our souls. The warmth of the ardor of divine love do now expand our bosoms - the flowers of holiness are withered and fallen and the ice of stupidity and selfishness still contract and benumb our affections. It is spring abroad. It is winter within. It is beautiful and healthful and animating abroad. It is desolate and sickening and deadening within. God is praised every where abroad. He is neglected and dishonored within. Few are the trees in our forest that remain without foliage at this season. But alas how many of our friends and acquaintances exhibit no signs of spiritual life and remain like the heath in the desert, that heath which when good cometh a salt parcheth an uninhabited land.

The last thing that I shall mention of which the spring is emblematic is the future resurrection of the body.

The grave has always been and still is a dreary and a desolate spot. All is dark and is silent at the tomb. No spring is ever dawned on that wintry abode: but bound in the close locked arms of death millions seem there to be sleeping their eternal sleep. The flowers spring up on the graves of our friends but their remains sleep on and to the eye of unassisted reason seem destined never to survive. But blessed be God there is a season coming when this long winter of the grave will be over and spring will visit the mouldering urn. Then will corruption put on incorruption and mortality will put on immortality. Those who sleep in Jesus will then awake in the likeness of the glory of Christ to a never ending never fading spring. For Christ has purchased their redemption from sin and death and procured for them spiritual and immortal bodies and opened for their reception the ever blooming Paradise of God. O it will be a glorious resurrection for the righteous!

*See truth love and mercy in triumph descending
And nature all glowing in Eden's first bloom
On the cold cheek of death smiles and roses blending are
And beauty immortal awakes from the tomb. [Poem by James Beattie]*

And my Christian hearers, this delightful vernal season of man will soon come. Those pious friends who now sleep in the silent and wintry grave will sleep there but a little longer. We must soon deposit our frail bodies by their side. But then sleep will be short. Already I hear the shout of the archangel which awarded our sleeping dust. Already I fancy I feel the undecaying vigor of those spiritual bodies which will be ours. I see the Redeemer coming with his attendant angels on the clouds of heaven drawing all after him whose sins are washed in his blood - and lo! he opens the gates of Paradise the New Jerusalem and discloses the beauties of the Paradise of God. Then I see the amaranthine flowers in ceaseless bloom - there is the tree of life bearing twelve manner of fruits and yielding her fruits every month and there flows the river of the water of life. This, O this is the eternal abode of the righteous. But wicked will never enter there. (Repeat thrice)

Sermon 110 Mourners Directed to Christ

[Sermon No. 110, "Mourners Directed to Christ," Matthew 14:12, 1822 Jun,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 4]

Matthew 14:12

And his disciples came and took up the body, and buried it, and went and told Jesus.

Whatever opinions Christians may have in regard to the practice of dancing in general all will no doubt agree in lamenting its effects in a particular instance recorded in scripture. It caused the martyrdom of one of the most eminent servants of God that ever lived. John the Baptist whose holiness and purity struck an awe into the hearts of hardened kings so that they shrunk from taking his life at last fell a sacrifice to the hatred of a voluptuous and vile woman. This unyielding servant of God had boldly declared unto (Philip the brother of King) Herod that it was not lawful for him to marry Herodias because she was the wife of his brother Philip who was still living. Herod however regarded not his admonition and thus John drew upon himself the hatred of the king and Herodias. He was cast into prison but his life was spared, for Herod feared John. And although Herodias would have killed him yet she could not. At length however, Herod on his birth day made a supper to his Lords high captains and chief estates of Galilee, and thus laid himself open to the intrigues of this abandoned woman who thirsted for the blood of this man of God. The mere dancing of Herodias' daughter before Herod drew from him that most foolish and mad promise - Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me I will give it thee unto the half of my kingdom. The bloody prostitute Herodias seized upon the favourable moment for getting her vengeance. It is not enough that John be beheaded in prison but his head must be brought to her and as an ancient Father of the church informs her she pulled out the tongue and pierced it with a needle thus manifesting her savage fiendlike malice.

John had many disciples: and some of them it seems watched his fate with tender solicitude. After his death they went and obtained permission to bury his corpse and having performed this last and only office of humanity in their power they went and told Jesus.

Here let us pause one moment my hearers to observe how perfectly Christian was the conduct of these disciples. Had they been the followers of a worldly chief who was thus cruelly murdered we should hear from the pen of their historian that being full of indignation against the inhuman Herod they collected together to devise some plan for avenging the death of their master. But nothing like this was seen in the conduct of these disciples. Though they loved their master and no doubt wept most sincerely over his ashes yet at the same time they remembered that their kingdom was not of this world and that they must not return evil for evil. They had been taught to regard every event as under the direction of an all wise and merciful God who would cause even the wrath of man to praise him and the remainder of wrath that would restrain. They therefore submitted to the mysterious and painful dispensation by which their master was taken away in the midst of his usefulness and being made a victim to ungodly lust – and a martyr in the cause of truth. They knew it would not promote but greatly retard the cause of holiness to endeavour to avenge the death of John. Yet there was one consolation remaining. They could go and tell Jesus of their griefs. They well knew that He was a greater master for they had heard the Baptist declare, he that cometh after me is mightier than I whose shoes I am not worthy to bear. He would sympathize with them in the loss of John and teach them more clearly the lesson of submission to the dealings of Providence: and he too was able to instruct them even more perfectly than the Baptist the great things pertaining to the kingdom of God and how they might obtain an interest in it. He therefore could bind up their bleeding hearts and pour the oil of consolation into their wounded spirits.

But my hearers, Jesus Christ is the same yesterday today and forever. In all our afflictions therefore when we have done all we can do for departed friends when we have consigned them to the peaceful tomb then can we go and tell Jesus. His ear is as much open to our tale of sorrow now as it was to the disciples of John and he is not far from any one of us - for we are assured it is he who made and upholds the universe and that, He searcheth the reins and hearts. He has himself declared - Lo I am with you always even to the end of the world. Let us first spend a few moments in enquiring into the grounds of expecting relief under trial by going and unbosoming our hearts to Jesus.

In the first place, Christ is able to afford us relief.

We may feel deeply for our friends in affliction and yet be unable to afford them any permanent effectual consolation because we are wanting in the power. So Christ may prove a willingness to comfort the afflicted but if he be destitute of the ability it will avail us little to apply to him. But we are told from his own lips that, all power is given unto him in heaven and in earth. And we cannot doubt a moment the ability of him to do all things by whom all things in heaven and earth visible and invisible were created and who now upholds them all in existence. He said himself while on earth, the Spirit of the Lord is upon me because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor, he hath sent me to heal the broken hearted to preach deliverance to the captives and recovering of sight to the blind to set at liberty them that are bruised. Indeed after all the miracles he performed well on earth - when we see Lazarus coming forth from the grave and his command and the son of the widow rising from his coffin - when we see the dumb speaking - the blind opening their eyes - the lame walking and the leprous cleansed - when we find the apostle giving him the title of God and surrounding him with all the attributes of Jehovah it might seem a waste of time to endeavor to prove his ability to impart support to the bereaved were it not for the fact that a strong faith in this power seems necessary for the afflicted in order that they may realize upon themselves his consolations. We find that when he was on earth that a faith in his ability to secure the miserable was usually required by him before he stretched out an arm of sustaining mercy to them. And surely this same faith will be requisite now when so much brighter evidence of his power has been revealed in the N. Testament.

In the next place Christ has a tender feeling of compassion for the afflicted.

None can sympathize with the mourner like those who have experienced similar sorrows: and among all the forms of affliction to be found on earth there is scarcely one of which Christ was not made the subject while incarnate. His life was made his life was made up of suffering. He endured the evils of poverty and persecution. His friends often deserted him and betrayed his cause and one of them his life and he was called to weep at the graves of others whom disease or the sword had destroyed. Indeed so great were the trials of our Saviour that according to an inspired historian of ancient times he was often seen to weep but seldom to smile and according to an inspired historian, he was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. How appropriate and consoling then is the reasoning of Paul on this subject - For we have not an High Priest which cannot be touched with the feelings of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us therefore come boldly to the throne of grace that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need. Let the mourner come then and tell Jesus of his sorrows as he would tell a bosom friend assured that this divine intercessor possessed even now a tender fellow feelings for his afflictions - that his heart knows our infirmities and can pity them and sympathize with them. Though all other friends fail this kind friend in heaven will never cease to feel for the trials of his younger brethren on earth and he will plead for them in all the eloquence of disinterested compassion that the Father would send them another Comforter even the Spirit of truth who will sustain their fainting Spirits and bind up their bleeding hearts.

In the third place Christ has promised to support and comfort his afflicted disciples.

Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest. This is the kind language of the Saviour; and it applies not merely to the man who is laboring under a sense of sin; but also to those who are bereaved a friends or earthly comforts although no doubt the invitation had a prime reference to the man burdened with sin. But indeed all affliction is the result of sin: and when our friends are taken away we should mourn more on account of sins than for the loss we sustain. For if we are not led to consider the cause of our trials we shall not improve by them. The mourner therefore who goes and tells Jesus of his sorrows in a proper manner will go burdened with a deep sense of the evil of sin and if he does come with us such a load on his soul he has the sure promise of Christ that he shall be disburdened.

The tenderness of Christ to the afflicted soul who comes to him for relief is beautifully expressed in another passage applied by Matthew to Christ - A bruised seed shall he not break and the smoking flame shall he not quench until he send forth judgment unto victory. What else but a bruised seed is the soul that he has had a dear friend torn from it by the vilest hand of death! The heart feels itself mangled and bleeding and almost ready to sink under its wounds. It seems as if there were no balm on earth that has the power to assuage the anguish - nay scarcely is there anything on earth that does not aggravate distress. But there is balm in Gilead which can sooth even the anguished bosom of the mourner – a Physician is there who applies so tenderly the soft hand of support and consolation that the bruised and broken heart finds itself restored ere it is aware and how sweet and sustaining are the words of consolation such a soul receives from this great Physician. Fear not; for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name; thou art mine. When thou passest through the waters I will be with you; and through the rivers they shall not overflow thee; when thou walkest through the fire thou shalt not be burnt; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee. For I am the Lord thy God the Holy One of Israel thy Saviour. For a small moment have I forsaken thee with but with great mercies will I gather thee - In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment; but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer. O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest and not comforted, behold I lay thy stones with fair colours, and lay the foundations with sapphires. No weapon that is formed against me shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against me in judgment thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord and their righteousness is of me saith the Lord.

That same Saviour in his word hath said, Blessed are they that mourn for they shall be comforted. And by the mouth of his inspired saints he has said, They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. He that goeth forth and weepeth bearing precious seed shall doubtless come again with rejoicing bringing his sheaves with him. My Son, says Paul, despise not the chastenings of the Lord neither faint when those art rebuked of him. For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. No chastening seemeth for the present joyous but grievous, nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceful fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby. And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God.

Such is the firm ground of confidence presented to the believing mourner that he shall obtain consolation and support if he go and tell Jesus his sorrows. Christ is able to afford him relief. He has a fellow feeling of compassion for the afflicted and he has kindly promised to succor those who cast their burdens upon him. But it may be enquired what is the nature of that relief and consolation the mourner may hope to receive from the Redeemer?

In the first place he may hope to be made more deeply sensible that he deserves his afflictions.

One great bar that lies in the way of perfect resignation to God's will is a secret feeling that we do not really deserve such trials. We see others around us who seem more wicked than ourselves yet have greater prosperity than we and we cannot see why we should be punished so severely. Men are not willing to acknowledge that they have such a feeling: yet God sees this murmuring in some. And the first step toward resignation and consolation is to be sensible of our demerits. Such a sense will Christ give those who come humbly and sincerely to tell him their sorrows.

The mourner may expect in the next place that Christ will give him repentance.

Never can we have any genuine lasting consolation under affliction until we are brought to sorrow over our sins after a godly manner. The temple of Christian's peace can never be entered but through the narrow gate of repentance. This subdues a rebellious heart which has been wandering from God - this detaches our affections from idols - this leads us to the newness of life and the results of this is humility and peace which the world cannot give nor take away.

The third thing the mourner may expect from Jesus is to have given him a correct estimate of this world and the next.

In prosperity we uniformly expect too much from this world and form too high an estimate of it. So long as we have this feeling we shall form too low an idea of the value of eternity. But Christ can show us in striking colours how perishable and uncertain is every thing on earth and how grand and interesting is every thing relating to eternity. When our views are thus corrected we shall act in some measure conformable to the true estimate - that is we shall view everything as of little value or importance that does not tend to prepare us for eternal glory.

Another thing Christ will teach the humble mourner is to realize that death is near him.

All men think all men mortal but themselves, says the poet. They know indeed that they must die but they do not feel as if they were to die soon. Yet affliction if sanctified and applied by the Spirit of Christ dissipates the delusion and causes the mourner to feel that he holds his life by a feeble tenure - that he hangs on a brittle thread and that he has no security for a moment. This leads him if he be not awfully stupid to enquire, Am I prepared to meet my God in judgment?

Christ will likewise inspire in the mourner who comes to him a renewed Spirit of prayer.

If such be not the effect of affliction on the man he has every reason to fear that Christ is not his friend that he has not gone and in a proper manner told Jesus of his trials. For the closet is the spot where is found the most solid and permanent relief in times of trial. Their Christ manifests himself peculiarly to the believer - and there does he find a holy calm and resignation which will bring him up above the wakes of trouble. O if the mourner does not pray constantly and earnestly and feelingly he is most certainly making no good improvement of his bereavement but he is treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath.

Finally Christ gives the mourner genuine resignation to the will of God.

This is the grand result of all the particular gifts and exercises we have mentioned. It is the crown of the whole – and from the man who feels an unreserved submission to God who rejoices in his government even when he is suffering under its dispensations from him the string of affliction is taken away. And if there be a feeling on earth that is worthy to be called happiness it is the feeling which rejoices in the sovereignty and government of God and rejoices that he rules over all. This is a foretaste of the joys of Paradise when the will of the believer will be entirely swallowed up in the will of the Creator and perfect peace will be the glorious result.

The subject we have been discussing my hearers furnishes us with a test for determining whether we are Christians. In seasons of affliction do we go and do we love to go and tell Jesus of our sorrows? And do we find those reliefs and consolations Jesus is able and willing to give? If we do, is it not some proof that we love the Savior? If we neither unburden our sorrows to Him nor find a sense of our sinfulness nor repentance – nor a more correct estimate of the comparative value of religion and the world nor a realizing sense of the nearness of death nor a new Spirit of prayer nor unreserved submission to God's will then have we not the utmost reason to fear that we do not love nor serve the Saviour? And if we do not love him where can we find a friend to succor and comfort us in affliction?

But what a rich source of consolation is it to the believer that he has such a friend to whom he can reveal his sorrows! When we have buried a husband or a wife - a father or a mother - a son or a daughter a brother or a sister how it will relieve the aching heart to go and tell Jesus! All other friends are incapable of giving us any permanent relief - but this Almighty friend touched with a feeling of our infirmities stands ever ready to wipe the tear from the eye of misery - to bind up the bleeding spirit and give everlasting consolation to the afflicted heart.

Sermon 111 Instruction of Children

[Sermon No. 111, "Instruction of Children," Proverbs 22:6, 1822 Jun,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 4]

Proverbs 22:6

Train up a child in the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart from it.

[The first part of this sermon deals with the responsibilities of parents to instruct their children in religion; the last part includes what appears to be an alternate ending about a new Sabbath school and the reasons parents should want their children to attend.]

There is a particular kind of school instruction adopted in various parts of the world in which a single superintendent is enabled to instruct several hundred scholars. This is effected by dividing the school into a number of classes and appointing the best scholars to take charge of them and instruct them. Now there is a resemblance between this system and that by which God instructs this ignorant world. All inhabitants of the globe constitute in fact one great school under the superintendence of the King of Kings and Lord of lords. Yet he has in wise plans divided mankind into a great number of classes and at the head of these inferior teachers are appointed who are to instruct their several divisions in the great lessons they are taught of God. There is indeed but one grand science taught in this school and that is how to prepare for eternity. Or rather all other services are made subservient to this.

Among the delegated instructors in this seminary parents occupy an important post. The classes especially committed to them are their children and families. And for their diligent and faithful instruction of these glorious rewards are promised but shame disgrace and punishment of the severest kind follow their neglect. The most glorious of these rewards and the most terrible of these punishments will be awarded at that great time final examination of teachers and scholars which is to take place at the end of the world. There are some temporal rewards however awaiting the faithful and some woes the unfaithful instructor. One of these blessings is mentioned by Solomon in the text. Train up a child in the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart from it. Only let the parent place the feet of his child in the paths of piety and virtue in his earliest years and let him lead him along that path till he is accustomed to it and realizes that the ways of wisdom are ways of pleasantness and all her paths peace and that parent will have the satisfaction the greatest a parent can enjoy of seeing his child persevering in the straight and narrow even to old age thus affording happy evidence that he has been trained up for honor glory and immortality in another world. So cheerful a declaration of inspiration should inspire an ardent zeal in the parent that he do not fail of seizing the very earliest moment to begin to instill the lessons of piety into the infant mind and to persevere without fainting in pursuit of a prize so glorious as the temporal and eternal happiness of his offspring. It is highly important then that parents understand definitely what is meant by training up a child in the way he should go. It comprehends no doubt the whole of that instruction he receives from his parents. The important enquiry then occurs in what ought a child to be instructed?

In the first place he should be taught so much of the arts and sciences as will preserve him from imposition and if possible so much as will render him respectable for his information and useful by it.

Indeed it is no matter how extensive and particular be the knowledge of young persons. For the more accurate and extended their learning the less danger is there of their abusing it. A little learning, says a poet, is a dangerous thing. For as Lord Baron remarks a little smattering in philosophy leads a man into atheism but a thorough acquaintance with it will bring him back again to the belief of a God - and we may add to the belief of revelation and its peculiar doctrines. But although it be the duty if it be possible of every parent to give his children a common education yet their duty in regard to anything beyond this will be very different according to the business in life the child expects to follow - according to the pecuniary resources of the parent and a variety of other considerations. But on this subject I would not in this place enlarge.

In the second place the parent should teach his children the great duties of morality - that is he should teach them how to conduct towards their fellow men.

There is not room under this head to be very particular - yet among the moral duties none is more important to children than a regard to truth since they are probably more in danger of violating this duty in the beginning of life than any other. They should be shown the nature and importance of this virtue in all its relations and the most powerful motives this world or the next can furnish should be set before them to induce them to regard it. They should be cautioned not to dissemble in his dealings among his fellows especially he should not be indulged in that fatal propensity so visible in children to make what is called a good bargain by which is meant that a person hides the defects of his commodities and puts them off upon his neighbor at a greater price than he knows they are worth. This is the foundation and beginning of most kinds of cheating and many kinds of lying and the parent in order to teach his child with success to have a strict regard to truth must himself be free from such juggling and dissimulation.

Kindness and good will towards others and even towards brutes should early be inculcated upon the young mind. They should be dissuaded from the cruel practices so frequent among children of wantonly and unfeelingly destroying the lives of animals since those practices inevitably tend to make them cruel to their fellow men. They should be taught to feel tenderly interested for the suffering and distresses of their fellow men. They are to be directed to treat all men with civility - the aged with respect - and the young with kindness and good manners - avoiding as mean and unbecoming all low and vulgar and profane jesting and ribaldry. In short let the child be made to understand in its full extent that universal rule of morality, whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you do ye even to men.

In the third place it is an imperious duty of parents to instruct their children in their duties to God.

This is a species of instruction that crowns and informs all the rest and without which all other learning is a little value. And however faithful the parent in other respects if he neglect this he will have an awful account to give at last.

The child must be instructed to reverence love and obey God. All the motives calculated to operate upon a tender mind should be presented before him with an affectionate urgency. The character of God should be explained in its goodness and wisdom. And the child should also be made to know that God hates sin and sinners and not only should he be urged to be good and holy in order that he may win heaven but it should not be concealed from him that there is a stranger punishment prepared for the wicked and that he must inevitably suffer it if he do not love and obey God. Indeed the great leading fundamental truths of revealed religion should early be instilled into the mind of the child. For the truth is unless he know and feel something of the Gospel all other principles and motives will have but a feeble effect upon him. He must be taught to know and love Christ and to realize something of his great salvation.

The child should also be taught to perform religious duties. He should be taught both by precept and example to make known his requests to God by prayer and supplication – and the nature of this duty must be explained to him. He should also be instructed to keep holy the Sabbaths from his earliest years and to love its sacred hours and if possible be made to consecrate them to the service of God.

This is a brief summary of the matter the parent is to teach his children. We proceed to consider the manner in which he must teach them.

In the first place he should endeavor to adapt his instruction to their understandings.

He may begin very early in their lives to inculcate pious feelings and principles in their souls: for very young children are capable of receiving and comprehending many things of great importance: but whatever is taught at so early a period should be simple, plain and striking. Obedience to parents restraints upon the anger - the existence and goodness of God - the death of Christ - heaven and hell – these are among the earliest lessons that should be communicated. And as the parent finds their faculties expanding he should proceed in a connected plain manner to enforce and explain other facts and principles.

But in order to effect all this he should teach his children repeatedly patiently and affectionately and prayerfully.

He must talk to them of these things when he lies down and when he rises up - when he sits in his house and when he walks by the way: for this perseverance this repetition of line upon line and precept upon precept can alone give the impressions and principles any abiding hold on their memories. He must recollect that eternal consequences are very probably dependent upon his failure or success and he must resolve never to give over his efforts so long as there is a possibility of success. His children will not attend to his instructions but in a careless manner if he cannot excite within them an interest in the subjects and if he finds perverse passions leading them astray these are not reasons for desisting from that effort but incentives to double his diligence and faithfulness and exercise an increased share of patience.

Nor should the parent instruct children in such a cold lifeless and unfeeling manner that they perceive he does not feel the force of what he indicates upon them: but there must be in his manner an affectionate earnestness so great as not to be concealed. The child must be made to see that the parent realizes his danger to be great and the instruction he gives to be incalculably valuable. And in fact if the parent feels himself in any just measure the influence of the truths he inculcates upon them he cannot conceal nor avoid this affection and anxiety.

But after all this instructions should be accompanied by fervent prayer to God for the influences of his Spirit to urge them home upon the hearts of children. Without these influences they will never prove the means of their conversion - the great object every parent should have an view - since without conversion Christ has declared they shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven.

Again children should be taught by example.

Of what avail will it be for a parent to urge his children to be industrious and temperate if he himself is idle and intemperate? Of what use to urge them to obey and serve God if he disobeys and neglects Him? Of what service to direct them to pray if he sets them no example of prayer?

The last circumstance I shall mention in regard to the manner of instructing children is that when it be practical they should without fail attend a Sabbath school.

The grand object of such school is to bring the young acquainted with the holy scriptures. It is not to inculcate sectarian peculiarities - it is not to teach for doctrines the commandments of men that they are instructed: but to learn them the unadulterated word of God. Now the bible contains and enforces the great duties of morality and of piety.

It shows us what we are to believe concerning God and concerning ourselves and what are our obligations towards God and toward the man. It is indeed the standard of morality and the standard of religion. Every parent therefore must regard it of the utmost importance that his children are thoroughly acquainted with it. There cannot be any danger indeed of being too well acquainted with the scriptures: but there is great danger even after the parent has done all he can do himself, that his children will be but poorly acquainted with it. He must therefore regard the Sabbath school as a valuable auxiliary to his exertions. Not that this institution precludes the necessity of his own exertions; but it affords him an important assistance. There are indeed some peculiar advantages attending this mode of instruction which can be obtained in no other way.

In the first place the novelty of the thing operates as a stimulus upon the child's exertions.

We all of us soon become wearied in following the pursuit of knowledge in the same unvarying track: but if we can find some new path we find our faculty strangely quickened in exploring it. And much more then do children need this excitement. Now in the idea of reciting in the house of God and in a class and all the other circumstances attended upon such a school certainly presents more novelty and therefore excites to greater diligence than the idea of reciting a lesson alone at home to a parent.

In the second place an emulation is inevitably produced among the children of the class to excel their companions.

It has been a moral question whether this kind of emulation be not contrary to the Spirit of the Gospel and productive of mischievous effects. To be emulous to excel in real goodness and holiness of heart is certainly scriptural. For I speak to you Gentiles, says Paul, in as much as I am the apostle of the Gentiles I magnify mine office; If by any means I may provoke to emulation these which are my flesh and might save some of them. The same apostle in another place speaks of emulation which is one of the works of the flesh - viz. an emulation to exceed others in mere worldly attainment such as favour honor and power. Now it is certainly right because Paul has done it for teachers to incite this first kind of emulation in their scholars viz. an emulation to excel in goodness and holiness and among the deeds of holiness and goodness may be reckoned the diligence of children in studying the scriptures if they do it from right motives that is from a desire to be benefited and to benefit others. Yet it must be confessed that the latter kind of emulation being natural to children is apt to exert upon them more influence than the former. The former kind however should be inculcated by teachers upon scholars and they should be guarded against the latter. But let the teacher do what he will it is impossible for him to prevent altogether some sense of emulation in his class.

*Many of the books in this library are such a nature that they are calculated for the improvement and edification of us all - the middle aged and aged as well as the young. But they are peculiarly fitted for those or are of the proper age to belong to the two oldest classes in the school both young men and young women. And it is hoped this may be an additional motive to induce all such to come forward and join these classes. Are they already well enough instructed in the Holy Scriptures so as to need no more acquaintance with it? Then are they wiser than the wisest man that ever lived. Are they too old to attend upon this kind of instruction? Can they ever be too old to need no longer to learn what God has revealed concerning the immortal soul? Cannot they read the bible at home and derive all the benefits they could from attendance in the class? No: all experience shows that they would learn ten times faster in the latter way than in the former. But their companions will ridicule them perhaps and call them little children. What then! To Christ neglect his duty because his ungodly acquaintances and townsmen ridiculed him and persecuted him? And would this be an excuse any person will claim to offer to Christ at the day of judgment? Yet after all it is to be feared that this is the grand difficulty that prevents the greater part of young people from attending biblical instruction on the Sabbath. If they will but look closely into their hearts they will find it is pride that keeps them back – it is the fear of being ridiculed by their companions and they prefer disguising the final displeasure of Christ to enduring for a few days the scoffs and sneers of the ungodly. But my young friends you will assuredly mourn hereafter in this world or the next for being ashamed of Christ and the bible. When you come to years of manhood you will lament your neglect of the previous opportunity now afforded you of becoming acquainted with the best volumes ever written. For one I can say I do regret extremely that I have never had the opportunity now offered you. It would have been to me of incalculable advantage and no exertions I can now make will supply the deficiency. If then you have no excuse for neglecting these opportunities that you will dare to offer at the day of judgment and if you will certainly regret your neglect when you arrive at years of manhood do not suffer the fear of the ungodly who will soon be swept away as stubble deter you from doing that which is your duty and your privilege - lest you mourn at last and say how have I hated instruction and my heart despised reproof - and have not obeyed the voice of my teachers nor inclined my ear to them that instructed me!

[The following may be an alternate ending]

...either good or bad - and what effect this will doubtless be to make them better acquainted with the scriptures.

Another peculiar advantage Sabbath school children will enjoy in this place is that they will have access to a valuable library.

The books in this library are such as are calculated to interest and improve the young mind by presenting interesting motives and examples before it. And number will probably be sufficiently large to afford each scholar an opportunity of drawing a different book every fortnight during two or three summers. But the library is intended exclusively for the Sabbath school: and therefore those parents who neglect to send their children will deprive them of its benefit.

* (Another asterisk)

In the next place children who attend such a school will have their thoughts properly and profitably employed on the Sabbath.

They will be induced to spend at least a considerable portion of the day in studying the Scriptures. This will tend to keep them from idleness and vanity and they will soon acquire the habit of devoting the Sabbath to religious employments and when this habit is once fixed they can scarcely live without it. Surely this will be a point gained of great importance to the parents and to the children.

Another good effect of a Sabbath school is that by it children early become accustomed to frequent and to love the sanctuary of God.

If a person neglect when young to attend the preaching of the Gospel he will unless God convert him almost inevitably neglect it when arrived at years of manhood. And so on the other hand if he habituates himself early to attend upon it mere habit if nothing better will cause him ordinarily to persevere in it. And there is more hope that the man who attends upon the means of grace will secure converting grace than the man who neglects them. Concerning the latter indeed there is very little if any ground to hope. If therefore Sabbath schools tend to establish a habit of public worship every parent ought to encourage the attendance of his children.

Notwithstanding these peculiar advantages resulting from the institution we are considering is there any parent who feels little interest in the subject and excuses his neglect to bring forward his offspring by saying that he is faithful in giving them religious and biblical instruction himself and they receive it in common weekday schools so that it is unnecessary to do more for them in this respect. But the fact is enough is never done for a child in regard to religion until he is converted. Till he is converted! did I say? Enough is not done if any things more can be done till he enters heaven. And God does sometimes - nay he does often make a Sabbath school the means of a child's regeneration when all other means have failed. It is an institution which God has peculiarly blessed not only in the conversion of scholars but also of teachers. Parents therefore ought to be peculiarly solicitous to make their children members of it because there the showers of divine grace fall most copiously.

Parents and heads of families permit me to ask do you realize the importance of training up your children and domestics in the way they should go? Do you feel what momentous consequences are suspended on your faithfulness? Do you believe solemnly that you are now most probably fixing if you have not already fixed the everlasting destiny of your children either for happiness or misery? Do you seriously believe that you must meet those children at the judgment and then give a peculiarly strict account of your conduct towards them? Do you estimate according to its true worth the institution of Sabbath schools? Have you done as much as you might have done to bring forward your children and induce your neighbors to do the same? If there have been any deficiencies during past years let them no longer exist. Let us make an united effort to fill up the ranks of the school. Let this be accompanied by faithful instruction at home and by a spirit of prayer for the blessings of God on teachers and scholars - then shall we have abundant reason to hope that many of our children and youth, will be born again not of corruptible seed but of incorruptible, by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever, and that the blood of those who perish will not lie upon our heads in judgment.

Sermon 112 Christ our Righteousness

[Sermon No. 112, "Christ Our Righteousness," Jeremiah 23:6, 1822 Jun,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 5]

Jeremiah 23:6

And this is his name whereby he shall be called, the Lord our righteousness.

[This was the morning sermon; see Sermon 113 for the afternoon sermon.]

It is agreed on all hands that much of the force of this passage is lost in our common translation. The word here rendered Lord should be Jehovah. In the original Hebrew it is Jehovah. Many other cases of this kind occur in the Old Testament. The word Lord is indeed in such places printed in italics: it is not generally known that in these instances Jehovah should be substituted.

But it may be asked of what service would an alteration be since the word Lord means Jehovah. This is sometimes indeed its meaning in English Hebrew and Greek but not always. It is not uncommon now and it was more common formerly to address princes and great men by this title - it being in such cases a term of mere respect. In this sense it was often applied to Christ when he was on earth by many who had no idea that he was in any respect superior to a man. But the title Jehovah is never applied to any other being except the supreme God. It is regarded with so much respect by the Jews even to this day that they will not even pronounce it but substitute the word Lord in its place. And the circumstance was indirectly the cause why our translators make the change of Jehovah for Lord.

In the text however there can be no doubt that the term Jehovah is given to Christ. This will be evident by merely reading the preceding verse - Behold the days come saith the Lord that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch and a King shall reign and prosper and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved and Israel shall dwell safely and this is his name whereby he shall be called - the Lord our righteousness. Christ is called Jehovah in other passages of the prophets in such a connexion that it is difficult and unnatural to attach any other meaning to the passage as Jeremiah 33: 25,16 - Isaiah 40:10, 48:17, etc. Even the Jews opposed as they are to the Deity of Christ and sacred as is their veneration for the term Jehovah and compelled to admit that in these cases the Messiah is called Jehovah. Now let us just look at another solemn declaration of the Deity as given by Isaiah: I am Jehovah - that is my name and my glory will I not give to another. But the name of Christ is in the text said to be Jehovah. Either then Christ is really and truly the supreme God or these are not the words of God. We have our choice of the alternate. And be it my choice to receive implicitly the words of scripture without attempting to modify them so as to suit my taste or to quadrate them to my preconceived opinions.

Yet I am not going to do well at this time on the subject of Christs deity. The text presents another subject - Jehovah our righteousness. Two important questions here present themselves. First, why is it necessary that Christ should be our righteousness? And second, In what sense is he our righteousness?

Let it not be thought however that we regard the deity of Christ as of no importance in relation to the subject of justification by his blood. For we do believe that in this fact lies their chief and prevailing efficacy. Indeed we do not see how it is possible for any being less than Jehovah to make a propitiation for the sins of the whole world and actually to bear them in his own body on the tree. What is the curse denounced on those who break the law of God? The soul that sinneth shall die, that is die eternally - suffer everlasting ruin. But Christ we are told redeems us from the curse of the law being made a curse for us - and we do not see how with a finite nature he could have redeemed man from a curse that in duration at least is infinite.

But to return to the doctrine of Christ's righteousness. None will dispute but that all men have sinned. In order therefore to enter heaven and enjoy the favour of God they must in some way rather be freed from the penalty of that sin. This act is in scripture termed justification. In our courts of justice a man is said to be justified when he is proved innocent of the crime laid to his charge. But this is not the sense in which the term is used in heaven's chancery. For the crime laid to our charge is sin and of this we all are guilty. Yet through faith in Christ God is graciously pleased to regard us as acquitted from condemnation and this act is termed justification.

Yet mere forgiveness of sin is not all that is included in justification. For the man left in this state might notwithstanding his forgiveness be annihilated or placed in a mixed state of happiness and misery. Another the step therefore in justification is to give the believer a title to all the blessings Christ has purchased by his merits - to an inheritance incorruptible undefiled and that fadeth not away - that is to the rewards due to perfect obedience and perhaps even greater than these. Hence the sentiment of Young, Death gave us more than was in Eden lost.

From the text we here see that the ground of the believer's acceptance with God is the righteousness of Christ. Let us return to the question why it is necessary Christ should be our righteousness?

In the first place this necessity results from the fact that all men have sinned.

This is one of the arguments by which the apostle Paul and his extensive remarks on the subject employs with great urgency, All have sinned says he and come short of the glory of God. Being justified truly by his grace through the redemption there is in Christ Jesus: whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past through the forbearance of God: To declare I say at this time his righteousness that he might be just and the justified of him which believeth in Jesus. Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? Of works? Nay: but by the law of faith. Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law. This reasoning of Paul may be illustrated by his own words in other places. As many as are of the works of the law are under the curse: for it is written cursed is everyone that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them. But that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God is evident: for the just shall live by faith. And the law is not of faith: but the man that doeth them shall live in them. Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law being made a curse for us: for it is written cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree. Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid: for if there had been a law which could have given life verily righteousness would have been by the law. But the scriptures have concluded all under sin that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe. But before faith came we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterward be revealed. Wherefore the law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ that we might be justified by faith.

This argument of Paul in uninspired language is briefly this. The law of God demands a perfect obedience in order that anyone can be justified but by it: so that if he is guilty of a single sin he is cast off at once from all hope of justification even if his future life be perfectly holy: For he that offendeth in one point is guilty of all. The law threatens everlasting perdition to the first and the smallest violation of it and no after obedience or repentance can avert or mitigate its severities. It is declared by God himself that cursed is everyone that continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law to do them. The soul that sinneth it shall die. And the sentences cannot be revoked or altered till heaven and earth pass away. Now as all men without exception have been guilty of at least one sin they are all and each of them cut off altogether from justification before God by any righteousness of their own. We all of us by nature are under a sentence of eternal destruction and no power in heaven or earth but that of Jehovah can avail to reverse or cancel the decree. Blessed be God then that under such disheartening circumstances we are assured that Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to everyone that believeth.

In the second place it is necessary that Christ should be our righteousness that is it is necessary we should be justified by his righteousness because we perform previous to regeneration no one holy action.

Here again may we secure to the argument of Paul: for this is one of his arguments to cut off all men from the hope of justification by their own works. This is a point upon which he labors with all his energies especially in his Epistles to the Romans and Galatians. And he evidently regards this doctrine of justification by faith as the foundation of the Gospel as the very essence of a sinner's religion without which no flesh can be saved. In his first chapter to the Romans he gives a lively and a terrific picture of the moral degradation of the Gentile nations. In the second chapter he describes the wickedness of the Jews as little inferior to that of the Heathens. The object of these descriptions is to prove the proposition which he laid down in the first chapter that the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth to the Jew first and also to the Greek. For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith: as it is written the just shall live by faith. In these verses we see the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ's righteousness and that none can be seen in any other way. And to prove this position he gives a separate description of the depravity of Gentiles and Jews as already observed in the first and second chapters showing thereby that their own works would not justify them. And he sums up the whole in this conclusive manner. What then? Are we (Jews) better than they (Gentiles). No: in no wise: for we have before proven both Jews and Gentiles that they are all under sin. As it is written, there is none righteous no not one: there is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. They are all gone out of the way, they: they are become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good no not one. Their throat is an open sepulchre: with their tongues they have used deceit: the poison of asps is under their lips. Whose month is full of cursing and bitterness: their feet are swift to shed blood. Destruction and misery are in their ways and the way of praise have they not known: there is no fear of God before their eyes. Now we know that what things the law saith to them who are under the law; that every mouth may be stopped and the whole world become guilty before God. Therefore by deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight: for by the law is the knowledge of sin. Truly if the human heart tend to such wickedness when left to itself – if it be so totally destitute of all that is pleasing to God who would not respond the sentiment - by deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in the sight of God! Yet this dreadful and indiscriminate description of the natural heart is again and again repeated in similar terms both in the old and new testaments. It is the testimony of the old testament that the heart of the sons of men is full of evil and that the heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked. And the writers of the new testament confirm this unwelcome truth when they say - The carnal man is enmity against God; for it is not subject to his law neither indeed can be. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God. I know that in me that is in my flesh dwelleth no good thing. The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God because they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned.

Now if this be a faithful accounting of mankind by nature we ask where is there any grounds for the justification of an individual of the race by his own righteousness! His righteousness! The scriptures above recited expressly declare, that there is none righteous no not one.

Even granting it possible that the man guilty of one sin could by future obedience obtain pardon and acceptance with God there would still be no hope in our case: for it seems by these texts of scripture just quoted that antecedently to regeneration there is actually nothing in our characters which God regards with complacency. The very first holy exercise we have must be the result of the influence of the Spirit and these would never have been granted to any of us only through the meritorious righteousness of the Savior.

The self righteous man then is holy driven off from his ground. Even if he deny that deep rooted - that universal alienation of our hearts from God which the Scriptures charge upon us one and all still there is no foothold for him. For if he have sinned but once in his whole life he has brought on his head the everlasting curse of a broken law and there must it lie until some arm stronger than a mortals is stretched out to deliver him. The alternative is before him either to believe on the Son and be saved or to believe not in the Son and be damned.

The subject we are discussing is so important my hearers that it has insensibly exhausted too much of our time to permit the discussion of the second part of it in this discourse. In closing this head however permit me to declare one or two inferences.

First the subject shows us how rich free and unmerited was the grace that devised and executed the plan of our Redemption.

The Lord looked down upon the children of men to see if there were any that did understand and serve God - they are all gone out of the way - they are together become unprofitable. And was there anything in such a picture to induce the eternal God to put the universe in motion and share his own Son to save such a rebellious race? Surely there was nothing unless it were our infatuation. We were fighting against God and he will know that we should resist all his offers of mercy and crucify his dearly beloved Son and resist as long as we were able the influence of his Spirit. Yet did this gracious God in the face of this mad rebellion against him develop a stupendous plan for reconciliation and rescue - a plan which excites the admiration of heaven and which demanded infinite wisdom to devise and infinite benevolence and power to execute: O who would not join the apostle in rejoicing that salvation is wholly by grace through faith and that not of ourselves it is the gift of God! And bring forth the top stone thereof with shoutings crying grace grace unto it.

Secondly. The subject discussed shows us how pitiable and awful is the state of the sinner who has secured no interest in the righteousness of Christ.

Every such person has broken the law of God and therefore has gone forth against him a sentence from the righteous judicature of heaven consigning him over to the blackness of darkness forever. So long as he continues without faith in Christ not one ray of hope not one promise of mercy can reach him. The two edged sword of a broken law is already thirsting for his blood and the stern aspect of vindictive justice unsoftened by a single shade of compassion meets him in every approach to the Deity. He has no portion beyond this short life but the untold agonies of the pit. The fact that Christ has made a propitiation for the whole world and redeemed us from the curse of the law can make no difference in his condition so long as he goes about to establish his own righteousness and neglect to submit to the righteousness of God. This fact can make no difference in his condition did I say? It does make an awful difference. It swells most fearfully the sinner's guilt and condemnation. Indeed the guilt of neglecting a Saviour is represented as paramount to all other sins. He that believeth not is condemned already, etc. And this is the condemnation that light has come into the world, etc. If I had not come and spoken unto them they had not had sin but now they have no cloak for their sin. He that despised Moses' law died without mercy under two or three witnesses. Of how much more, etc. How shall we escape if we neglect, etc. We shall not escape but indignation and wrath tribulation and anguish will be our portion forever.

Sermon 113 Righteousness of Christ

[Sermon No. 113, "Righteousness of Christ," Jeremiah 23:6, 1822 Jun,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 5]

Jeremiah 23:6

And this is his name whereby he shall be called, the Lord our Righteousness.

[See Sermon 112 for the first half of this series.]

That distinguished reformer Martin Luther regarded the doctrine of justification by faith alone as the grand test distinguishing a standing from a falling church - that is if a church unequivocally and unreservedly maintained this doctrine that church was built on the foundation of the prophets and apostles Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone. But if a church rejected this doctrine she had departed from the faith once delivered to the saints having given heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils and could not therefore long stand. And indeed when we see how constant are the efforts of all the sacred writers to strip away from man every self righteous prop and to turn his hopes towards the sovereign grace and mercy of God in Christ and especially when we read the constant the laborious the earnest efforts of Paul to establish the drop doctrine of justification by faith alone on an immovable foundation we must regard this as a fundamental doctrine of revelation if there be any thing fundamental in the Gospel. This eminent apostle brings all the resources of his vigorous mind under the particular influence of the Spirit of God to bear with reiterated intensity upon the subject. He seems to have no hope of man until he has driven them off from every resting place of self righteousness and caused them to look to Christ alone. He presents before sinners only the methods in which they can be justified either by works exclusively or by faith exclusively. His motto is if by grace then it is no more of works; otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works then it is no more grace; otherwise works is no more works. After presenting this alternative to the sinner he proceeds with an unsparing hand to show him that the first of these methods of justification that is by works alone is utterly beyond his power and about by his sins he has cut himself off from all hope by works of law. Before his inspired touch the robust fabric of self righteousness vanishes like a dream, when one awakes. Yet he does not leave the sinner here. For he saw that he would endeavor to build up a mixed system of justification in which works should have a share and grace a share. Into this fabric too the apostle enters and like Samson he takes hold of the pillars of it and carries them away and the superstructure tumbles into ruin. He now endeavours to press the sinner to fly to the only remaining refuge the righteousness of Christ. There he exhibits a God beaming mercy and kindly receiving and forgiving the penitent and making him an heir to an eternal inheritance. But in every other spot he exhibits God as a consuming fire taking vengeance on those who will not submit to his method of salvation.

And we consider how extremely tenacious men are of their self righteousness we need not wonder at the earnestness and repetition of the apostle on this point. The sinner will abandon everything else even property ease reputation and even life sooner than his self-confidence. You may reason with him out of the scriptures and convince his understanding beyond a doubt that he cannot be justified by his own righteousness and yet his heart will cling to it. If you drive him from one self-righteous support he will fly to another. He will rest on anything and everything rather than submit to the righteousness of God. How obstinately and perseveringly did Job cling to his own works as a ground of justification until he was made to see God and then he abhorred himself and repented in dust and ashes. The young ruler who came to enquire of Christ what good thing he must do to inherit eternal life preferred to lose his soul rather than give up his self-righteousness. The apostle Paul was an eminent example of one who trusted in himself that he was righteous. He has no doubt but he was a child of God and an heir of heaven until he was made to see the strictness and purity of the law of God and his own sinfulness. I was alive without the law says he but when the commandment came sin survived and I died. The self-righteous fabric he had been building fell in a moment never to rise and fleeing from its ruins he laid hold on the hope set before him in the Gospel through the faith that is in Christ Jesus. And on account of the immense change in his feelings and condition he was eminently qualified to be the great defender of justification by faith.

But to occupy no more time in these desultory remarks let us come to the subject we began to discuss in the morning. I proposed two questions springing out of the text - the first was why is it necessary Christ should be our righteousness? This has been considered and at least to my mind it was demonstrated that by works of law no flesh living can be justified. But through the righteousness of Christ we can be justified. We are led then to consider the second question - in what sense is Christ our righteousness?

In the first place are marked negatively that Christ's righteousness is not regarded by God as literally our righteousness.

The truth is it is impossible in the very nature of things that either the righteousness or sinfulness of one being should be transferred to another being. I may experience certain benefits from the holiness or suffer from the wickedness of another man: but neither one nor the other of these qualities can become mine so as to render me deserving of reward or punishment on my own account. And these views of the subject are coincident with scripture. Their language is this: The soul that sinneth it shall die. The son shall not bear the iniquity of the Father neither shall the Father bear the iniquity of the son: the righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him. It is evident then that the righteousness of Christ cannot be made an inherent quality of the believer so that shall on that account deserve reward.

In the second place, Christ is not our righteousness in such a sense that we need no inherent personal righteousness of our own.

Our personal righteousness as we have already seen cannot have any efficacy in procuring for us justification first because previous to justification we have none. We have all gone out of the way and none of us is righteous no not one and secondly because if we possessed any righteousness our sins would cut us off from all claim to reward and lay us under sentence of everlasting woe. But it does not follow that personal holiness is unnecessary for us because it is only through Christ's righteousness that we can be justified. For without about personal righteousness we can never have proof that we are justified: Nay the want of this is a conclusive evidence that we remain under condemnation. For whoever is justified bestowed upon him will have also a holy principle implanted within him. These two things are inseparable in the purposes of God and it is infatuation to suppose the one can exist without the other. There have been those in indeed assuming the Christian name who have maintained the deadly sentiment that as Christ by his obedience has fulfilled the moral law in their stead they are released from its obligations and if they only believe in Christ it is not important to enquire whether they keep or violate the commandments. But O my soul come not thou into their secret; unto their assembly mine honor be not thou united.

We now proceed to state positively in what sense Christ is our righteousness.

In the first place it is in consequence of his righteousness alone that the believer receives from God the pardon of his sins.

This is the first great step in the article of justification and it is uniformly ascribed to the blood or merits of Christ as its first procuring cause. The blood of Jesus Christ, says John, cleanses us from all sin. In whom, says Paul, we have redemption through his blood the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of his grace. Christ declares to Paul that the object of calling him to the ministry was to open the eyes of the Gentiles and to turn them from darkness to light and from the power of Satan unto God that they may's receive forgiveness of sins and inheritance among them which are fortified by faith that is in me.

In Paul's address to the Jews in the synagogue at Antioch he thus speaks - Be it known unto you therefore men and brethren that through this man Jesus is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins: And by him all that believe are justified from all things from which you could not be justified by the law of Moses. Peter also addresses the unbelieving rulers of Jerusalem in this decided manner: The God of our Fathers raised up Jesus whom ye slew and hanged on the tree; Him half God exalted with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour for to give repentance to Israel and forgiveness of sins. The Jews indeed when Christ was on earth and forgave the sins of some one explained, who can forgive sins but God only? We however who believe that this Saviour who is our righteousness is called Jehovah shall not be perplexed with such a difficulty nor shall we regard him as blaspheming nor persecute him nor take up stones to stone him because he declares God to be his Father. Thereby making himself equal with God.

In the second place Christ's righteousness secures to the believer title to the joys of heaven.

By his own blood, says Paul, he entered in once into the holy place having obtained eternal redemption for us. He is the mediator of the new testament that by means of death for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance. Moreover the law entered that the offense might abound: but when sin abounded grace did much more abound: that as sin hath reigned unto death even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life. By one offering he hath perfected forever them that are sanctified. He that hath the Son hath life. If when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son; much more being reconciled we shall be saved by his life. But not to multiply quotations it is the new song that is sung by the blessed in heaven worthy art thou to take the book and to open the seal thereof for thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by the blood out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation.

In the third place the righteousness of Christ is the processing cause of the personal righteousness and sanctification of the believer.

It is one of the plainest principles of revelation that without the influences of God's Holy Spirit men would remain dead in trespasses and sins and though they have ears they would not hear and though they have eyes they would not see but go on stupid and unconcerned to the judgment. It is another principle equally plain that had not Christ magnified the law and made it honorable by his obedience and sufferings God's Spirit would never have been poured out on our apostate world - I tell you the truth, says Christ, it is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart I will send him unto you. He came unto his own says John and his own received him not. But as many as received him to them gave he power to become the sons of God even to them that believe on his name which were born not of blood nor of the will of the flesh nor of the will of man but of God. Not by works of righteousness which we have done but according to his manner he saved us by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Savior that being justified by his grace we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life. Who (Christ) gave himself for us that he might redeem us from all iniquity and purify unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works. What know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you which ye have of God and ye are not your own. For ye are bought with a price. The love of God is shed abroad in your hearts by the Holy Ghost.

The sanctification of the believer is also in scripture attributed to the same Spirit given as a reward to the righteousness of Christ. But ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but you are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit of our God. Jesus Christ - who unto us of God is become wisdom and righteousness and sanctification and redemption. Both he that sanctifieth and they that are sanctified are all one wherefore he is not ashamed to call them brethren.

These are the most important respects in which Christ is our righteousness. They comprehend indeed the beginning and the end of the means of salvation. Had not Christ wrought out a perfect righteousness never could the sins of the apostate man be forgiven, never could a title have been given to the joys of heaven but the flaming sword of a broken law would have turned every way to guard that holy place from the polluted tread of sinful man - never would an individual of the race have been awakened from the slumber of spiritual death but enmity to God would have steeled the heart of every descendent of Adam in a stubborn and increasing defiance of its Maker. That many are forgiven converted sanctified and glorified is the result altogether of the righteousness of Christ. Man's native holiness - man's acquired holiness have had no influence whatever in processing these blessings. The doctrine of justification by faith in Christ's blood taken in its fullest extent and viewed in its connections unfolds a system of love and wisdom calculated to excite our gratitude our appreciation and our love. Having thus amply established and explained this doctrine permit me to close with a few inferences.

1. The subject is calculated to humble us.

To make those he addresses feel this inference seems to have been an important object of Paul in urging upon them this doctrine. After having uttered those memorable words being justified freely by his grace through the redemption there is in Christ Jesus, and he asks, Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? Of works? Nay: but by the law of faith. God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ by whom the world is crucified unto me and I unto the world. If him are ye in Christ Jesus who of God is made unto us wisdom and righteousness and sanctification and redemption that according as it is written he that glorieth let him glory in the Lord. Until we are brought to feel that justification is entirely by grace through the redemption there is in Christ Jesus we shall inevitably be led to boast. And indeed the man who believes that he is justified partly by his works and partly by faith has reason to boast and to glory in those works so far as they avail to his justification. This single fact one would approve one suppose were enough to show that this mixed system of justification is erroneous.

Secondly. The subject discussed presents the most powerful motives to the justified believer to be diligent in the performance of good works.

Such an one is justified from all things which the law lays to his charge. What a debt of gratitude then is imposed upon him and how can he neglect to strive to the utmost to keep the commandments! If the love of God indeed be within him he cannot have a more powerful appeal presented to him. It was this which roused up apostles and martyrs to be willing to be killed all the day long and to be accounted asleep for the slaughter and to regard themselves notwithstanding as more than conquerors through him that loved them and died for them.

Yet it is frequently objected against this doctrine of gratuitous justification that it tends to make men neglect their duty: because their best deeds can be of no avail in the sight of God. This objection just shows on what motives those act who make it. They are altogether selfish. They feel as if there could be no motive to the performance of good deeds unless they can thereby purchase heaven. Were such renewed in their minds they would find such selfish feelings not to be half as powerful and impelling to good works as a sense of the debt of gratitude the believer owes to his Saviour. Indeed it is to men who believe the doctrine of gratuitous justification that we are to look for the most active and disinterested benevolences and experience shows that such are the men who exhibit most.

Thirdly. The subject discussed presents us with an argument in favor of the final perseverance of all real Christians.

The argument is this. The terms in which the doctrine of justification are expressed imply in the plainest manner that every genuine believer in Christ is immediately justified. Ye are washed ye are sanctified - ye are justified, says he. Now only grant this and we are expressly told that whom God foreknew he predestinated and justified and glorified. That is certainly all who are justified will be glorified in heaven. There is no mode of evading this argument except by denying that men are ever justified in this world - a supposition that seems inconsistent with many express declarations of the bible.

In the last place this subject shows on how firm a rock the Christian's hope rests and how much cause he has for triumphant exultation.

Paul after having gone through with this subject in a number of chapters terminates the discussion by one of the most encouraging and animating conclusions that ever fell from the lips of a mortal. With a part of this appeal which occupies the whole of the eighth chapter of Romans we conclude - There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit. And we know that all things work together for good and them that love God to them who are called according to his purpose. For whom he did foreknow he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son that he might be the first born among many brethren - (and so on to the end of the chapter)

Sermon 114 Advantages of Charity

[Sermon No. 114, "Advantages of Charity," Proverbs 11:25, 1822 May,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 5]

Proverbs 11:25

The liberal soul shall be made fat: and he that watereth shall be watered also himself.

In almost every part of the material creation we discover in active operation the principle of reciprocation. The streams of water all empty into the ocean and the ocean in return sends up the vapors to form those clouds that supply the rivers. From the clouds descend those rains that fertilize the earth and the very process of vegetation that is set in motion by this rain produces those vapours mount up to heaven and form the clouds. The leaves of plants and trees are produced from the soil and then when decayed descend to the earth and fertilize it anew. The sun shines on the planets and the planets reflect back light upon the sun. The sun attracts the planets and the planets the sun and thus are their relative situations and proper motions presented.

But the system of reciprocation is not limited to the physical creation. It extends also to the moral world. All beings in the universe that are holy render to each other a mutual return of love. God loves these beings and the stronger the evidences of this to their minds the more warmly will their affections flow toward him. And the more ardently one being loves another the more intensely will that attachment be returned: so that in this case the latter part of the text (which in fact contains the same though as the former part) is fulfilled he that watereth it shall be watered himself.

The text however in its connexion was limited to a single case of reciprocation. It refers to acts of beneficence or charity and is confined to that branch of charity which consists in relieving the wants of our fellow man by the bestowment of a portion of our property as appears from the context. In this limited sense I shall employ it on this occasion. And I shall endeavor to show that the man who devotes a part of his time and money for the amelioration of the temporal or spiritual condition of his fellow man receives more than adequate return of benefits so that in the figurative language of scripture he is made fat - I do not expect my friends on this subject to elicit anything new to interest you. But perhaps it may be profitable at this time, to stir up your pure mind by way of remembrance.

Whether the charitable man will be more than repaid for his deeds of beneficence will depend on the promises of God.

Let a few of these therefore be repeated. The text and content is one. There is that scattereth and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet but it tendeth to poverty. The liberal soul shall be made fat; and he that watereth shall be watered also himself. He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord; and that which he hath given will he pay him again. He that hath a bountiful eye shall be blessed; for he giveth of his bread to the poor. Thou shalt surely give him and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest him because that for the thing the Lord shall bless thee in all thy works. Do good and lend hoping for nothing again and your reward shall be great and ye shall be the children of the Highest. Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days. He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly – and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully. Blessed is he that considereth the poor. The Lord shall deliver him in time of trouble.

Here we perceive promises made to the liberal soul. The temporal and spiritual blessings - blessings of time and blessings of eternity - blessings of soul and blessings of body. And we know that God is not man that he should lie: neither the son of man that he should repent: hath he said and shall he not do it? Or hath he spoken and shall he not make it good? Unquestionably these promises God will fulfill up to the very last iota. Although it may seem paradoxical to us to say that to give away our property tends to increase our property yet after all it may be true that the Providence of God has so ordered events that such shall be the ultimate effect of charity. At any rate he who directs all things in heaven and in earth is all so to dispose circumstances that the liberal soul shall find temporal and spiritual prosperity attending it as a reward for its beneficence. Let us examine some of the modes in which charity tends in its own nature to produce this effect.

In the first place a liberal charity to the wants of our fellow men tends to render a man more industrious and frugal.

Most men waste a large portion of their time - some of us in sleep - someone in unprofitable conversation and some in pursuing their business in a dilatory unenergetick manner. Most of us could do more to increase our property or improve our minds many of us could do much more than we actually perform. Now charity evidently tends to furnish the requisite stimulus to extra exertion. For we draw we know that we have reduced thereby our stock of property and few of us are there who are so little fond of our money as not to wish to have the deficiency made up. And besides one deed of charity begets the desire to perform a second and here too is a powerful motive to increase our industry that we may obtain the means.

There are few of us also who do not indulge in some businesses with which we might dispense without injury to soul or body. And the same principle that operates to render us more industrious will tend to make cut out every needless article of expense. In these two modes does charity return with a temporal blessing upon our own heads - so that leaving out of the account altogether the idea that God peculiarly be prospers the liberal soul, it is probable that in most cases charity tends to increase rather than to decrease a man's property. As this effort of liberality however is silent and gradual and unnoticed a man's temporal prosperity is perhaps never imputed to this cause when it might have been the spring of his industrious habits and the secret of this thrift.

In the second place liberal charity when sincerely and unostentatiously performed procures for a man the gratitude of those he relieves and the respect of a virtuous part of society.

To procure this good opinion of men should not indeed be the grand motive for beneficence but still a good man is rather to be chosen than great riches and loving favour rather than silver and gold. And I see not therefore why it may not be among the motives that influence us to support charitable institutions. At any rate if this does not operate upon us in the least in the bestowing our goods just to feed the spiritual or temporal poor, it is still one of the almost inevitable consequences of charity and may therefore be considered as one of its rewards and if it be then as Solomon says that this is rather to be chosen than great riches surely it is more than an equivalent for the small sums we bestow in charity.

In the third place the liberal soul has a fairer prospect than parsimonious souls of receiving the charitable assistance of his fellow men should he ever be reduced to want.

This is too evident to demand proof or illustration. Men almost universally are inclined to let a man feel at least some of the effects of his niggardliness: and indeed their hearts and hands never will open so freely nor so widely to believe such a man as one of a contrary character: although it may be questioned whether this feeling or rather want of feeling is not contrary to the Gospel. But we know that our hearts are naturally contrary to the Gospel and we are here speaking of things as they are and not as they should be.

In the next place the charitable man is amply rewarded by those benevolent feelings that result from his excesses of beneficence.

Selfishness is by nature the governing principle of our natures. We see this in the child that has not arrived at years of moral discernment. The heart is bent wholly bent upon gratifying its own desires whatever may be the consequences. This disposition continues to get firmer and firmer hold of us as we grow up if we are not renewed and although its undisguised deformity as it manifests itself in children is hidden and modified by the customs of society yet it is still under all its counterfeit forms selfishness. But there is not a greater enemy to our happiness in the universe than this. The more therefore it is subdued within us and the stronger the principle of benevolence becomes within us so much will our real happiness be increased. Now a man may be liberal and generous in providing for the necessities and conveniences and luxuries for his family and near relatives who yet has not one particle of that liberality mentioned in the text. It is not till his heart begins to feel that all members are his brethren - it is not till the miseries of the remote stranger and the heathen begin to touch his heart and expand his sympathies. It is not till he actually finds his hands opening and contributing to their relief that he feels anything of that expensive benevolence which maketh the soul fat and which when it waters others finds itself watered. It is when a man's benevolence is thus enlarged that he begins to resemble God. And just in proportion as our likeness to God increases will our happiness increase. The man of this universal benevolence who realizes that mankind are about one mighty brotherhood mutually bound to impart assistance to one another experiences in his soul a richness and extent of happiness and comfort to which the man of avaricious parsimonious disposition is a total stranger. If the latter derives any satisfaction from the idea of being rich and of having and holding his possessions to him and his heirs sine fine it is a contracted a sordid kind of satisfaction. It is an easy matter for a man who loves his money better than he loves mankind to find a thousand excuses for denying his charities in aid of the benevolent institutions of the present day. He may believe that they are all ill conducted or that the time for such exertions is not yet come or that the calls of his family forbid him to cooperate - and these objections may afford him a kind of covering against all benevolent applications. But at the same time his conscience does not rest easy. His soul is confined to too small a compass to satisfy an immortal mind. His noble powers cannot bear to be frozen up in such contracted selfishness and often conscience will whisper in his ear and disturb his comfort that his neglect to contribute does not result from any real objections there are to the plans of benevolence now in operation but because he loves his money too well to love mankind.

But on the other hand the liberal soul finds a heartfelt satisfaction springing up within him when he casts in his portion into the treasury of the Lord. He feels that secret consolation which results from an approving conscience. His soul has room to enlarge herself and her rich and benevolent feelings range over the whole world and embrace the whole human family - and the wish for the happiness of all that follows the charitable deed diffuses a calm satisfaction through the bosom akin to that which moves the Redeemer to undertake the rescue of man from the ruins of the fall.

Such are some of the benefits in this world that return as the effect of benevolent deeds to bless the liberal soul. But what shall I say of those the man whom charities are performed from right motives will receive in another world? Among these it may be mentioned that many an object of his beneficence will rise up and call him blessed and salute him as the instrument of bringing him to glory. There too will he emphatically find the promise of God fulfilled in the flowing in upon his soul of the river of life and consolation and happiness. By this will his soul - his every faculty - be filled to overflowing as a rich reward for all his exertions on earth. This final fullness of joy - these pleasures forevermore has God promised through his Son to whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple. And though heaven and earth pass away his words shall not pass away.

My hearers if such be the tendencies of charity in this world - if such be its reward in heaven, who must not acknowledge that the bestowment of a portion of our money to supply the spiritual or temporal wants of a perishing world instead of impoverishing makes rich - doubly rich - especially that no soul is made fat - and that the streams of benevolence that flow from us return enlarged and purified to water our souls again? If such be the results of charity who would not pity the man that lives without exercising it with his heart frozen up in the narrow and dark dungeon of selfishness! And, finally, if such be the tendency of charity, why need I search on this occasion for further motives to encourage the hearts and strengthen the hands of the members of the respectable societies convened before me. It is true the motives to charity I have this day presented before you are in some sense selfish - though it is a selfishness very different from that which we possess by nature - nay it is in opposition to this. It is selfishness which seeks the purification of the soul and which longs to have it resemble God. It is a selfishness which animated Christ who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross despised the shame and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. In short it is a selfishness which tends to eradicate selfishness and which it is difficult to suppose can have any existence in any heart that does not love God and feel desirous to promote his glory and therefore do we earnestly wish to see this kind of selfishness increase and prevailing in any more hearts. For in this case self love and social are the same. We hope to see it increasing in the members of these societies and we feel confident we shall also see increasing in their hearts love to God and a love to man. Let us remember my brethren that if we are faithful to the injunctions of the constitutions of our societies we have the promise of the Almighty God who cannot lie that we shall be blessed in time and blessed in eternity. Let us therefore resolve in the strength of the Lord that we will not be moved from our charitable purposes - neither by the ignoble feelings or example of an ungodly world nor by the stupidity and remissness of our hearts. The objects of our societies are not limited to our connexions to our townsmen to our countrymen but they extend I believe to every object of misery whether he wants be spiritual or temporal through the earth. They are not bounded by the narrow limits of a day or year or by the duration of the universe. They reach into eternity. They reach through eternity. Probably these societies have already decided the everlasting fate of one or more immortal souls. The destiny of many more in the divine purposes be depending on these exertions. Some brethren may be now standing ready to embrace the Gospel and almost within the sound of it - a few dollars only being wanting to carry it to him. And our charities perhaps if they be continued may convey it to him and he be made an heir of glory - but if they be withheld and these societies perish he may never come within the reach of salvation but live without God and die without hope. Let us then keep one eye fixed upon the miseries of this dying world and the other looking on the promises of God and we shall find our hearts waxing stronger and stronger in the good works and our hands opening wider and wider until we shall be called to the reward of our labours.

Sermon 116 Forsaking the Camp of the World for Christ

[Sermon No. 116, "Forsaking the Camp of the World for Christ," Hebrews 13:13, 1822 Aug, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 5]

Hebrews 13:13

Let us therefore go forth unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach.

The person to whom we are here exhorted to go is Christ on the cross. Mount Calvary where he suffered was without the gates of Jerusalem and the apostle informs us that there was something appropriate in this circumstance because thereby the sacrifice of Christ was offered up as were the various animals under the Levitical priesthood. The bodies of those beast, says he, whose blood is brought into the sanctuary are burned without the camp. Wherefore Jesus also that he might sanctify the people with his own blood suffered without the gate. Let us go forth therefore unto him without the camp bearing his reproach.

In the circumstance of Christ's suffering without the camp several things are implied. First. It signified that his gospel would bring men out of the observances of the Jewish legal ceremonies into the worship of God in spirit and in truth. 2. It signified that the Jews regarded him as an accursed thing not fit even to die in the city. And 3 it signified that his followers must come out from this world and be separate bearing his reproach.

In this latter signification I shall regard the text at this time. By the camp I shall understand the world at large although no doubt it had a special reference to the Jewish site and legal ceremonies and prejudices in which that people were and still are entrenched as with ramparts. And I shall consider

1. The nature of the camp.
2. The kind of reproach those may expect who go out of it.
3. The motives for abandoning it.

The first circumstance to be noticed in regard to the camp of the world is that it is made up of those who have rebelled against God and who have taken up arms to fight against him.

In the scriptures only two empires are described among men - the kingdom of light and the kingdom of darkness - the empire of Christ and the empire of Satan. Originally all of us belong to the dominion of the latter: God looked down from heaven upon the children of men to see if there were any that they did understand and seek God. They are all gone out of the way. There is none that doeth good no not one. Over the whole face of the earth from the rising to the setting sun God saw nothing but an universal revolt and rebellion - not even one maintaining his cause and doing his will but they were all gone out of the way. Yet he resolved to establish his kingdom even in such an alienated spot - and sending his own son into the world to as many as received him to them gave he power to become the sons of God even to them that believe on his name. Which were born not of blood nor of the will of the flesh nor of the will of man but of God. And in the days of the apostles they testified that another kingdom then existed on earth opposed to the empire of Satan. We know, says John, that we are of God and the whole world lieth in wickedness. And you, says Paul to the Ephesians, hath he quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins wherein in time past he walked according to the course of this world. But ye are a chosen generation, says Peter to the Christians whom he addressed, a royal priesthood an holy nation a peculiar people that ye should show forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvelous light: Which in times past were not a people but are now the people of God which had not obtained mercy but now have obtained mercy.

It appears from this passage that all who are not chosen out of the world still belong to it and in the language of scripture all who have not gone forth unto Christ without the camp bearing his reproach are denominated by way of emphasis and distinction the world. And that these are the enemies of God encamped as it were against him appears from the express declarations of scripture. We are told by Paul that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself. To the Romans he says, if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son. And if this term world apply to the Christians in Rome it would apply equally well to the whole world - to the Ephesians and he says, we were by nature the children of wrath even as others. And who are others unless it be all men? Know ye not, says James, that the friendship of the world is enmity with God - whosoever therefore will be the friend of the world is the enemy of God. But how could this be unless the character of the world were enmity against God? Said Christ to his disciples, If ye were of the world the world would love his own: but because ye are not of the world but I have chosen you out of the world therefore the world hateth you. If the world hate ye know that it hated me before it hated you. He that hateth me hateth my Father also.

A second fact important to be noticed is that the Prince of darkness is the ruler and Captain of the camp out of which we are exhorted to flee.

Paul charges the Ephesians with having formerly walked according to the course of this world - and what is the course of this world? He immediately adds according to the Prince of the powers of the air the Spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience. It appears then that the general course of the world is in conformity to the will of Satan. And in another place the same Apostle expressly denominates Satan the God of this world meaning thereby if language means anything that he is worshipped and served by the world. He it is who rules in the camp of the world and he is the author of those attempts wicked men have made to subvert the Gospel. There are only instruments in his hands led captive by him at his will. Ye are of your Father the Devil, says Christ to the ungodly Jews, and the lusts of your Father ye will do.

A third circumstance in regard to the camp of this world which is pitched in warfare with God, is that those who have taken up arms within it will not receive any ambassadors from Him to propose terms of peace.

God has selected two of the most exalted and glorious characters the universe could furnish and sent them to the world on an embassy fully empowered to make reconciliation. But the obstinate those rebels who have named the standard of revolt have hoisted the bloody flag and refused to receive these messages. Does this statement seem exaggerated? Let us turn to the inspired word. God so loved the world that he sent his only begotten son that whosoever believeth on him might not perish but have everlasting life. But he was in the world and the world was made by him and the world knew him not. He came to his own and his own received him not. He is despised and rejected of men a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief and we hid as it were our faces from him: he was despised and we esteemed him not.

Nor was the mission of the Holy Spirit the second ambassador better received. Says Christ was disciples, I will pray the Father and he shall give you another Comforter that he may abide with you forever even the Spirit of truth whom the world cannot receive. And as it was said of the Jews so is it true of all unregenerate men, they do always resist the Holy Ghost.

The faithful ministers of Christ are also styled ambassadors from heaven being proposals of praise to a rebellious world. Now then says Paul, We are ambassadors for Christ as though God did beseech you by us we pray you in Christ's stead be ye reconciled to God. Yet without the all powerful influences of the Spirit to accompany their proposals they would in no instance be received. And the most successful minister has always had occasion to say, Paul may plant and Appollos water but God giveth the increase.

The last fact I shall mention in regard to the camp of this world is that those who have taken up arms within its ramparts are acting under the influence of a strong delusion.

Although the evidence of their hostility to God is clear as noon day yet they do not know that they are his enemies and will resent the charge. Even at the moment they are buckling on the armor and brandishing the sword and hurling the darts of rebellion against God they declare themselves to be his friends. And when they are led captive by Satan at his will they do not suspect themselves to be under his influence at all. Though they have eyes they see not and though they have ears they hear not. In whom the God of this world hath blindeth the mind of them which believe not let the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ who is the image of God should shine unto them. In the book of Revelation that old serpent called the devil and Satan is deceiving the whole world. Yet so crafty are his wiles and so delusive his influence that the world are ignorant of his devices and led along blindfolded down the steep road of destruction.

Having given some characteristics of the camp of this world out of which Paul entreats us to flee to Christ bearing his reproach I proceed secondly to enquire in what that reproach consist.

If we escape from the world and go to Christ the world regard it as desertion. And indeed it is so - it is deserting the ranks of Satan and fleeing to the banner of Christ. But although it be most honorable yet the enemies of God are mortified and chagrined that they have lost a companion and they will pursue him with reproach. Deserters from an army are always regarded as proper subjects of pursuit and severe chastisement and even of death. Death also was inflicted on those who abandoned the ranks of Satan. The apostles suffered death and the kings of the earth have been drunk with the blood of the saints. But in these happier days little else is to [be] feared than the reproach of the tongue. And as the soldiers in a camp of fire most rapidly upon a deserter who is yet within the rank of their armies so when the enemies of God perceive one of their number quitting their ranks and flying without the camp they pour forth upon him most thickly the darts of reproach. That is to drop the figure a man who is recently converted is most exposed to be evil spoken of and hated by the world than one who has long been a follower of Christ. And as in an army the officers and soldiers are severe towards deserters when the number greatly increases so the world pour forth more bitter reproaches against converts in time of a revival than in a time of stupidity because at the former season they apprehend their cause is losing ground and the deserters of so many of their companions around them distrusts their consciences and makes them clarify the goodness of their cause.

But what are the particular reproaches (the enemies of God pour forth) that come forth from the camp of the world against that man who quits the camp of the world and goes to Christ without the gate.

In the first place he is said to be frightened. It is regarded by the world an evidence of cowardice that an unrenewed man feels alarmed when he reads the express declaration of God that except he repent he shall be tormented day and night forever and ever. If a man trembles when he finds that an omnipotent God is angry with him every day and is just ready to rise against him clothed in vengeance, this is looked upon as an indicator of cowardice unworthy the character of a man of respectability in the world. This is one article of reproach.

A second is that he is a weak man. Whatever may have been his reputation for talents and strength of intellect the moment a man begins to be anxious for his soul and to talk of being born again and going to Christ he is looked upon as discovering great imbecility of mind. It is said of him that were his views more enlarged he would never have embraced such unfounded notions which so many philosophers and great men have rejected as puerile. And as men are naturally proud of their abilities probably this reproach is one of the most difficult to be borne.

Another reproach is that the man is deluded.

It always has been and still is and ever will be the fact that the things of the Spirit of God are foolishness to the natural man. The man therefore under the influence of God's Spirit will appear to such an one to have embraced a system of error and he knows not how to account for the great change in his views and feelings and conduct except to call it delusion. Indeed unless this natural man can persuade himself that the new convert is deluded it will follow that he himself is deluded. For if the convert be right this man is utterly wrong since there is a world of differences between them. But all men had rather blame others deluded than themselves. Never it is we hear so much about the delusions of new converts.

Another reproach the follower of Christ may expect if he live godly is that he is an enthusiast.

When the unregenerate see him following Christ resolutely and closely through good report and evil report they cannot conceive any thing but enthusiasm should attach him to a course in which they see nothing to love. To them Christ has no form nor comeliness and when they see him there is no beauty that they should desire him. To them the Cross is a stumbling block or foolishness and hence they conclude the man whose heart is warm in service of his lord and Master must be guided by an overheated zeal.

Such a man too must expect to be reproached as uncharitable censorious and bigoted. And why? Because he does not hesitate to tell unregenerate men that they must be born again or they cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven - and that their present course will lead them into the pit of perdition. And when he separates himself from the frailties of the unregenerate world and leaves them to go alone to destruction they not only call him a bigot but a persecutor who sets himself up as holier than others and intends to force them to adopt his creed and his habits.

On the same ground the Christian will be reproached as a melancholy misanthrope - unfriendly to the innocent amusements of the world and as making religion a gloomy forbidding thing. Men who have not religion have no more idea (very faint conceptions) of the pleasures derived from religious meditation prayer and profess them the deaf having the pleasure of hearing musick. Hence if the Christian will not join in the pursuit of worldly pleasure with as much eagerness as ever they regard him as melancholy and gloomy. Wherein, says Peter, they think it strange that you are not with them to the same excess of not speaking evil of you. And he adds, this alarming thought - who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead.

Another approach the follower of Christ may expect is a charge of hypocrisy. When such an one abandons the camp of the enemy the world will say let us wait a few years and we shall see this man returning again to our society. He is taking this course now to deceive others - the cloven foot will soon appear (the mask will soon drop) and his professed zeal in religion will be succeeded by ridicule of Christ. Unfortunately such prophecies sometimes prove true - but in nine cases out of ten they prove false. Yet the world takes more notice of one case of apostasy than of nine cases of perseverance.

Such are some of the reproaches the follower of Christ is exposed to. And the consequences of them is sometimes the destruction of worldly reputation the loss of friends and the loss of means of temporal support. But in the third place it seems as if it could present motives enough to persuade you my hearers to abandon the camp of God's enemies notwithstanding these light afflictions which if they come upon us are but for a moment and are calculated also to work out a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. Some of these motives will apply particularly to those real friends of Christ who are yet lingering in the camp of the world not quite ready to bear the reproaches of Christ not quite ready to go to him on Calvary and there be made a mark for the arrows of the ungodly.

In the first place the friend of Christ is urged to come out of the camp of his enemies because if he continues there he is in danger of losing his attachment to his Saviour and becoming ashamed to bear his reproach.

We are all saints and sinner mutative beings. Let us live year after year in contact with those of sentiments feelings and practices ever so opposite to our own we shall find our repugnance gradually waning away and our characters ere long will become assimilated to theirs. Thus the Christian who is surrounded by enemies of Christ first finds his love to the Saviour cooling - then it degenerates into positive neglect of him and it would finally unless God interpose be totally lost and the man be left to irretrievable apostasy. And this suggest another consideration. The Christian who remains in the camp of God's enemies has no reason to expect - he has no promise of that assistance God has vouchsafed to all those who stand by the cross of Christ bearing his reproach. The Lord has promised indeed to protect and defend his real children - but the promise is made only to those who have forsaken the camp of his enemies. Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness and what communion hath light with darkness? And what concord hath Christ with Belial? Or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? For ye are the temple of the of the living God: as God hath said and will dwell in them and walk them and I will be their God and they shall be my people. Wherefore come out from among them and be ye separate saith the Lord and touch not the unclean thing and I will receive you. And will be a Father unto you and ye shall be my sons and daughters saith the Lord Almighty.

The second motive urging the friend of Christ to escape from the camp of the ungodly is that he is often compelled to lend his influence against the cause of his Lord and Master.

His name is enrolled among the enemies of God and until he has publicly gone forth and given it to Christ he is regarded as one of the number and numerically at least he is reckoned as on their side.

Such an one may however say that he takes or decides a stand on the Lord's side that the world can derive no encouragement from his example.

But there is a season that frequently comes which in conformity with the figure used in the text may be called the review day when he is compelled to act against Christ. It is that day when all the friends of Christ are called upon to take their places in his ranks and in which his enemies range themselves in opposing ranks. Every man is forced to stand in the one side or the other. There is no neutral ground. He that is not for Christ is regarded as against him. But from the very nature of the case this man must appear in the ranks opposed to Christ. For to drop the figure we refer to the season of communion.

In the third place to urge the Christian to escape from the camp of of the world I point him to yonder hill of Calvary where his Saviour is suffering and bleeding.

Christ and his cause are identified. If the one suffers the other suffers. If one is attacked the other is attacked. Look then at your Saviour and his little band of followers and see with what fury their enemies are pouring in upon them on every side. See infidelity with his massive engines battering the fortress of the Gospel. See scepticism planting his mines underneath the walls and already lighting the torch to explode them. See persecution urging on her mad way brandishing and scattering her firebrands with her right hand and with her left drinking the blood of the saints. See Mammon with his companions pressing on in a firm unyielding phalanx and hurling their spears against the Saviour and his band. See lust and revenge and with them countless myriads darkening the air by a cloud of darts aimed at Calvary. See how they plant a new crown of thorns on the head of your Redeemer. See them stretching him again upon the cross piercing anew his hands with nails and his side with their spears. See how they walk mock insult and spit upon him and offer him gall and vinegar to drink. See how his little band of followers pace and stagger amid the onsets of their enemies. And can you the professed friend of this Jesus look on with indifference! Can you saved from hell and raised to heaven by that Saviour can you remain in the camp of his enemies and neglect to buckle on the armour of the Gospel and go up to the help of the Lord against the mighty!

Finally let us all be urged to escape from the camp of an ungodly world because those who remain in it will erelong be buried in everlasting ruin.

The contest is between God and man - that is between omnipotence and impotence - between omniscience and ignorance - between perfect justice and aggravated guilt. We know therefore who must finally be conqueror. And that sinners have been spared so long is not because God was not able to overcome them nor because they did not deserve destruction. Long have the thunderbolts of divine vengeance been struggling to get vent. But infinite mercy has restrained them. Long since has the sword of justice been raised over the sinner's head but forbearing mercy has held back the almighty arm. But mercy will erelong be exhausted and then all the artillery of heaven will pour its fury upon the camp of this wicked world. Saith the Lord the Lord of hosts the highest one of Israel. Ah I will ease me of mine adversaries and avenge me of mine enemies. And the destruction of the transgressors and of the sinners shall be together and they that shall forsake the Lord shall be consumed. And the throng shall be as long and the making of it is a spark and they shall both burn together and none shall quench them. The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven taking vengeance on them that knows not God and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. I will tread them in mine anger says Christ and trample them in my fury and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments and I will stain all my raiments. For the day of vengeance is in my heart and the year of my redeemer is come. O my fellow sinners let us escape from this devoted camp before this day of vengeance come. Let us escape for our lives nor stay in all the plain but flea to the mountain lest we become...

But Peter followed him afar off.

[The insert on pages 7-8 has been placed at the asterisk on page 8.]

The text points us to that distressing hour when the disciples of Jesus all forsook him and fled - and when his enemies have laid hold on him and led him away prisoner to the palace of the high priest. Peter however followed them at a distance that he might observe the vigil without endangering his own safety. But why this timidity in that disciple who had declared to Christ only a few hours before though I should die with thee yet will I not deny thee? Is this the man who had just drawn his sword and cut off the ear of Malchus one of those who came forth to seize Jesus? Why does he now abandon his Lord and Master in the hour of his utmost need when an infuriated rabble was dragging him away to a more furious judge? Does he believe that Master to have bestowed on him life everlasting and yet is he ashamed to acknowledge that he is his disciple and to stand by him in this trying moment? Does he an heir to eternal glory fear that he shall share the fate of his Master and go with him to heaven? Alas for poor weak human nature! How inefficient are its noblest resolutions! How utterly unable without divine assistance to perform the easiest of them!

But was not Peter sensible of his ingratitude in thus following his Lord at a distance in this hour of peril! No: he thought only of his own safety - his fearing those who could only kill the body overcame his fear of Him who was able to destroy both soul and body in hell. It was not till after he had thrice denied even that he knew his Master - it was not till the Lord turned to look upon Peter that he came to himself and repented and wept bitterly.

Christian brethren are not some of us following Christ far off like Peter and yet like him are ignorant of the distance between us and our Saviour! Permit me this morning to call your attention to this point and present before you some of those marks by which we may know whether we are in a backslidden state. In other words let me hold before you those exercises and actions of the Christian which show religion to be declining in his heart or that he has widely apostatized.

The first evidence of a departure from God is an increasing neglect of the closet of the Scriptures of self-examination and ejaculatory prayer.

Prayer is the channel through which this Christian receives his spiritual food from heaven. If he neglect this therefore leanness and poverty will be his portion. Accordingly we find I believe that all apostasies begin in the closet. A man cannot daily kneel alone before God and earnestly pray upon him without experiencing an effect on his mind as well at least often turn his thoughts solemnly upon religion and upon his own condition. While he is daily in the habit of sincerely and fervently invoking the assistance of God's Spirit to keep him from temptation Satan knows that he cannot get the advantage of him - and therefore his first effort is to make the Christian's closet an undesirable and an unfrequented place. And if he can see can succeed in this attempt he has gained one most important step towards attaining his end. If he can succeed in disrupting a man out of his closet in the morning he feels sure of entangling him in the business of the day in some temptation. The man who has earnestly implored the divine protection and assistance in the morning will in the midst of business be often turning his thoughts to the subject of religion during the day - and the Adversary dare not assault the shield of faith with which he knows such a man will be able to quench all his fiery darts.

To neglect secret prayer - earnest fervent secret prayer - opens the door for the neglect of God's work. For such a man will not be pleased to read there the command to pray without ceasing while he knows that he scarcely prays at all. (For this is what I mean by closet duties - not merely the repetition of some stereotyped form of prayer which even some very wicked men are careful to use morning and evening.) To get rid therefore of the reproof of conscience he will neglect to read the scriptures with self-application. Now will such a man be very fond of enquiring into the state of his heart daily: for his neglect of prayer will immediately rise before him and conscience will do its office for his omission. This too he will therefore be inclined to neglect. Ejaculatory prayer also will share the same fate. If closet duties be neglected the man will have no habitual sense of the presence of God in and therefore will not as the faithful fervent Christian does be putting up short mental petitions during the day wherever he may be. (Perhaps the person whose closet begins to be an unfrequented place may continue prayer in his family but his actions there also will be merely an unfeeling separation of certain accustomed words - and not that fervent effectual prayer which availeth much.)

Thus brethren is it made evident that if we begin to make ourselves strangers to our closets we do in fact open the door of our hearts to the enemy and depend upon it he always comes in like a flood and ere we are aware of it every obstacle that stands opposed to him in our hearts will be leveled in the dust and we shall be subjected to his dominion. Certainly that commander who in a fort is closely besieged by a powerful enemy could not inform expose himself more were he to throw open every gate of his garrison than does the Christian when he abandons his closet. And as it is almost certain that a besieged fort will be taken when its defenders begin to be remiss in their watchfulness so equally certain is it that he will be made a captive of Satan who is remiss in prayer. This is the first downward step the declining Christian takes and if he takes this rarely does he stop till he has descended several others. Let us then brethren ask ourselves as in the fear of God whether we have not taken this step and whether our closets are not less frequented than formerly.

The second thing that indicates a declension of religion is a decreasing relish for religious conversation upon personal piety.

It is generally regarded as evidence that a man is indifferent to any worldly subject if he seems to take little interest in commenting upon it. And there is no reason why the same conclusion should not be applied to religion. Especially if ever a man at one time much bent upon introducing this subject into conversation and at another time averse to it inclining to discourse upon every thing else in preference, we have reason to conclude that the interest he once took in it has subsided. And when the Christian finds worldly conversation more agreeable to him than that upon practical religion has he not every reason to conclude that the world is uppermost in his mind and that he has that friendship of the world which is enmity with God? The Christian who is growing daily in grace feels pleasure with the most searching discourse (conversation) upon vital godliness because it probes his heart and makes him examine more thoroughly his hope. The backslider on the contrary dreads such conversation for the same reason. He knows that in his present state his hope will not bear examination. He is more fond therefore of conversation (with a decent respectable man of the world) upon worldly concerns than with a devoted Christian upon the reason of the hope that is in him. And even when he meets his brethren and he will evidently take less interest in enquiring for religious news than for that wholly secular.

A third evidence of a declension of religion in the heart of the Christian is a decreasing anxiety for impenitent sinners.

When a man lies near to God in the lively exercise of faith and prayer he will deeply realize the desperate condition of those who are living without God and without hope. When he meets with such, however amiable their external deportment, the first thought that occurs to him and it is a most distressing thought is that they are children of wrath and under the condemnation of eternal death. And he cannot avoid looking forward only a few years to the time when if they repent not they will take up their abode in the regions of weeping and wailing. It distresses him too more than anything else that they are totally insensible to their condition and will not believe it. But little of this is felt by the apostatizing (backslidden) Christian. He has no great distress even on account of his impenitent children if he has any. He will say to them indeed that it is important that they should become religious but he will not realize that there is a difference between them and Christians as great as between eternal torments and eternal glory. And all because religion is so low in his own heart and (all) his pious feelings are blunted and he has no adequate conception either of the pains of hell or the joys of heaven.

A consequence of this want of sensibility to the condition of the impenitent is that the backslidden (unrenewed) Christian will neglect to warn and exhort such. Or if he should say any thing to his children and domestics he will say it in such a manner that the unregenerate person will see that he does not feel what he says and therefore it will have no abiding effect - certainly no good effect. And he will not pray earnestly for God's Spirit to accompany his exhortations.

And now my Christian brethren where is the difficulty of determining whether we have in our heart a distressing anxiety for impenitent sinners or not. (Can we not determine whether we deeply realize their lost and dreadful situation - and whether we are led daily to pray for them in our closets?). If not is it not good evidence of a low state of religion in our hearts - nay ought not the fact to arouse us to enquire whether we be not ourselves in this gall of bitterness and the bonds of iniquity. Can a man who has escaped the shipwreck ever forget the horrors of it? Can he ever feel indifferent when he sees others exposed to the same calamity? Surely not. Can the man who has escaped the shipwreck of the soul ever forget the danger he has escaped? Or feel unconcerned for others who are hovering about the very same rocks of ruin - driven on by the boisterous winds of passion blinded by the mists of prejudice and sin and without rudder or compass to guide them? Surely the man who does forget all this and feel unconcerned for the fate of others ought seriously to enquire whether he be not still among the number who are driving headlong and blindfold upon the rocks of ruin.

In the fourth place the apostatizing (backsliding) Christian neglects on very trifling accounts the public and social worship of God.

It was the manner of some to forsake the assembling of themselves together in primitive times and the apostle censures them. Indeed it always has been the case that devoted Christians have been delighted with public worship. David has correctly described their feelings in giving his own. How amiable are the tabernacles O Lord of Hosts! My soul longeth yea even fainteth for the courts of the Lord: my heart and my flesh cry out for the living God. Blessed are they that dwell in thy house they will be still praising thee. They go from strength to strength. Every one of them in Zion appeareth before God. For a day in the courts is better than a thousand. I rather be a door keeper in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness. One thing have I desired of the Lord that will I seek after that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life and behold the beauty of the Lord and enquire in his tabernacle.

But the apostatizing (backsliding) Christian responds only a feeble amen to these sentiments. Though he does not wholly neglect public worship yet a slight excuse will detain him from the house of God – a less excuse than would keep him from attending to worldly concerns. He does not find anything of that amiableness in the tabernacle of the Lord which David found. So little interested is he in that place that he can quietly sleep there under the most alarming discourse (and profess that because the preaching is dull) when were he attending to his worldly concerns his eyes would be kept wide open. He is led sometimes to believe that it is as well for him just to read his bills at home as to hear it said in the pulpit not remembering that it is by the foolishness of preaching that God saves men. And his deficiency is peculiarly manifest in those social prayer and conference meetings which are appointed during the week. The merest worldly trifle will keep him from these: although perhaps he can recollect that when he lived near to God he found great pleasure in thus meeting his brethren and at the social prayer meeting. The backslider indeed always has excuses enough at hand for neglecting such religious meetings during the week. But the truth is these are not the real hindrance. The difficulty lies in the fact that he does relish those meetings - he does not love the subject which is there introduced – viz. religion. There is no man who cannot ordinarily if he desire it spare two hours every week from his worldly affairs to unite with his brethren in worshipping God. But religion if it exist in his heart is in decaying state and he loves the world much better than God. And he is generally prevented from attendance upon (religious meetings because) public worship on the Sabbath except that he has little or no relish for the exercise of those meetings. Yet this disposition my brethren and to neglect the ordinances of God's appointment is an alarming proof of an great deficiency in the state of the Christian. We may be almost certain that the man who does not love the sanctuary of God does not love his closet - and we need not be surprised if such an one finally apostatizes.

[Asterisk seems to refer to insert]

*Another evidence some Christians give that they are in a backslidden (alienated) state is that they confess themselves to be in such a state and profess to condemn themselves and yet do not reform. When they have acknowledge their lukewarmness they feel as if that were all they have to do. They seem to regard confession of sin as equivalent to repentance. And they live on month after month and year after year always ready to acknowledge themselves to be following Christ afar off and yet never making any effectual efforts to quicken their pace (that they may approach nearer to him). This is one of the most effectual ways that can be taken to ward off the reproofs of the brethren and the reproof of the conscience. And we might add it is an effectual way to provoke God to give us up to declension.

But on the other hand some of Christians or professing Christians furnish evidence of the low state of religion in their hearts by an opposite course - by feeling irritated when a brother of the church enquires into the state of their heart and drops a word of reproof or exhortation. I have often thought it one of the most conclusive proofs of guilt we can have if we find unusual irritation or resentment rising within us one when faithfully searched and reproofed. It is an old and striking yet homely proverb that the bird which is hit always flutters. And when we find irascible or resentful feelings excited within us by faithful preaching or conversation we may with almost equal certainty conclude that we are guilty of the very fault that is charged upon us notwithstanding we feel the charge to be so unjust. The fact is it is a difficult matter to offend the Christian who lives near to God by telling him his faults. And even if we charge him with some.....things of which he is not guilty so deep is his sense of the deceitfulness (and depravity) of his heart that he will be almost disposed to acknowledge himself guilty even contrary to the convictions of his own conscience.

But not so with the apostatized (backsliding) Christian. He feels as if his brethren were interfering with that which does not belong to them when they come to probe his heart and tell him of his departure from God and instead of condemning himself and repenting he condemns them for their faithfulness crying physician heal thyself. And the manifestations of such feeling is a strong presumptive evidence that the man is following Christ like Peter afar off and will soon be tempted to deny him.

[End of insert]

The fifth (sixth) evidence of departure from God is a secret scepticism upon religious subjects.

If this exist in a great degree in the heart that man has taken many a backward step in his Christian course and he is well nigh joining the multitude who are crying out to crucify his Lord. But scepticism in a greater or less degree always results from a neglect of the closet. Faith is the work of God's Spirit and it must be fed from the original fountain or it will weaken sicken and die. No matter how firm is a Christian's convictions of the truth and reality of every doctrine of religion and of religious experience yet if his closet be an unfrequented place he will be beset with doubts on these points. For when he neglects to call on God for light and assistance God neglects to grant them to him. And he will of course be left to lean to his own understanding. And if left to this he will inevitably begin to doubt on the most important subjects. He will be led at first to suspect that most of what is called religious experience is enthusiasm. He will be inclined to suspect that all those Christians who displayed great zeal in the cause of Christ were under the influence of a heated imagination. Enthusiasm indeed will appear to him every day a worse and worse enemy while he never thinks what an enemy to Christ is indifference - although it is most certainly true that overenthusiasm has slain its thousands lukewarmness and scepticism have slain their ten thousands. The professed Christian is led next to doubt the reality of what is called the home a change of heart and he thinks he does not see so much difference between those who are professedly regenerate and those who are not but that the latter have some chance of salvation. Those doctrines also which he once esteemed essential to the Gospel he now begins to look upon with a jealous eye and to doubt whether they are not mere speculation. And indeed he is often left to doubt the very fundamentals of all religion such as the existence and attributes of God - the immortality of the soul, etc. Often the backslider finds as much difficulty and mystery in these as in the peculiar pastimes of the Gospel. He finds an universal scepticism indeed occasionally seizing upon his mind and he looks upon all professed Christians at times as being deluded. This understanding is most evidently darkened being alienated from the life of God because of this blindness of his heart. And it is but too manifest that God has given him up to strong delusions to believe a lie because he has received not the love of the truth that he might be saved.

This scepticism in a greater or less degree usually lies concealed for a time in the bosom of apostatizing Christian. But unless God open his eyes and bring him back to his first love it breaks out at length into broad daylight and the man becomes a second Hymenaeus making shipwrecks of the faith. When arrived at this advanced stage of declension he does not hesitate to deny the Lord that bought him and made a ridicule of those very truths which but a short time previous he held dear as his life and from which he derived all his support and comfort. He now is a Jew or a Mahometan - a Deist an Universalist - as any thing in short according to his circumstances or prejudices. And all this may be traced back to his neglect of his closet.

The last evidence of declining religion in the heart is at first laxity and at length open profligacy in practice.

Here too we may look back to the root of the difficulty viz. a neglect of secret prayer for this leads a man as already shown to omit self-examination and the reading of the scriptures. And whoever does not look frequently at God's law to observe its strictness and extent will have but low conceptions of the evil of sin and he who regards this as a small evil will begin to look upon lesser (especially small) offenses as matters of indifference in the sight of God. The backsliding Christian finds himself in the first instance justifying those amusements of the world which are frequently styled harmless and even necessary to our comfort but which the Christian has often found to bite like a serpent and sting like an adder. He is disposed to join in these and to find fault with those rigid professors who speak against them. In cases of discipline in the church he will always take part with the offender and endeavor to palliate his offense. He has great fears lest we should make religion a gloomy and forbidding a thing by requiring too great exactness in duty and abstinence from all innocent amusement. He has enlarged views of God's mercy and cannot believe he will punish a man for those little things which do no injury to society. And perhaps he carries his views so far that sometimes he does not believe God will punish any of the human race with everlasting destruction.

These loose notions about religious duty yearly gain upon the apostatizing (backsliding) Christian. Yet he still professes to be a friend of morality and as far as in him lies to live agreeable to the precepts of the Gospel. But it is evident to intimate friends that a dreadful shock has been given to the sense of moral obligation in his bosom and that corrupt habits are fast erupting upon him. During this period were the man to look back and compare his present loose notions and practices with his strictness and purity formerly when he lived near to God it would startle him: but such retrospects and comparisons are no longer practiced by him and he goes on waning more and more until at length unless God interpose open immorality and irreligion close the mournful history. His loose habits and loose opinions triumph over all restraints and the man can no longer conceal his rottenness from the world - but turns out at last to be a blasphemous or an adulterer or an extortioner or a drunkard or a thief or a liar or some other character which God has sworn by himself shall never enter the kingdom of heaven. If the man be a professor the Church at this stage of his apostasy interposes and in some few cases such persons have been reclaimed - such as David and Peter: but in most instances the church is compelled to eject them from her communion and they go out from among Christians thus showing that they were never of them. God of mercy! Save us of this church from such an awful end as this!

It seems unnecessary brethren to make a formal application of this discourse. You could not help applying it yourselves - and your conscience have borne testimony as I have proceeded either in favour of or against you (us). They have told us whether we are in the habit of neglecting secret prayer ejaculatory prayer - reading the scriptures and self-examination. Whether we have or have not a relish as much as formerly for practical religious conversation - whether we feel as much anxiety as formerly for the impenitent whether we neglect more than in months or years past religious worship ordinary and special. Whether we indulge a secret unbelief of those sentiments which we have formerly declared before God and man that we believe to be the fundamentals of religion. And whether we are more loose in our practice than formerly. Conscience I say has given some answer to every one of these particulars. And moved only prayer that we may all of us be enabled to act as conscience has dictated. Does acquit us? Then I say the subject exhibits to us the means of preserving the lamp of religion burning bright in the heart. We have shown you the beginning - the fatal root of all apostasies in religion. They always commence in the closet. Point me to the man who neglects reading his bible and self-examination and I will point you to the man who does not frequent his closet. Point me to him who spends whole days without so much as making the ejaculatory petition God be merciful to me a sinner and you point to the man who does not love secret prayer. Show me a Christian who has little anxiety for the impenitent and who forsakes all the hours of God and the social conference and that is the man who forsakes also his closet. Tell me of the man who has been led to abandon one after another the fundamentals of the Gospel which is one blessed and you may rest assured that he never began to doubt on the subject until he began to forsake his closet. And finally show me the professing Christian whose practice is loose or openly corrupt and I will stake my reputation upon the assertion that he does not love to frequent his closet. The way therefore working naturally to preserve ourselves from apostasy is to persevere and increase in the habit of secret fervent prayer and we may rest assured that God will cause us to start.

But does conscience this morning testify against us and set us down in the list of backslidden Christians who are following Christ afar off? Then the subject shows us what is to be done in order to a restoration to the favour of God. If apostasies commence in the closet then we must begin their reformation in the closet. Let the backsliding (alienated) Christian resume the practice which he has abandoned of faithful secret prayer and he will soon be brought to see from whence he has fallen. Let him do the first works and he will find repentance accompanying it. But if he who am backslidden (apostatizing) and there is little doubt but conscience my brethren tells many of us that we are in this state, if we merely acknowledge that we are so and do not go back to (recurring) the habit of secret prayer depend upon it we shall see recede farther and farther from Christ until we lose sight of him entirely and never see him more till we meet him in judgment.

Sermon 119 [Man's Enmity to God Part 1]

[Sermon No. 119, "Man's Enmity to God," Acts 7:51, Part I, 1824 Aug,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 6]

Acts 7:51

Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost.

[A sermon about grace. Hitchcock talks of the agitation some men feel due to internal conflict about religion; see par. 9.]

So powerful and correct in her decisions and reproof in conscience that men cannot ignorantly violate the plain and established rules of morality without feeling guilty. But so darkened and perverted is the understanding in regard to God that a man may live threescore years and ten in habitual neglect of the first great commandment thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and yet remain wholly ignorant of any such omission. Nay he may all this time not only neglect the love of God but live in active rebellion against heaven while he supposes himself doing nearly as well as he can. While he feels indignant at any palpable violations of the laws of morality honor decency and natural tenderness and sympathy he cannot be made to realize that he is not withstanding an enemy of God and a child of wrath. But it is nevertheless most unquestionably true that such a man's heart may be the field where a battle is fought daily between him and his Maker. But owing to his ignorance of himself and of the law and character of God he would resent such an insinuation and regard it as the ravings of bigotry and fanaticism.

But if such be the deceitfulness of the heart how supremely important that the preacher of the Gospel use every method to strip away the delusive veil that hangs over the heart of the natural man and hold up his uncovered bosom in all its hostility to his Maker! Acting on this principle it is one of the grand objects of the faithful preacher to convince men of their deep-rooted opposition and enmity to God. When this is once effected the sinner cannot rest easy. Till this is effected there is no hope that his slumbers will be broken - no hope that the curse of broken law will be removed from him no hope that he will be made a friend of God. It is however a truth that meets with more repulsion in the heart of the sinner than any other in the whole Gospel. But does this excuse the minister from bringing it forward in any shape in his power and urging it with all his energies? Would he be a faithful surgeon who should neglect to lay open the wound of his patient to the bottom when his life depended upon the operation because the patient shrunk from it and thought it unnecessary?

As already hinted most men are ignorant of the modes in which their enmity to God displays itself - that is those things which to the Christian are conclusive proof that the man is resisting the Holy Ghost are not regarded as such by the impenitent. I mean at this time to present some of these evidences upon the consciences of such. And what I want my hearers is that you should accompany me into your own hearts: for there I intend to go for proof of enmity to God and should you unexpectedly find hatred or indifference to Him to lie at the bottom of your souls do not close your eyes to the evidence of its existence nor be offended if I strip off the veil that now conceals it from you. For the discovery would be the most important that can be made and your worst enemy is the man who would convince you no such enmity exists in your bosom if it really be there. A mistake here is a mistake for eternity.

That kind of opposition to God we are considering at this time manifests itself in other feelings of the natural heart either towards the doctrines or the experimental part of religion. And we shall consider this subject under three these heads -

1. Let us look at the feelings of the heart of man naturally towards the doctrines of the Gospel. Not that all men have these feelings in the degree in which they will here be described for education and early prejudice often very much modified and soften down this enmity: yet in many a heart it is suffered to rise in all its native bitterness.

But will it not be necessary previously to discussing this subject to show precisely what are the doctrines of the Gospel and which of them are necessary to be believed in order to salvation. We think not. For we are going to see the argument in another point. We want you my hearers to acknowledge that the Bible is inspiration: otherwise it will be useless to address you. And now we will suppose that the natural man has been accustomed to sit under the ministry of a man who in his pulpit exercises makes free and frequent use of certain phraseology in the New Testament which is regarded by many as hard to be understood. With him regeneration and saving faith and grace and sanctification and adoption and atonement and justification by free grace without works are familiar terms. And he urges the necessity of being born again and groups all unrenewed men into one multitude who are all and every one of them enemies of God. Showing them that they are under condemnation of eternal death and that God is angry with them every day and except they repent they must be crushed under the almighty and everlasting wrath. He tells them in the strongest language of the bible that a strange punishment is reserved for the wicked that they will be trodden down in the wine press of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God and the undying worm will gnaw them and the unquenchable fire consume. Moreover notwithstanding this their dreadful condition he tells them he has no hope of their feeling their danger or escaping it unless God in sovereign mercy pours out upon them become the converting and correcting influences of his Spirit and besides all this he does not hesitate to declare to them that God has mercy many on whom he will have mercy and whom he will he hardeneth - and that salvation is wholly of grace through faith and that not of themselves it is a gift of God. In short the burden of this man's preaching is that men by nature are totally alienated from God that they are dead in trespasses and sins and enemies to all holiness - under condemnation from which nothing can save them but Christ and that they must be born again of water and the Spirit - and yet if they are saved it will all be owing not to their exertions but to the sovereign grace of God in Christ.

Now the heart of man naturally revolts at almost every one of these truths. He feels a strong disgust rising within him when they are forcibly and plainly presented to him. When charged with being an enemy of God he feels certain that it is not true. He knows that he does not hate God but on the contrary has a reverence and perhaps love for him. He is not so totally bad and abandoned as the charge supposes but he feels that he has many good qualities within him. And as to regeneration by a sovereign influence of the Spirit he believes it to be delusion. Besides all our exertions cannot procure regeneration nor have any influence upon God then such a man will say it is of no consequence whether I do anything since it will be of no manner of service - if God designs and has deemed to save me I shall be saved do what I will and if he has decided to destroy me I shall be damned do what I can. And if our own works of righteousness cannot recommend us in the least to God then it is no matter whether we ever have any righteousness or not. The doctrine of eternal torments too viewed in connection with this system is most offensive to the natural heart. It appears tyrannical and abominable to suppose God will punish so dreadfully those who had such dispositions by nature that they never would love God till his great grace compelled them to it and when the preacher of righteousness presses upon his conscience in the glowing and awful manner of the scriptures this doctrine of everlasting misery this man calls it preaching terror and imagines he is endeavouring to frighten his hearers into religion.

That such are the feelings of multitudes when listening to such a description of preaching cannot be doubted. The fact is plain as the sun at noon day - and probably very many of us can testify to its truth by our own former experiences. But the unrenewed man will reply and say that if he grant such are his feelings on hearing the doctrines of grace as they are called yet how do they prove an enmity of heart to God unless those doctrines be proved to be true which is the very point at issue. We shall not attempt at this time to establish the truth of these doctrines by reasoning or an array of texts of scripture. But there are certain facts almost universally true of the man who finds a disgust towards these doctrines which facts show that the real difficulty lies not in their great absurdity but in opposition of the heart to everything that is holy.

And first if the opposition and disgust of the natural man towards the doctrines of grace lay in their manifest absurdity his feelings would not be so violently agitated as they are. Such a man when hearing these doctrines preached or in conversing upon them feels an irritation and excitement and a disgust towards those who believe them much greater than on any other subject. He feels as if it scarcely requires common sense and any man to see that these doctrines are perfectly absurd and contradictory. And yet instead of pitying those who embrace them as poor weak deluded men he feels toward them a bitterness greater than towards any other description of men and among his friends he indulges in the most severe reproaches. Now did he really in his heart believe these doctrines to be false unscriptural and contradictory he would endeavour in the most tender and compassionate manner to convince those who believe them that they were deluded and he could not have a heart to reproach them. He would point them to the very texts of scripture that proved them erroneous - and he would go into his closet and pray that the veil might be removed from their understandings. But did ever a man who fell opposed to these doctrines take such a course? Never. And why? There is such a thing my hearers as the heart being violently opposed to a particular sentiment while the conscience approves of it: and hence there will arise in the mind a quarrel. Now do not the violent feelings manifested by the natural man against the doctrines of grace lead us to suspect that there may be in his bosom such a contest as this? Conscience may tell him that he does not love or serve God and that his whole heart is given with the title of its affections to the world and that he is altogether destitute of holiness and that he must have a radical change wrought within him by the special agency of the Spirit of God ere he can enter heaven. But his heart may resist such offensive truths and summon the partial decisions of the understanding to its aid. And this may be the source of the great and unusual agitation of feeling the man evinces on the subject. His heart is making a desperate effort to stifle conscience and to bolster itself up into impenitence.

The second thing that shows the opposition of the unrenewed man to the doctrines of grace to be in the heart and not in the conscience is that he does not unless forced to it resort to the scriptures to prove the absurdity and falsity of these doctrines. I have supposed such an one want to believe the bible to be given by inspiration of God and therefore he ought to regard it as an infallible and the ultimate standard by which to try every opinion in religion. But when such an one rejects with disgust the doctrines above alluded to if you ask him why he disbelieves them in nine cases out of ten he will answer because they are unreasonable and absurd. And though he may add as a second reason that they are unscriptural yet he will put their absurdity first and thus show that the main difficulty lies there: whereas the first enquiry ought to be do the scriptures teach these doctrines - if they do he ought to receive them or deny the bible. But the natural man often feels so strong a prejudice on the subject that he will declare that the scriptures themselves cannot prove such absurdities. But if they are found in the bible it will not prove them to be true but will prove the bible to be false. Instead such a man does not go to the scriptures with close searching anxious enquiries to know what they teach on these subjects until those prejudices are rooted and his opinion is fixed against them or until he is driven there by an antagonist. And why does he not resort to this only standard under heaven for religious opinions? Is he willing to risque his salvation upon his own reasonings when there is an infallible criterion at hand? Dare he say that God has not said certain things without searching the scriptures to know what God has said? Why hearers there is such a thing as a man's being so prejudiced against the truth that he dare not examine the evidence in its favour lest he should be convinced of his error and be compelled to recant. And it is greatly to be feared that many a man in another world will find this to have been his case in regard to religion. The scriptures tell us of an adder that is deaf not because there is a defect in her hearing but because she stoppeth her ear.

But these remarks will derive additional force when we remark in the third place that the natural man does not read the bible with prayer in forming a system of religious beliefs. Among so many clashing opinions as exist in the world it would seem that when such an one reads in the bible that if any man lack wisdom he may ask it of God who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not – and it shall be given him - it would seem he would like to lay hold of this promise with avidity and giving up all other confidences go daily and besiege the mercy seat with importunate prayer that he might be guided into all truth – that his prejudices might be expelled his heart subdued and that he might not be left to believe a lie. What can be plainer than this promise of Divine direction to those who seek it - and what can be more agreeable to the honest sincere man than to go to God in prayer that his understanding may be open to behold wondrous things out of his law! When a man meets in scripture with the declaration, except a man be born of water, etc., if he were honest if he earnestly desired to know the truth instead of saying this text was hard to be understood he would daily pray over it - when he reads that God hath mercy on whom he will have mercy and whom etc., instead of saying the doctrine of sovereignty and election is contrary to common sense and it makes God an arbitrary omnipotent demon he would daily go with such texts to his closet and earnestly pray that the true meaning might be made manifest to his to his mind and that he might be made to believe it and submit to it.

Now if a man does not take this method of earnest prayer over the bible in forming his opinions on the most important of all subjects does it not show that his heart is radically wrong? Does it not leave room for a suspicion that his opposition to certain doctrines proceeds from an opposing and an unsanctified heart? And yet the unrenewed man does not take this prayerful method in establishing his religious opinions. If you should even say that he had formed his system of belief from the scriptures he will not dare to say if the question is solemnly put to him that he goes daily into his closet and there on his knees beseeches God to give him a right understanding of all the bible. Conscience testifies and the records of heaven testify that no such prayers are ever just put up by him unless he is brought under convictions. Prayer is a word - prayer is a which the impenitent man does not love. Here then is a touchstone by which we may determine whether we have taken such a course in forming our religious sentiments as will abide the trial of the judgment day. If we were in the habit when forming our creed...sentiments would take would be to pray over every chapter of the bible and to pray too with an earnest desire to be directed by the Spirit of God. To take an opposite course evinces a strong prejudice against the doctrines of grace and shows that the man does not feel his own weakness and ignorance and need of divine assistance.

But some one will say perhaps these are unfounded charges upon the natural man. Perhaps he has none of this violence and irritation of feeling. Perhaps he did always go to the bible to prove the doctrines of grace erroneous and perhaps he has daily for years prayed fervently and earnestly over the scriptures. If all this be true of any man surely he is not the person to whom this discourse will apply. But my hearers let us search ourselves and enquire whether we have taken a consistent scriptural course in forming our sentiments. There is one question we can easily decide - did we in forming our religious sentiments - do we now read the bible diligently with earnest prayer? If we have not done this conscience testifies that we have not done it. And do we feel easy to risque our salvation on a creed formed without prayer? Do we presume to say that such and such sentiments of our neighbours are absurd and contradictory because they are opposite to our own when we have never looked to God for divine direction? O if we have built on such a sandy foundation hearers whether it be you or whether it be me depend upon it that when the rains descend and the floods come and our [????] will fall and bury us in its ruins.

[The last two pages seem to repeat much of what was said previously.]

...of daily praying with a sincere heart and an ardent desire to be directed by God - if we were led to give up our prejudices if we continued this habit of prayer year after year - nay if we continued it still then have we reason to hope that we have been kept from fatal errors. But the man who has formed his opinions without a habit of prayer - without feeling his need of prayer has no reason to presume that he is correct and scriptural. Most surely then the opposition of such a man to any of the doctrines a prayerful man thinks he finds in the bible afford not the least proof that those doctrines are untrue because by neglecting prayer such a person is totally unfit to judge of those doctrines. The weakest man with prayer is more likely to understand these fundamentals of the Gospel than a Newton without it.

These are some of the accidental circumstances that show the objections that natural man makes to the doctrines of grace to result not from his head so much as from his heart and they show him to be always resistant the Holy Ghost. The argument we have been laying down is simply this. A man feels within him a strong opposition to a certain truths which a great majority of the Christian world have supposed to be found in the bible. Now the enquiry is not whether the doctrines be true or false: but is there nothing in the conduct or feelings of the man that show the real difficulty to lie in his heart and not in the monstrous absurdity and bad tendency of these doctrines? Is there not a manifest inconsistency in his conduct on the supposition that he is really sincere and honest in his religious enquiries? In the first place there is a violence in his opposition and in irritation is feeling towards those who differ from him which we never see in the man who has calmly and sincerely and prayerfully sought for the truth and possesses a solid and rational confidence that he is scriptural and correct. Such an one is always calm and steady and feels a regret and pity towards those differing from him instead of disgust and hatred. In the second place such a man does not unless forced resort to the scriptures to prove the falsity of these doctrines - or rather he shows more confidence in his reasons on the subject than the express declarations of the bible thus showing most plainly that he did not in the first place learn from the scriptures that those doctrines were false - and therefore we have reason to believe that the real difficulty lies in his heart. In the third place the same thing is evident from the fact that this man in forming his religious system of beliefs did not read the bible with prayer. Now it is very evident the course an unprejudiced honest mind that felt the importance of being correct in his...

Sermon 120 [Man's Enmity to God Part 2]

[Sermon No. 120, "Man's Enmity to God," Acts 7:51, Part II, 1824 Aug,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 6]

Acts 7:51

Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost.

[In the last few paragraphs Hitchcock discusses his personal battle with scepticism or ungodliness.]

There is no man who has not a natural inclination to adopt some system of religion. There is no one who does not at times feel the need of it: and were men permitted to be religious in their own way could they bend the will of God at their pleasure no sacrifices of their worldly concerns would be thought too great for them to secure future happiness. But when they find only one strait and narrow path into Paradise - only one name under heaven whereby they can be saved - only one Lord one faith one baptism - when they find that their pride must be mortified and subdued that their wills must be humbled that they must receive salvation as a merited gift - when they find that they must give their whole hearts to God and be crucified to the world and whether they eat or drink or whatever they do must do all to the glory of God - this is a system too mortifying for human nature to adopt. Human nature therefore will endeavour to rob this system of its peculiarities and to shorten the standard God has established till it is brought down to the measure of a man. Thus when the Gospel can be embraced without sacrificing the world or wounding the pride - when a man can hold religion in his left hand and the world in his right - you will find men pressing into the kingdom of heaven. But alas for deluded mortals, God never made his work for man to mend. If we will not humble ourselves to accept of salvation under God's terms even by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ and the renewing of the Holy Ghost law of God stands out against us in all its strict and unbending rigor and there is no arm that can avert its thunders. But while in a natural state we do feel an unconquerable aversion to this method of salvation. And when the Spirit of God urges it upon our acceptance we do if possible always resist the Holy Ghost. Like Naaman if we can be made clean by washing in Abana or Pharpar we do not object but rather than wash in the contemptible Jordan in that fountain set open to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and uncleanness we prefer retaining the foul leprosy that is upon us. In very few cases however while unrenewed are we sensible of such a repugnance to the Gospel message of salvation. We believe there are real difficulties and innumerable absurdities in the system of revealed truth our fathers have delivered down to us and we are astonished at their credulity and ignorance not once suspecting that the grand difficulty lies in our stubborn and unrenewed hearts. To trace this opposition to its true source was the effect of the morning discourse. But this native repugnance of ours is not confined to the doctrines of the Gospel - it exists also with greater bitterness in respect to experimental piety. And of this also we are in general very ignorant while unrenewed. We have no idea that we are in the least hostile to pure vital religion. We think our sole objections lie against certain disgusting doctrines which we do not believe are taught in Scripture. It is important therefore if we really are daily resisting the Holy Ghost by our opposition to vital godliness and yet are ignorant of it it is important we should know it: for inasmuch as we exhibit opposition to holiness in man we do it towards God and if it can be proved that we do not love piety in a fellow man it will follow that we are enemies to the character of God. Let us take then my hearers the torch of self-examination and dive once more into the dark corners of our hearts and see if we cannot there discover an unthought of disrelish and opposition to practical religion.

And first our natural opposition to experimental or practical religion is manifest from our feelings when we hear practical piety faithfully and plainly preached in the pulpit.

If the minister of Christ urge with force and emphasis the repulsive doctrines of the Gospel we enquire or we feel willing to enquire why do he does not bring forward practical subjects and let the speculative mysteries alone? For since great and good men differ about them they can be of little consequence. Very soon perhaps the preacher adopts the very course we profess to wish him to adopt viz. to bring forward practical subjects. He urges us to immediate reformation and warms us to prepare for the judgment. He calls upon us to break off from all our sins - urges us to abandon the effort to love God and Mammon - exhorts parents to pray in their families and instruct their households in religion - presses upon all of us the imperious duties of self-examination and secret prayer by telling us that if we neglect these duties we shall most assuredly lose our souls and in short he exhorts us to devote all our faculties of body and soul to the service of God. This is real practical preaching and we dare not say that any of these things are not our duty. But at the same time we know that in almost every one of them we are utterly deficient. We know that we do not give up the world for Christ nor pray in our closets. And how then is it possible for us to avoid applying such a sermon to ourselves? It excites within us a disgust and perhaps resentment against the man who has been so plain and faithful in exhibiting our duty and this tends to silence the voice of conscience - or we get the idea that his sermon was personal because it applies so closely to our case although the preacher disclaims all personalities or we try to persuade ourselves that his requirements are unnecessarily rigid - or we refer to some professed Christian who neglects these duties and feel wonderfully propped up by his example - or we enter into conversation with some unregenerate acquaintance and either ridicule some part of the performance or endeavour to find defects in them - or we suffer worldly subject to intrude upon our minds - in short we take any course in which we can shield ourselves from those arrows which this practical sermon is fixing in our consciences. We resist the influences of the Spirit and shield ourselves as soon as possible in the impenetrable armour of the world. But were we honestly desirous to perform God's will and were warped by no prejudices the effect of such a sermon would be to lead us immediately to the performance of these requirements. Yet we neglect them: and does not this fact show that we have within us an aversion to practical religion?

We may reply to all this by saying that there are some subjects we love to hear discussed in the pulpit. Let the preacher expatiate upon the moral and social duties - let him muster all his eloquence and pour forth his warmest zeal against stealing and lying and fraud and slander and intemperance or let him urgently and warmly press the moral duties upon us urging to honesty and integrity and truth and charity and benevolence - or let him exhibit in glowing colours the natural attributes of God and his benevolence - or describe the sufferings of Christ and the fullness of his redemption or let him hold up the joys of heaven to allure our feet into the paths of virtue and religion - in all these subjects our feelings go along with the speaker and we feel a warm approbation of what he has said and an earnest desire that it may take effect and we often find the involuntary tear stealing down our cheeks under his ministrations. And now if we by nature be opposed to vital godliness why should we take any interest in religious subjects?

The answer to all this is very easy. The reason we are pleased with such subjects is that they gratify our natural tastes but do not touch the conscience. We do not feel after hearing them as if something must be done by us. Nothing is here said about repentance regeneration or the influence of the Spirit or our own sinfulness. We live our lives perhaps and therefore it gratifies us to be praised for it and we are furthermore flattered with the idea that those virtues are purchasing heaven for us. But when the faithful preacher marks to the natural man the wide gulf there is between him and God when he opens his own heart and holds it before his eyes forcing him to look into it - when he calls upon him as Christ did upon the young ruler to make some painful sacrifice when he comes to cut away his self-righteousness and urge him to trust in Christ - when he tells him how absolutely necessary it is that a radical revolution should be brought in him and that he must be in the habit of daily secret prayer - such truth sit by no means easy upon his conscience who flatters himself that he is rich and has need of nothing and knows not that he is poor and blind and miserable and naked. And nothing is so disgusting to the natural heart as practical preaching - that is preaching to the heart and the conscience. Such a man prefers to hear anything rather than a history of his own heart and hence it is he has such feelings of irritation and disgust under faithful experimental preaching and although he may suppose that he is quarreling with the minister yet he is in truth stirring with his Maker.

In the second place ornate native hostility to vital religion is manifest from our feelings towards devoted Christians. There are some men who live so near to God and manifest such a zeal in his service and seem to be men of such faith and prayer that all others take knowledge of them that they have been with Christ and all allow them to be real children of God. But while in a natural state we do not love the religious character of such a man. We are apt to think him righteous over much - we do not like to have him pray so much and we take pleasure in hearing anything that proves him to be a hypocrite and we do not feel easy in his society. We feel afraid he will address us personally contrary to the state of our souls and we derive much more satisfaction in the society of the man of uprightness in his dealings firmness in his integrity and affability in address who will converse nicely and fluently upon the things of the world but who says nothing about practical religion and does not like to pray. Now how does this fat look when we recollect that love to the brethren today is one of the most distinguishing marks of regeneration.

To be a little more particular - we complain of this devoted servant of God because he is too apt to converse upon religious subjects at all times and makes it too public and common a thing. Whereas we conceive religion to be a matter almost exclusively between the man and his Master and therefore we conclude is not but to say much condemning our own experience since ostentatious religion is most ridiculous. But the difficulty in this case is that while we acknowledge religion to lie between God and our souls we do not make it a matter between him and us. We do not pray to him in our closets nor enter into self-examination there unless it be in seasons of sickness or affliction. We attend to every concern in life more faithfully than to secret devotions. We rarely put any close questions to ourselves concerning our preparation for death. We rarely or never enquire seriously ourselves whether we have been born again which whatever it may mean Christ declares to be essential to salvation. One or two short prayers daily (if indeed we pray at all) constitutes all our intercourse with God and some little conversation with our friends concerning some controverted point in religion constitutes all our religious intercourse with them. We do not converse with them upon vital practical godliness. We say nothing to them about a religious experience nor about the duty and pleasure of conversation with God. And the true reason why the natural man complains of the devoted Christian is because his conduct and conversation reprove him. And he is most of all fearful that such an one will be conversing upon the religion of the heart concerning which he is ignorant.

Another complaint we bring while in an unrenewed state against the devoted Christian is that he encourages by his commendation and attendance too many social religious meetings for prayer praise and mutual impression at other times than on the Sabbath. Such meetings we conceive appear ostentatious and if we wish to pray for the conversion of sinners and the enlargement of the Redeemer's kingdom we can do it in our closets and if we wish to improve in religion we can read the bible at home. Whether such social religious meetings are agreeable to the will of God is not my business at this time to examine. But one or two facts will show that our professed objections to them while in the state of nature are not real ones. We say it is better to go into our closets and spend a portion of our time in prayer for sinners and then in reading the Scriptures. But the truth is we take no such course - nor do we scarcely pray at all for them. Were we to set apart one or two evenings each week to be spent in this manner we might consistently object to such social meetings. But so long as we do nothing of the kind our words contradict our actions and show that our objections lie in the want of a relish for such meetings. At the same time that we thus object we are willing to spend many evenings in receiving or paying ordinary visits. And why? Because we have a relish for them - we love them. If we had no relish for the worldly subjects then discussed we should object against them. And here we see the true source of the difficulty in regard to religious meetings - we do not love the subjects there introduced viz. practical religion.

We object however still further that such meetings tend to produce enthusiasm and of all enemies to religion this is the most deadly. Without stopping to enquire whether this objection be well-founded or not it will just show where the real difficulty lies in the natural man's heart to remark that while he faces enthusiasm so much he never expresses any fears about coldness or indifference in religion. While he clothes the former in all its terrific dress and puts into its right hand a bloody sword and into its left a fiery faggot and lets it loose in imagination among God's heritage to trample it underfoot and burn his sanctuary during all this time the fears of danger from coldness and indifference in religion does not enter his heart.

But how contrary is this state of feeling to that expressed in scripture which is full of exhortations to grow in grace - to be always zealously affected in a good thing to watch and pray and which declares lukewarmness in religion to be more offensive to God than open opposition. And how few denunciations does it contain against excessive zeal. There is indeed such a thing as enthusiasms. But these facts show that the sacred writers knew men to be in greater danger of becoming stupid in religion than overzealous. And when we find a feeling within us directly the reverse of this - that is when we are more fearful of enthusiasm than of lukewarmness ought it not to incite a suspicion that our hearts are very different from the hearts of those who wrote the bible?

In the last place our natural hostility to vital practical religion is manifest from our feelings in regard to the conversion of sinners.

When we meet with one of this world's most amiable characters and observe his lofty accomplishments of mind and his fine feelings of honor and integrity we do not feel and lament that he yet lacketh one thing. Although if he has not been born again he is every moment exposed to sink into everlasting burnings yet this idea does not occur to us. But it does occur and lies with weight upon the Christian mind and he meets such a man who is anxious above all other things to learn whether he be a friend of God. It struck the mind of Christ deeply when the young ruler came to him. And when the Christian learns that such a person has been brought to repentance it affords him the highest gratification. He feels as if his soul was renewed from the dominion of Satan and made an heir of honor glory and immortality. The angels of God also have joy over one sinner that repenteth. But not so the natural man. He takes no pleasure in learning that there is a radical change in this or that impenitent man. Nay it produces a depression and uncanniness in his mind: and he tries to persuade himself that it is a delusion and not religion. And if a companion be the subject of the work he feels no interest in communing with him on the subject but finds him now to an pleasant companion and he feels a restraint upon him when in his presence. He has no desires that a concern for the soul should become general around him. He does not sincerely pray for a revival of religion and a time of general stupidity is more pleasant to him than a season of general attention to the concerns of the soul – although at the same time he will profess to be very desirous that pure religion should flourish everywhere.

Have I endeavoured to show that the natural man has a hostility to practical religion because his professions are totally at variance with his conduct. He professes to be fond of practical preaching and yet real close searching practical sermons are of all others most offensive to him. He professes that it is much better to say but little upon our own religious experience before the world and to be more diligent in secret duties towards God and yet he almost entirely neglects secret prayers and self-examination attending to them only just as to lull his conscience asleep. He declares it better to spend much time in the closet in praying for sinners and the conversion of the world than in social meetings and yet spends there no time at all for this purpose. He professes to desire the spread of religion and yet is pained and disgusted when he hears of the conversion of sinners around him. Now if such things the list of which might be swelled much more do not prove a disrelish for religion in the natural man I know not what can prove it.

But it may be asked where are such feelings to be found? I hope my hearers that none of them are to be found in this house. I do not know that they exist in a single heart in this house. But where is the proof that they exist in any heart? It is to be found in my own experience. Those feelings which I exhibited in the forenoon concerning the doctrines of religion and those brought forward at this time in relation to its practice are but an exhibition of my own former experiences. But what right have I to presume that any other person's experience is like my own. Merely on the principal my hearers so that as in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man. Education and different restraints do no doubt much modify the feelings of men yet the groundwork in every heart is the same and therefore I did not hesitate from my own experience to describe the feelings and conduct I have exhibited to day as the feelings and conduct of the natural man in general terms. For whatever be my present condition whether it be any better or not when such feelings possessed me I know that I was in the gall of bitterness and bonds of iniquity destitute of all holiness with a proud unsubdued heart which was swelling and rising against Jehovah. If that same unbelief and opposition exist within me O may God pour out on me an irresistible influence of his Holy Spirit to subdue it. I have no hope from any other quarter. To lean upon upon my own strength is to lean upon a broken staff. And if the like feelings exist in any of your hearts my hearers I have no hope that they will be subdued unless that Spirit accompany my words. If that Spirit be not poured out upon you my hearers I do finally believe those feelings will become stronger and stronger – that delusion deeper and deeper and that opposition will rise higher and higher so long as we live.

*But power divine can do the deed,
And much to feel that power I need
Thy Spirit can from dross refine,
And move and melt this heart of mine.

Sermon 123 Evidences of Christian Character

[Sermon No. 123, "Evidences of Christian Character," I Peter 3:15, 1822 Jul,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 6]

I Peter 3:15

Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and fear.

[Very long dramatic ending.]

If we were brought before an earthy tribunal to be tried for our lives – if the judges and the jury had assembled for our examination how solicitous should we be that no witness be permitted to give testimony whose character was not unimpeachable! We should by every method in our power endeavor to ascertain whether they were to be relied on in their evidence and if the least doubt could be raised of their integrity we should try to prevent their giving in evidence.

But when the question my hearers to be decided is concerning our regeneration on which the everlasting happiness or misery of our souls depends how much less anxious are men in seeing to it that no false witness testify in the case and be the means of leading them to eternal destruction! Whatever be the cause certainly we do not manifest nor feel as much anxiety on the point as we should in a trial for life before a court of justice. If some suspicious evidences appear in our favour we easily admit them and settle down into a serene opinion that we are assuredly candidates for heaven. Whereas were we to search up and examine all the evidence that might be found on both sides it might put a very different aspect upon the case and we might be left to see that we were yet in the gall of bitterness and the bonds of iniquity.

It is a principle in jurisprudence that it is better ten guilty persons should escape punishment and that one innocent man suffer. The laws of the land accordingly require the most decided evidence for the conviction of a criminal especially if the penalty of his alleged crime be death. So it is a principle in the science of religion that it is better ten real Christians should conclude themselves destitute of piety and possess no hope than that one irreligious man should be led to take up with the hope of the hypocrite which perishes when God takes away the soul. That is to say it is better to place the standard of Christian experience so high by admitting no evidence of piety that is in the least degree uncertain that many real children of God shall be left without hope than to make the evidences of piety so lax and broad that many an unregenerate man shall appropriate them to himself and thus be left to go on blindfold to ruin. For how immensely preferable is it my hearers that a man should go despairing to heaven than that we should go hoping to hell! On this principle I proceeded in the morning (if I may be permitted to borrow a phrase from our courts of civil law) to challenge many of the equivocal evidences on which many any men are prone to rely in proof of their conversion and by which probably many have been finally deluded. Perhaps this view of the subject which I firmly believe to be scriptural shook the hopes of some of us and perhaps some in despair were led to say to themselves if these are not evidences of regeneration what evidence can be found? To answer this enquiry is the object of this discourse. For notwithstanding the deceitfulness of the heart - notwithstanding the counterfeits that exist of almost every Christian grace we do believe there are certain marks and that these are given in scripture whereby the real Christians can be distinguished from all hypocrites. And although there is perhaps as already remarked no single grace that may not be counterfeited and therefore it is not safe to rely upon an individual evidence of piety yet when we collect all the genuine evidences of conversion together they form such an harmonious union and present such an impenetrable front that Satan cannot imitate them. On these substantial these equivocal evidences - which cannot be on the one hand the result of mere enthusiasm nor on the other hand near cold hearted philosophy - on this we wish to turn your eyes my hearers. And may God grant that nothing may be advanced as evidential of piety which is not directly or indirectly advanced in the scriptures. And may we all of us who profess a hope in Christ be enabled to follow the discretion of the text and to give to every man that asketh us a reason of the hope that is in us with meekness and fear. With meekness lest our practice give to the lie to our professions with fear lest after all we may think of ourselves alone what we ought to think and finally be cast away.

But there is one remark that strikes us on reading the text which I would stop one moment to repeat. It is this. It seems from the exhortation in the passage that it was the habit among primitive Christians to address one another concerning the ground of their hopes - to enquire of one another whether they had any evidence of this piety and to search one another's hearts with that faithfulness brethrenly love demand and the importance of the subject renders proper. How much is this duty neglected among Christians at the present day! We enquire of one another concerning the health of our bodies and the state of our temporal affairs: but how seldom do we ask one another to give a reason of the hope within us! Nay by many professing the Christian name such enquiries are considered as impertinent and improper and as the works of fanaticism and by many the enquiry what reason have you to think you are going to heaven? would be regarded as an insult. How very different is this feeling from that which prevailed in the days of the apostles - and is it not to be feared that the true cause why a man is unwilling to give a reason of the hope that is in him is because he has no reason?

And here I can hardly refrain from remarking that impenitent men might see in the fact just alluded to how directly opposed to the practice of the apostles is this practice. For less under the special awakening of God's Spirit they never enquire of one another on what ground they are resting and the reason of their resting on it. They converse together on every worldly subject with deep interest but never enquire of one another whether they are reconciled to God and prepared for heaven. How strikingly does this fact show that they are not prepared for heaven and that they do not take as much interest in the salvation of their souls as in the affairs of time and sense.

But to return from this aggression. What are the reasons a real child of God has for his hope? The final grand and comprehensive reason is he finds within him a prevailing relish for all spiritual objects.

An important distinction ought here to be mentioned. Suppose I had been relieved from deep distress and misery by one of my fellow men: and Suppose I continue to receive benefits from him for a long time. I can hardly fail of cherishing a love for the character of my benefactor. Now why is it that I love him? Plainly because I have been benefited by him. But it may be the general tenor of that man's feelings and sentiments is directly opposite to mine. It is mere gratitude then that attaches me to him and not because I delight in his general character. Just so the man who supposes God has bestowed on him regenerating grace and saved him from the miseries of hell may feel toward him a very great degree of gratitude: but at the same time it may be nothing more than gratitude for the holiness of God's character and his hatred of sin and his treatment of sinners may notwithstanding be totally opposite to the man's feelings. So that he loves God with a lot of gratitude but not for what he is in himself. And the same remark may apply to our supposed love for any other spiritual object. Now we are required to love and the man born of God does love spiritual objects for what they are themselves without taking into account the benefits he receives from them. He loves them because there is a congruency or resemblance between the image of God in his soul and spiritual holy objects.

Let us now enumerate the chief of those spiritual things the regenerated heart loves.

1. He relishes the character of God. He is the service and centre the sum and substance of every thing spiritual and pure and the pious soul feels its affections drawn out in ardent attachment to a character to which nothing can be added to render it more perfect or lovely. Especially does the new heart love and relish the holiness of God by which I mean his moral perfection especially as it is manifested in his total opposition to sin and his just punishment of it. The holiness of God is an attribute or rather the perfection of all his attributes in which the Christian delights to contemplate. With the Psalmist he is disposed to give thanks at the remembrance of this holiness. He gives thanks for this because it is the grand bulwark that guards the universe from the desolations of sin and this is his security for perfect happiness in heaven.

2. The Christian relishes the character of Christ. The unregenerate man does not relish it. He has no attachment to it. Nay he is disgusted with it when held up to him and he is urged to love it. But the new heart is attached to the Saviour not only through gratitude but on account of the perfection and glory of his character. It views him as over all God blessed forever becoming incarnate and dying for the sins of man - and a display of benevolence and condescension so exalted so much beyond any thing man or angels had ever witnessed cannot fail of drawing the affections of any being that has a spark of holiness within him.

3. The Christian relishes the Holy Spirit. And this not merely because he knows that he is dependent upon the Spirit for his sanctification because there is a glory and a harmony in his attributes that awakens the reverence and the love of any being in whom there is the least holy taste. And when the regenerated heart contemplates the Father the Son and the Spirit as united in one perfect Being and yet essentially distinct in character and office his reverence admiration and love is increased and his heart responds to the sentiment of inspiration - canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is high as heaven: what canst thou do? deeper than hell what canst thou know?

4. The Christian relishes his brethren - those I mean who bear the image of Christ. And this is the ground of his love not because they belong to the same party and give him support and assistance in an ungodly world. Here the love of the regenerate heart for his brethren will be in proportion to the endemic they five of holiness in their hearts. Those who appear most truly devoted to religion exemplifying it most in their conversation and conduct will have this firmest hold on his affections. Those who follow Christ at a distance will secure but a small share of his attachment.

Brotherly love is in scripture just down as a most decided mark of regeneration. Hereby do we know that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren. He that saith I love God and hateth his brother is a liar and the truth is not in him. How certain is it then that we are enemies to religion if we do not relish the prayers the conversation and the character of devoted Christians. And how infallible a glass does this present to unregenerate men for discovering their true characters if they would not close their eyes to the light. For they know that the prayers the conversation and the religious character of the most eminent Christians do fill them with disgust and aversion.

5. The Christian relishes the Bible. This contains a development of the characters of God of Christ and of the Spirit and it exhibits also most conspicuously the holiness of God in the strictness and extent of his law in the immense sacrifice demanded to magnify the law and make it honorable and make God just while he justifies the believer in Jesus - and in the awful and interminable torrents that await the finally impenitent. Now what can be more interesting to a love of God and of holiness than such a development as this! If you loved an earthly friend on account of his excellent character you could not be better pleased than to receive an epistle from him elucidating all his interesting traits - detailing his deeds of benevolence and unfolding his plans of benevolence. Now the bible is that epistle the Christian has received from his heavenly friend in the like development of character and plans. How can he then repair from saying, O how I love thy holy law! It is my meditation all the day! Mine eyes prevent the night watches that I might meditate in thy word!

To express the Christian attachment to spiritual objects I have chosen to use the term relish instead of love merely from a hope of making its meaning more distinctly felt. It is easy for us my hearers to know whether we have a relish for a taste for earthly objects. When food is presented to you you do not hesitate a moment to decide whether it is agreeable or disagreeable to your taste. When you are engaged in any kind of employment you immediately perceive whether you have any relish for it. And you find no difficulty in determining whether you like or dislike a person's society with whom you associate. And now only apply this same style to religion and ask yourselves seriously whether you relish the character and government of God in Christ and the Holy Spirit - whether you are pleased or displease with devoted Christians life character and conversation and whether you have any taste for the doctrines you read in the bible? And can there be much difficulty in determining these questions? Yet when these are determined you have decided whether you are a child of God or not.

But let us look at some of the effects of this love or relish for spiritual objects. For these also are among the unequivocal evidences of regeneration.

1. One effect of a love to spiritual objects is to produce a love to the ordinances of the Gospel. In those ordinances the things to which the Christian is fondly attached are exhibited in a striking and alluring manner. It would therefore be a strange supposition that a child of God should not love to observe the Sabbath nor attend public worship nor join in the social conference - nor come to the Lord's table. Such an one would be a very different man from those believers of whom we have a history in the Old and N. Testaments.

2. Another important effect of a spiritual relish is a habit of public social family and secret prayer. If a man neglects these habitually and out of choice it is conclusive evidence that he is not a lover of God. On the other hand although irreligious men may be willing to gain sometimes in public and family prayer yet long continued regular voluntary fervent secret prayer is one of the best evidences a man can give of a change of heart. An unregenerate man may for a time continue in this practice but with Job we may ask, will he always call upon God? Will he delight himself in the Almighty? Very many in seasons of special attention to religion commence secret prayer who abandon it as soon as their fears of hell are departed and thus they evince that they are still in the gall of bitterness and the bonds of iniquity.

3. A third effect of spiritual love or relish is a spirit of humility and gentleness and forgiveness of injuries.

By nature we are excessively proud and this pride is the great bar that lies in the way of our becoming religious. And although this terrible enemy is never destroyed in this life yet he is cast off from his throne in the heart and humility takes his place. A Christian is humbled by the habitual sense he has of the exceeding wickedness of his heart - of the hatred God bears to sin and of the poor improvement he makes of the dispensations of Providence. He is apt to view himself as did Paul as the chief of sinners and the least of all Christians. And now can we not tell my hearers whether we do feel really deeply feel thus humble before God and man? Do we love to mortify our pride and endeavor to mortify it? If we do not we have neither part nor lot in the matter.

With such views of himself the Christian must feel a prevailing gentleness towards all men. And he will be ready to esteem others better than himself and feel under obligation to lend them all the assistance in his power.

He will also forgive his enemies - he will pray for his enemies - he will not indulge hatred toward his bitterest foe - but like Christ weeping over devoted Jerusalem so will he feel disposed to weep over the ungodliness of those who hate him.

A fourth effect of spiritual love is to prompt a man to a steady course of active exertion in the cause of Christ. He will feel that he is not his own but has been bought with a price and that all his talents and property are lent to him to be returned to God whenever his Providence shall demand. He will not therefore merely talk about doing something for Christ - he will actually do so. He will give of his property - he will give his influence - he will give all he can give to promote religion in the world. He will not merely acclaim those spiritual wants of his fellow men that happen to fall in his way but he will go and search for objects of benevolence - and thus manifest by his works that he is a child of God who sent his Son to seek and to save that which was lost.

A fifth effect of spiritual love is a warfare in the heart between the flesh and the Spirit. The flesh, says Paul, lusteth against the Spirit and the Spirit against the flesh and these are contrary the one to the other. Do we then find within us such a contest as is here described? Do we find it daily there and to continue month after month and year after year? Do we find a new principle one that did not always exist within us quarreling with our corrupt native dispositions. The former prompting us to pray and repent and be active in the service of Christ humble and gentle and forgiving toward others while the latter hangs like a dead weight upon our affections and our exertions so that we cannot do the things that we would? Whoever is not sensible of such a contest within him has no evidence of his Christian character.

A last effect of spiritual love I shall mention that it produces an increase in the heart and life of all the graces and exercises that have been pointed out. The Christian who is really born of God finds every returning year his relish for spiritual objects to have taken a firmer hold of his heart. The name and character of God and of Christ and the Holy Spirit are clearer to him than before and so is the character of his brethren who have drunk into the same Spirit and his relish and reverence for the holy scriptures continues to increase. His love also for the ordinances of religion are upon the increase. Secret prayer and also family social and public prayer become yearly more precious to him and he is more exact in attending to them. His humility and gentleness and feeling of forgiveness and more apparent uniform and operative. His exertions in the cause of Christ are more extensive his characters more liberal and his prayers for Zion's prosperity more fervent. He continues to groan more and more under the warfare between flesh and Spirit within him not because sin becomes stronger but because he becomes more sensible of its deformity and hates it with a more perfect hatred. He may indeed have reasons long and painful of distressing doubt and darkness - he may lose some of the favours of his first loves: but upon the whole he will find a more calm steady frame of mind. A stronger faith in God and a more active Spirit of exertion in the cause of his Master. And there can be no better evidence of real vital godliness than this perseverance in holiness in this increase of religious feeling and action.

My hearers it has been my object today to assist you in determining whether you are ripening for heaven or hell. And I now close by summing up the false and the true evidences of regeneration. Do we suppose ourselves to be regenerated because at a certain period we had deep and pungent convictions for him – or because we were brought to acknowledge the justice of God in casting us away forever or because our impressions were sometimes so powerful that we were compelled to cry aloud or fall down in a swoon or because after a season a remarkable joy broke in upon our souls and the mercy of God and the character of God appear full of glory and Christ seemed lovely and the bible a new book and Christians new beings and the world a new world. Or do we suppose ourselves born of God because a tenet of scripture came suddenly upon us while we were careless and almost overwhelmed us or because another text brought with a sudden relief and rapturous joy - or because we have been suspiciously exact in performing the external duties of religion and morality or because our souls are full of zeal in the cause of Christ or because we are suffering persecution or because our most judicious Christian friends have no doubt of our piety? Are we resting on any of these evidences as proof of Christian character? My brethren though many of these are Christian exercises and actions yet they are also the feelings and the dreads of apostates and therefore it is unsafe to rely upon them in a matter of such vast importance especially when abundance of more conclusive proof is at hand. Do we then find ourselves to relish spiritual objects? Does the character of God in itself appear to us to be lovely? Do we feel an attachment to it and to the character of Christ and the character of the Holy Spirit? Do we love those who are most unloved those who are most imminent for prayer and holiness and devotion to Christ. We heartily relish the bible and love all the truths it contains and actually endeavor to make it the constant rule of our lives? Do we love the ordinances of religion the Sabbath - public worship - the social prayer meeting - the sacraments of the Lord's supper? Do we pray and do we love to pray - is it pleasant to pray - should we pray if we could go to heaven without it - in the family and in our closets? Do we do this daily and regularly? Do we feel a spirit of deep humility before God and man - are we gentle towards all men and do we feel a forgiving spirit towards our enemies? And do we daily take up the cross and follow Christ? Do we give up our substance to promote his cause? Are we active for religion? Do we feel within us a contest between the old and the new man - the flesh lusting against the Spirit and the Spirit against the flesh? And finally do we love and value God and Christ and the Spirit and the brethren and the scriptures and the ordinances better than we did? Do we love prayer more than formerly and are we more active for Christ and more humble and watchful? These my hearers are the genuine evidences of regeneration. If these things be in us and about us we need not fear but that we are united to Christ by a living faith. These are evidences that will not fail us when most we need them in the hour of death and in the day of judgment. And as these evidences have been repeated and explained in your hearing my audience what answer has conscience given to them? What report does Gabriel this day to heaven of the state of your heart? Where does he put down your name today in the record of heaven - among the friends or the enemies of God? In one or the other of these columns depend upon it they are written. We may not know one another's character, we may not know our own character: back to the eye of God are the true state of our hearts is visible and we are all known by him either as his friends - his children regenerated by the Spirit - reconciled through the blood of his Son - heirs to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and unfading and having our names written in the Lamb's book of life never to be blotted out or we are known as his enemies clad in the armor of rebellion – defying by their conduct the omnipotent God - having our eyes sealed in the slumber of spiritual death - over whom the two-edged sword of his broken law hangs suspended by a hair - on whom there rests the unatoned curse of the law with whom God is angry every day - for whom he is whetting his sword and making ready his vow and against whom there is gone forth from the councils of heaven a decree of everlasting banishment and everlasting destruction and for whom the undying hungry worm is waiting and the unquenchable fire is already kindling. Yes this wide this awful difference exists in the characters of the penitent and impenitent in this place and in this house and God knows who the penitent are and he knows too who the impenitent are. And let us too apply the test that we may know whether we are regenerate or the unregenerate. If we find on examination that we bear about us the marks of the friend of holiness let us thank God and take courage. But if we find that none of the evidences of piety justly belong to us I urge such an one by the terrors of the Lord to give himself no rest until he has made his peace with God. By the records of heaven where is entered a decree of eternal death against him by the coming day of judgment - by the world on fire - by the sword of the Almighty that is ready to fall upon him - by the arrow that is on the string pointing at his heart by the lake of fire and brimstone by the malice of hell which is waiting to torment him - by the mustering vengeance of Jehovah - by the wine press of the forgiveness and wrath of Almighty God - by the gathering storm of eternal wrath ready to burst upon him I warn him to prepare to meet his God.

Sermon 125 Election

[Sermon No. 125, "Election," Isaiah 64:8, 1822 Sep,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 7]

Isaiah 64:8

We are the clay and thou our potter.

[The Calvinist principle of election was very controversial, even in Hitchcock's day.]

The subject I am chosen for discussion this morning (afternoon) my hearers is one against which there exists a strong prejudice and antipathy in the human mind. It is the doctrine of election: and the bare mention of it often excites in the bosoms of some hearers a regret that the preacher should engage in a subject so deep and difficult and unprofitable while others find a positive disgust excited within them at the term election and very few only feel willing to have it made a theme of pulpit discussion. I am well aware how strongly are these feelings of disapprobation and disgust and how they close the judgment against an impartial hearing - for my own experience has often testified to their power. What reason then have I to hope that you my audience will give me an unprejudiced hearing at this time: or that any good will result from a discourse on this subject? Perhaps I have no reason to expect that a single prejudice will be softened or a single judgment convinced of the truth of what I am about to present. Yet if election be a doctrine of scripture the minister of Christ is to preach it and have the consequences with God. And my sole object at this time is to enquire whether it be a doctrine of scripture or not. I am not going to amuse you with metaphysical disquisitions on the point: although there is a strong temptation to indulge in this. But I strongly suspect that such a course rather tends to perplex than to convince or enlighten. The truth is it is a deep and difficult subject and I had almost said none but God can explain it. He alone knows the best mode of treating it. And in his word he has discussed it and with that discussion we ought to be satisfied. If ever I felt an earnest desire to present before you the exact meaning of scripture among doctrines I certainly have that feeling now in regard to election. I pray God I may be enabled to bring the doctrine before you precisely as it is exhibited by those who spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost neither adding thereto or diminishing therefrom one iota. In order to obtain the precise meaning of the bible concerning this doctrine and on account of the prejudices that exist against it I shall not pursue at this time the ordinary course of sermonizing that is I shall not first lay down certain propositions and then proceed to prove them: but shall invert this order and first bring forward certain classes of texts and then see what is the amount of their meaning. For the truth is my hearers however strong may be our prejudices on this subject the terms election elect predestinate etc. are scripture terms the very language of the Holy Ghost and they must mean something. And it is presumed that every hearer present who believes the bible to be the word of God will be ready to receive that meaning or reject the whole bible. I cannot believe any one will be guilty of the strange inconsistency of acknowledging that election is a scripture doctrine and yet remain in unbelief concerning it. For if this doctrine be a doctrine of scripture there is as much presumption in disbelieving as in disbelieving the existence of God. For on what ground is it that we presume to say that one truth of revelation is to be believed and another rejected and if I reject one truth which I acknowledge to be in scripture another man has the same right to reject another which is found there.

I cannot avoid remarking here however that on the other hand it is probable many others push this doctrine of election too far that is farther than the scriptures do. They start with the general doctrine contained in the bible but are not willing to rest there. They must reason upon it and they fancy they discover new consequences and thus are they lead to form views of this point which are utterly repugnant to other declarations of scripture. I acknowledge indeed that every view of this doctrine is encumbered with difficulties. Take for instance the declaration of scripture whosoever will may come in and take of the waters of life freely and no man can come into Christ except the Father chose him, and the mind perceives a difficulty in reconciling these discrete declarations. But the fact that both of them are the words of God ought to silence our objections and cause us to believe that had we the capacity of Gabriel we should find less difficulty here and that had we omniscience all apparent opposition would cease. This apparent discrepancy between the language of scripture has in my opinion been in many instances increased by the reasonings and speculations of man. It appears to me certain that the doctrine of election as taught in the bible is perfectly consistent with the free agency of man - that it renders no sinner less guilty in the sight of God - that it does not throw a bar in the way of any one's coming to Christ - that it does not render the use of means unnecessary and if any perish finally they will blame themselves as much as if no such decree ever existed. It may be said that there is certainly an apparent contradiction between election and these declarations. But I do not believe there is any real contradiction not because I can reconcile them by my speculations but because the word of God plainly asserting both sides implies that they are reconcilable.

But to waive all further preliminary remarks let us proceed to enquire what the bible teaches concerning the doctrine of election?

And first does it teach the doctrine at all? After hearing some text you will perhaps be able to decide.

The text and context may here be mentioned. But now O Lord, says Isaac in the name of the Jews, thou are our Father: we are the clay and thou our potter and we are all the works of thy hand. In another chapter God himself is described as speaking and saying Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker! Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth. Shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What maketh thou? Or thy work, He hath no hands? In the next chapter God also says my counsel shall stand and I will do all my pleasure. These texts however imply merely that God acts as a sovereign in the creation of the universe and that he had a purpose or design in every work of his hands. Something more particular must be added now in order to prove what is commonly understood by election.

We know says Paul that all things work together for good to them that love God to them who are the called according to his purpose. For whom he did foreknow he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son that he might be the first born among many brethren. Moreover whom he did predestinate them he also called; and whom he called them he also justified and them he justified he also glorified. To the Ephesians Paul writes, According as God has chosen us in Christ before the foundation of the world that we should be holy and without blame before him in love being predestinated according to the good pleasure of his will. Many more passages might be adduced similar to these: but there are none plainer on the subject than these. And now I ask not what a man could make them mean by applying to them the ingenuities of criticism but what do they mean in the view of a plain unprejudiced man of good common sense? Here appears no ambiguity of language but the sentiment is exhibited remarkably distinct. And certainly these passages must mean that all Christians were chosen or elected by God in the councils of eternity. In the first passage above quoted Paul was discussing a subject that did not apply to one Christian more than another and it seems exceedingly unnatural as some have understood it to apply the passage to the Jews where nothing is said about the Jews in the whole chapter and it is certain that all the Jews were not glorified as is here said to be the case with those predestinated. To predestinate certainly means to determine before hand - God therefore had determined beforehand to save just so many as will finally be saved. If this be not the meaning of the text just recited I certainly feel incompetent to attach any meaning to them. Whatever therefore are our prejudices it would seem we must allow there is in the bible such a doctrine as election or predestination. Let it be kept in mind that the question I am examining is not whether this be an absurd doctrine but merely whether it be found in the bible.

But in the second place does not this doctrine mean merely an election to certain temporal privileges and not to everlasting life? This question leads to the examination of another class of texts. The first of those just cited may here however be repeated: Whom he did foreknow, etc. It would seem from this that every individual who was foreknown was predestinated and called and justified and glorified that is no doubt admitted to heaven. Is not this my hearers the most exact meaning of the passage?

The next passage is from the Epistle of Peter. Peter an apostle of Jesus Christ to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia. Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father through sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ. grace onto you and peace be multiplied. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. To an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away reserved in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. There can surely be no doubt but the election here spoken of was an election to everlasting glory in heaven. We quote one more passage from the words of our Saviour. This is the Father's will which hath sent me, says he, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing but should raise it up again at the last day. Now who are these the father has given to Christ if they be not the elect?

In the third place I enquire whether the foreseen good works of the righteous are not the ground or procuring cause of their election? Did not God choose them to salvation because he foresaw they would perform his will? This enquiry leads us to look at another class of texts.

The subject seems to be taken up by Paul in the 9th Chapter of Romans in which he is treating of the rejection of the great body of the Jewish nation and of the remnant that remain faithful according to election. He points us back to the two children of Isaac, Jacob and Esau, as illustrations of the sovereign election of God. When Rebecca also, says he, had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac (For the children being not yet born neither having done any good or evil that the purpose of God according to election might stand not of works but of him that calleth), it was said unto her that the elder shalt serve the younger. As it is written Jacob have I loved but Esau have I hated. What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid. For he saith to Moses I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. So then it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy. The case of Jacob and Esau which was originally an election to temporal privileges although the possession or loss of their privileges involved eternal consequences seems to have been chosen by Paul to illustrate a general principle of God's dealings with men, viz. that it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth but of God that sheweth mercy. And does not this declaration clearly imply that it was not on account of any foreseen good did desires or works in man that some of them were chosen for salvation? If this be not the force of the passage I can see no force or meaning in it.

Let us quote another passage from Romans. Even so then, says Paul after referring to the case of Elijah, at this present time there is a remnant according to the election of grace. And if by grace then it is no more of works otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works then it is no more of grace otherwise works is no more works. What then? Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for. But the election hath obtained it and the rest were blinded. It seems from this passage that we must either believe that the foreseen good works of Christians were not the ground or procuring cause of their election or deny that men are saved by grace. And to deny this to reject the uniform testimony of scripture which declaring By grace are ye saved through faith and that not of yourselves it is the gift of God.

Not of works test any many more should best. For nay are his workmanship created in him unto good works unto God works which God hath before ordained we should walk in them)

Not by works of righteousness which we have done but according to his mercy he saved us by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour. That being justified by his grace we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life.

But in the fourth place had God no reference to the good works of Christians in their election? To answer this enquiry let us appeal again to scripture.

Known unto God, says Peter, are all his works from the beginning. The good deeds of Christians therefore being a part of his work were foreknown by him. And Paul tells us whom he did foreknow them he did predestinate. This declaration teaches us that there is an agreement a coincidence between foreknowledge and predestination - that is none are predestinated who are not foreknown to be holy. This also accords with the tenor of scripture in which we are every where taught that without holiness no man shall see the Lord. To the Thessalonians Paul says, God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth. The sanctification of the elect Christians and their belief of the truth was as much decreed by God as their salvation. That is to say if God is determined to save a certain number of the human race he has also determined that they shall be prepared for heaven by his Spirit by his word and by the means of grace. So that the common objection that if a man be elected he will be saved do what he may does not apply at all to the scripture view of this doctrine. It is still strictly true of such a man that except he repent and become holy he must perish.

And here are we reminded of an occurrence during the shipwreck of Paul. After long abstinence, you recollect, Paul stood in the midst of the crew and said - be of good cheer for that shall be no loss of any man's life among you but of the ship. For there stood by me this night the angel of God. Here we perceive God had determined that this crew should be saved and yet only a short time after when the sailors were about escaping from the ship. Paul said to the centurion and to the soldiers except these abide in the ship ye cannot be saved. Surely then there is nothing in the doctrine of election that should prevent the ministers of Christ from saying to the unregenerate except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish. And also to exhort Christians not to ruin the grace of God in vain.

In the fifth place if the good works of believers be not the ground of their election what is the ground? Let us see if the bible decides this question.

Having predestinated us, says Paul to the Ephesians unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself according to the good pleasure of his will to the praise of the glory of his grace wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved. In whom we also have obtained an inheritance being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the council of his own will. To Timothy he says God has saved us and called us with a holy calling not according to our works but according to his own purpose and grace which was given to us in Christ Jesus before the world began. Of his own will says James he begat us with the word of truth that he should be a kind of first fruits of his creatures. The purpose the will or the pleasure of God seems in these passages to be described as the ground of the election of believers. And although God always asks from the best reasons yet he does not in all cases think proper to reveal them. These passages of scripture speak the same language as those just quoted. The sons of God, says John, were born not of blood nor of the will of the flesh nor of the will of man but of God. We might here also address a large part of 9th chapter of Romans The children being not yet born neither having done any good or evil that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works but of him that calleth. To them it is not of him that willeth but of God that showeth mercy. For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh even for this same purpose have I raised thee up that I might show my power in thee in that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy and whom he will he hardeneth. Every thing relating to the subject is here most evidently reframed to the sovereign will of God - and may we my hearers be disposed with Christ on the same subject to say Even so Father for so it seemeth good in thy sight. O that we all had this humble acquiescing spirit of the Saviour! That it was God's will was enough to satisfy him - and it should satisfy us even if he conceal the reasons of his conduct.

But in the sixth place is it meant by election that a certain definite number of mankind are chosen to salvation while the rest are left to perish? To give an answer to this enquiry we resort once more to the law and the testimony.

And here the passage often quoted occurs to us whom he did foreknow he did predestinate. It is obvious from this text that God must have foreknown the very individuals and every one of them whom he predestinated - and if so he predestinated a certain definite number and unless there are some Christians whom he did not foreknow the rest were left to follow their chosen way to perdition. We quote again another passage in Romans on this point: Even at this present time, says Paul, there is a remnant according to the election of grace. What then Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; but the election hath obtained it and the rest were blinded. God must have known the individuals of this remnant - he must have known also the individuals who were blinded - and both these must have been a definite number. Yet it may be said that this passage refers solely to the Jews. It does so: yet a general principle is involved but not to spend time in answering such an objection let me refer to another passage. What if God willing to shew his wrath and make his powers known endured with much long suffering the vessels of wrath filled to destruction. And that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy which he had after prepared into glory? Even us whom he hath called not of the Jews only but also of the Gentiles. Here the vessels of wrath and the vessels of mercy included it is obvious the whole human family - and the number of each class must have been definite and fixed. When the apostles preached in Antioch it is said that as many as were ordained to eternal life believed. And Christ must have known the individuals for whom he prayed when he said, I pray for them: I pray not for the world but for them which thou hast given me: for they are thine.

This my hearers if I am not mistaken is what the bible teaches concerning election. Whatever we may think of the doctrine it seems difficult to read the scriptures candidly and prayerfully without being satisfied that such a doctrine is contained in them. And is it not evident from the text that have been adduced that it is not merely an election to temporal privileges but to everlasting life - that the foreseen good works of the elect were not the procuring cause of their being chosen - although none are elected who do not bring forth works meet for repentance - that the ground of the selection is the sovereign will or pleasure or purpose of God and that a certain definite number are chosen in the councils of eternity. If the bible does not mean as much as this I know not what it does mean. No doubt however many find a multitude of difficulties and objections rising within them against such a view of the subject. All these objections however may be resolved into two. First it is said that for God to select one and leave another of the same character is the height of injustice. Were I left to my own reasonings to answer this objection I confess I should feel totally inadequate to the task: but we have reason to be thankful that this very difficulty is answered in the bible by the Spirit of God. Paul in considering the subject of election introduces for illustration and has been already mentioned the case of Jacob and Esau. Says he when Rebecca had conceived by one even by our father Isaac (For the children being not yet born neither having done any good or evil that the purpose of God according to election might stand not of works of him that calleth). It was said unto her the elder shall serve the younger. As it is written Jacob have I loved but Esau have I hated. These objections we have just mentioned occur to the Apostle. What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? Mark now his answer - God forbid. For he saith to Moses I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. So then it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth but of God that showeth mercy. For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh for this same purpose have I raised thee up that I might show my power in thee and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy and whom he will he hardeneth. This is the reply and the only reply which God has given to this objection.

The second objection may be thus stated. If God selects some of the human race and declares that they shall be saved and leaves others to go to destruction. Then those thus left can be in no degree to blame for continuing in sin since they are not elected and must perish do what they will. Happily this objection also is answered by the apostle. It seems there were some in his days who found exactly the same difficulty in the way of and embracing the doctrine of election. After having uttered the conclusion just written Paul in the next verse brings forward his objection: Thou wilt say then unto me why doth he yet find fault? For who have resisted his will? Let the reply of the apostle sink deep into our hearts. Nay, but O man who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing found say to him that found it Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor and another unto dishonor? What if God willing to show his wrath and to make his power known endured with much long suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction. And that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy which he had afore prepared unto glory. Even us whom he hath called not of the Jews only but also of the Gentiles?

Perhaps such a reply does not satisfy the objection. But he ought to remember it is all the answer they thought proper to give who spake as they were now by the Holy Ghost – and after God has thus spoken would it not be the height of presumption in me to add any of my own meanings with an expectation of clearing up the difficulty?

And now my hearers the subject is before you. But ere I close I have one request to make. If there be any who find the sentiment of this discourse to be hard sayings I would entreat them before they resolve to reject the doctrine to go into their closets and there pray over the texts that have been adduced in this discourse. Especially let them read alternately the 9th chapter of Romans and the 1st chapter of Ephesians without note or comment and pray earnestly over them that God would grant them wisdom to understand the exact meaning of those chapters and that he would subdue any prejudice that may exist in their hearts against the truth. And let them not leave their closets nor leave off praying until they can tell what those chapters do mean if they do not teach the doctrine of election. Such a course is certainly scriptural and reasonable and it is the only one that will offer consolation in a dying hour. Let none of us therefore reject the doctrine of this discourse until he has adopted it. And may God open our eyes that we may behold wondrous things out of his law.

Sermon 128 Noachian Deluge

[Sermon No. 128, "Noachian Deluge," II Peter 2:5, 1823 Jan,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 7]

II Peter 2-5

And spared not the old world but saved Noah the eighth person a preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly.

[Multiple scripture passages in paragraphs 2-5 are not shown in quotes; some are loosely translated or interspersed with his own words. In paragraphs 10-15 Hitchcock uses a lot of material from his review of Buckland's Reliquiae Diluvianae. He draws much material from "heathen and barbarian" sources and suggests they confirm the biblical story. See paragraph 7 if Noah's account were "fabulous". Note the passage, Whence came these numerous worn and rounded masses of stone which are scattered over the tops of our highest hills and mountains?]

The particular object for which the apostle referred to this piece of history will appear in the latter part of this discourse. In the former part it I propose to exhibit before you the history of the flood of Noah and from it to deduce some practical reflections. Permit me to read the history of this deluge as it is given by Moses.

And God said unto Noah, the end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and, behold, I will destroy them with the earth. Make thee an ark of gopher wood. And behold I even I do bring a flood of waters upon the earth to destroy all flesh wherein is the breath of life from under heaven; and every thing that is in the earth shall die. But with thee will I establish my covenant, and thou shalt come into the ark, thou, and thy sons and thy wife and thy sons' wives with thee. And of every living thing of all flesh, two of every sort shalt thou bring into the ark, to keep them alive with thee; they shall be male and female. And take thou unto thee of all food that is eaten, and thou shalt gather it to thee; and it shall be for food for thee and them. Thus did Noah, according to all that God commanded him, so did he.

And the Lord said unto Noah, Come thou and all thy house into the ark. For yet seven days, and I will cause it to rain upon the earth forty days and forty nights; and every living substance that I have made will I destroy from off the face of the earth. And Noah was six hundred years old when the flood of waters was upon the earth. And Noah went in, and his sons, and his wife, and his sons' wives with him, into the ark, because of the waters of the flood. Of clean beasts, and of beasts that are not clean, and of fowls, and of every thing that creepeth upon the earth there went in two and two unto Noah into the ark the male and the female as God had commanded. And it came to pass after seven days that the water of the floor were upon the earth.

In the six hundredth year of Noah's life in the second month the seventeenth day of the month the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up and the windows of heaven were opened. And the rain was upon the earth for forty days and forty nights. In the self same day entered Noah and Shem and Ham and Japheth the sons of Noah and Noah's wife and the three wives of his sons with them into the ark. And the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth. And all the high hills that were under the whole heaven were covered. Fifteen cubits upriver did the waters prevail and the mountains were covered. And all flesh died that moved upon the earth both of fowl and of cattle and of beast and of every creeping thing that creepeth up upon the earth and every man. And Noah only remained alive and they that were with him in the ark. And the waters prevailed upon the earth a hundred and fifty days. And God remembered Noah and every living thing and all the cattle that was with him in the ark: and God made a wind to pass over the earth and the waters assuaged: and the fountains also of the deep and the windows of heaven were stopped and the rain from heaven was restrained. And the waters returned from off the earth continually and after the end of the hundred and fifty days the waters were abated. And the ark rested in the seventh month on the seventeenth day of the month upon the mountain of Ararat. And the waters decreased continually until the tenth month: in the tenth month on the first day of the month were the tops of the mountains seen. And it came to pass at the end of forty days that Noah opened the windows of the ark which he had made. And he sent forth a raven which went forth to and fro, until the waters were dried up from the earth. Also he sent forth set a dove from him to see if the waters were abated from off the face of the ground. But the dove found no rest for the sole of her foot and she returned unto him into the ark for the waters were on the face of the whole earth. Then he pulled her in unto him into the ark. And he stayed yet other seven days and again he sent forth the dove out of the ark. And the dove came unto him in the evening and lo in her mouth was an olive leaf pluckt off. So Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth. And he stayed another seven days and set forth the dove which returned not again to him any more. And it came to pass in the six hundred and first year in the first month the first day of the month the waters were dried up from the earth. And Noah went forth and his sons and his wife and his sons wives with him. Every beast every creeping thing and every fowl whatsoever creepeth upon the earth after their kinds went forth out of the ark. And Noah builded an altar unto the Lord and took every clean beast and of every clean fowl and offered burnt offerings on the altar.

Such is the simple and minute account of the deluge by Moses. Every part of it is too easily understood to demand any explanation. I proceed therefore to deduce some inferences from this interesting piece of history.

And first we derive from the Mosaic history of the deluge strong evidence of the authenticity and inspiration of the Books of Moses.

Moses here describes definitely and particularly an event of no ordinary magnitude and one that is calculated to make a deep impression on all who survived the awful catastrophe. But of the many millions that then probably inhabited the world only eight persons were saved. And when they came forth out of the ark to repopulate the desolate world again and again they would repeat the wonderful history to their children and point out to them on every side evidences of the awful ruin God had brought upon the world for their sins. And it would seem scarcely possible however sunk and debased man might become in succeeding generations it would seem hardly possible that the traditions of a deluge could ever be lost. We might reasonably expect to find traces of it at least in the oral and written history of every nation and tribe. An interesting question then occurs whether such a tradition is preserved in the records of the globe? If on searching the histories and traditions of man we find traces of such a grand catastrophe the conclusion will be forced upon us that the Mosaic account is authentic but if in these histories no references is found to such an event the presumption will be strong that Moses's account is fabulous. Permit me then to deduce from the history of the heathen certain facts on the subject.

When we examine the accounts of the heathen gods and goddesses of ancient times we find allusions to the history of the flood in great abundance. There can be little doubt but Noah was worshipped among idolaters under a great variety of names and characters. Traces of this worship are distinctly discernible in the history and character of the Grecian Deucalion, Atlas, and Jupiter – in the Egyptian Isis, Osiris, Sesostris, Oannes, Syphon, etc., in the Phoenician Dagon, Agruerus, Sydyck, etc., in the Assyrian Astante Dercete, etc., and in the Hindoo Budda, Menu, Vishnoo, etc., in the Chinese Fohi and a God sitting upon the lotos in the midst of the waters; and in the Japanese Bud and Jakusi, etc., etc. The numerous seasons rendering these assertions probable cannot be here presented: but there are plain naked facts enough within our reach we pass by these allusions. [From Review of Buckland's Reliquiae Diluvianae]

Josephus asserts that the deluge and the ark are mention by all who have written barbarian or heathen histories. One author as he affirms declares that a part of the ark yet remains upon a mountain in Armenia. Another writer he says asserts that many persons upon the approach of the deluge led to a mountain in Armenia and were preserved. One in particular was carried in an ark to the very summit of the mountain and a part of the vessel still remains.

Milo a bitter enemy of the Jews and consequently to their scriptures takes notice of the person who with his sons was saved from the flood. And Abydenus after giving an account of the deluge from which Xisuthrus the Chaldean Noah was saved observes that the ark first rested on the mountains of Armenia. Berossus another writer relates that this deluge happened in the days of king Xisuthrus who was the tenth in descent from the first created man that Xisuthrus was warned in a dream of the approaching catastrophe was commanded to build a ship and embark in it with his wife children and friends after furnishing it with provisions and putting into it several birds and four footed beasts. After the flood began to abate Xisuthrus sent out some of the birds which finding no land immediately returned with their feet covered with mud. And sending them forth again they returned no more. After this he himself disembarked built an altar adored the earth and sacrificed to the gods.

Among the Egyptians was a tradition that their god Osiris was on one occasion forced into an ark which closing upon him floated down the Nile into the sea. And it is a curious fact that he is said to have entered the ark on the very day which Moses declares did, viz. Sunday, Nov. 30.

There Persians preserve a tradition of a deluge which some among them said was occasioned by the wickedness of one Maleus. And one of their authors speaks of Noah himself as having dwelt in one of the mountains from which the waters burst forth.

The Grecian account of the flood of Deucalion is well-known. Lucian, a derider of all religions, describes it as taking place in consequence of the wickedness of the antediluvians and states that Deucalion in consequence of his piety was warned to enter the ark with his sons and their wives – that immediately all animals on earth came to him by pairs – that suddenly the earth poured forth an immense quantity of water and the rain descended in torrents so that all things became water and that the ark rode in safety till the flood has subsided. The dove is mentioned by Plutarch as sent out of the ark by Deucalion.

The Hindoo account of the deluge is given by Sir William Jones. According to them at a certain period the whole race became corrupt except eight. So one of these their God Vishnu appeared in the form of a fish and told him that in seven days all creatures who had offended him would be destroyed by a deluge - but that he should be preserved in a capacious vessel formed miraculously and he was directed to take the seven other holy men on earth with their respective wives and pairs of all animals and all kinds of medicines and esculent grain for food and enter the ark. After seven days the ocean began to overflow and this holy man saw a large vessel moving on the waters and having in all respects complied with the directions of the God he entered it – and the God in the form of the vast fish suffered it to be tied by a huge serpent to the measureless horn. Several other visionary notions are added to this account which it is unnecessary to repeat.

In the most ancient of the Chinese books the Emperor Yao is said to have let loose the waters of the ocean in this manner. Having raised himself to heaven Yao bathed the feet even of the highest mountain covered the less elevated hills and rendered the plains impassable.

Let me now pass to the American continent and enquire whether any trace of a deluge can be found among the habitations of the Indians of the forest.

The original inhabitants of the island of Cuba are said to have believed that the world was once destroyed by water by three persons and they have a tradition that an old man knowing of the approaching deluge built a large ship and went into it with a great number of animals: and that he sent out from the ship a crow which did not forthwith return staying a time to feed on the carcasses of animals but afterwards came back with a green branch in its mouth.

The inhabitants of Castella del Oro in Terra Simon in S. American believe that during a universal deluge one man only with his children escaped in a canoe from whom the world was reseeded.

The Peruvians maintain that a universal destruction of the human species took place by an inundation except a few persons who escaped into caves in the tops of the mountains whither they had previously conveyed provisions and animals. Others among them affirm that six persons only were saved on a float or raft.

The Brazilians preserve a tradition of a deluge from which some say only one man other than two brothers with their wives were saved by climbing the highest trees on the mountains: and these events are celebrated in their religious songs.

The Mexicans speak of a deluge in their country by which all men were destroyed and it was repopulated by a river miraculously coming out of the lake. Another tribe maintains that a single family were preserved in an ark and animals enough to stock the new world. While in ark several ravens were sent out one which brought back the branch of a tree.

The Iroquois Indians say that Akron a spirit created the world and another called Messou repaired it after the deluge.

And finally the remote inhabitants of Otaheite being asked concerning their origins replied that their supreme god a long time ago being angry dragged the earth through the sea when their island was broken off and preserved.

Such are the histories and traditions concerning a deluge that are found in almost every quarter of the globe. And among much that is obviously fabulous we find the following facts which coincide with the Mosaic account of Noah's deluge.

1. The earth at some remote period has been destroyed by a flood of waters.
2. This catastrophe happened in consequence of the wickedness of mankind.
3. One man for his purity was supernaturally warned of the coming calamity.
4. His warning was seven days before the event.
5. He was directed to build an ark and enter it with his sons and their wives. 6. A pair of every living creature came into the ark. 7. This man was directed to lay in a store of provisions in the ark. 8. He entered the ark on Sunday, November 30. 9. The deluge was produced by long rain and the pouring fourth of torrents from the earth or deep. 10. The men saved in the ark sent forth after a time a raven. 11. He sent forth a dove which returned without finding any resting place. 12. He sent her forth again and she returned with the branch of a tree. 13. The ark rested at length on a mountain in Armenia. 14. The man with his family on the coming out of the ark built an altar and offered burnt sacrifice. 15. He was tenth in descent from the first creature man.

And here let it be remembered that these various nations and tribes have been entirely ignorant of the Old Testament of the Jews but also of the opinions of one another on this subject. Nay in most instances they have not even committed their ideas concerning the deluge to writing. What then is the conclusion from the fact that we find the history of a deluge among all nations learned and ignorant savage and civilized? Does it not plainly evince that these traditions have a foundation in truth? Does it not point us to a common origin for them all - does it not prove the account of Moses is true? Or if we suppose it possible that the tradition of the general fact might thus exist in every part of the earth and yet have no foundation truth how can we account for it that so many minute particulars in these traditions and histories coincide so exactly with those related by Moses? A man must be exceedingly warped by prejudice and a wicked heart who does not see in this coincidence conclusive evidence that the account given by Moses is true. It is indeed the united testimony of every nation and tribe and language under heaven to the truth of the Mosaic account.

In all the accounts above given of the deluge collected from the four quarters of the globe we perceive with some truth many circumstances most evidently fabulous. But we perceive in Moses history of the same event nothing vile or extravagant. All appears to be truth and consistency. How can this be accounted except by supposing that Moses wrote as he was moved by the Holy Ghost.

But my hearers we need not search the words of the heathen for proof of a former deluge. We have proof of it all around us in our everyday excursions. Whence came these numerous worn and rounded masses of stone which are scattered over the tops of our highest hills and mountains? Surely no river could have conveyed them thither. Nothing will account for their situation but an universal deluge. Let the unbeliever then remember that as he passes over our hills the very stones cry out against him.

The second remark I have to make in view of the history of the Noachian deluge is that the salvation of Noah in the ark is a striking emblem of the salvation of the Christian by the Savior Jesus Christ.

I do not mean that God brought the flood on the world in order to prefigure by the deliverance of Noah the rescue of Christians from sin. But there is an accidental and interesting resemblance in the cases. The ark saved Noah no from being buried in the waters of the deluge- and Christ saves the believer from the drowning floods of sin and the still more dreadful floods of divine wrath. The ark was the only place of security for Noah - the only refuge from the wide wasting deluge. And there is one other name under heaven given among men whereby we can be saved but the name of Jesus. In the ark Noah was separated from the world. So the man who dwells in Christ will be separated from the world and allowed not to touch the unclean thing. In the ark were all the holy persons to be found in the antediluvian world. So in Christ Jesus all are found who love God - for no man cometh to the father but by him. None entered the ark except those whom God specially named and called into it. So no man enters the ark of Christ Jesus except their Father who hath sent him (me) draw him. In the ark Noah was perfectly safe and secure from the waves and storms that beat upon the world. So the believer is safe in Christ amid all the tempests and floods that roar around him and engulf [????] multitudes.

On these several points of resemblance I have no time to enlarge - but I cannot conclude without saying that the destruction of the antediluvian world by the flood of Noah is a striking emblem of the final ruin of the wicked.

For 120 years Noah preached righteousness to a wicked world around him. He warned them to repent and told them in the name and by the authority of Almighty God that soon the overwhelming deluge would destroy them except they repented and to manifest to them his firm faith in the prediction all this time he continued to build an ark before their eyes. But it does not appear that all his warnings and exhortations were the means of the conversion of one soul. The antediluvian no doubt regarded him as a deluded fanatic - as they were too much occupied in their worldly pursuits to listen to his admonitions. But when they saw the rain descending and the waters gushing in in torrents from the fountains of the great deep when the flowed over the vallies and bore them to the mountains then oh then they remembered the ravings of the man of God. See them as the rising waters force them higher and higher up the mountain side. How they look wildly around for help - but the flood swells and swells around them and hope dies in their hearts. And now they see at a the ark borne up on the bosom of the waters and riding securely with the happy Noah whose warnings they have despised. But ah! the doors are shut - to be opened to them no more. And see them as the flood drives them to the pinnacle of the mountain. Frantic with despair - hear their mingled prayers and curses - until a swirling wave sweeps them all away and they choke and struggle and finally sink in the muddy waters never to rise again.

In every Gospel land impenitent men are told from Sabbath to Sabbath of a flood much more awful that is erelong upon the world of the ungodly - even a flood of fire and brimstone. They are told too that an ark is provided for their security and that the doors of it are now standing wide open to admit them. But soon they will be closed by one who shutteth and no man openeth. But few are there who believe any thing of all this. The faithful minister who preaches righteousness is regarded as preacher or terror - an honest but a deluded man. And the very men over whose heads the clouds are gathering that are to rain upon them a storm of eternal wrath live on indulging a fateful and delusive dream that they are safe and they cling to the world as if that could save them. But the ruin of those who entered not the ark of Noah is no more certain than the destruction of those who enter not the ark of Christ Jesus. For if God spared not the angels that sinned but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment: and spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly; and turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes condemned them with an overthrow, making them ensamples unto those that after should live ungodly. And delivered just Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked: The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished. It is the same unchangeable God who brought in a flood upon the antediluvian and a storm of fire and brimstone upon Sodom and Gomorrah and who now has sworn by himself that he will bury the impenitent of this generation in the fiery floods of hell. He was long suffering in the days of Noah - he is long suffering now. But he executed his threatenings then and he will execute it now. And as it was in the days of Noah so shall it be in the days of the Son of Man. They did eat they drank they married wives they were given in marriage until the day that Noah entered the ark and the flood came and destroyed them all. Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot, they did eat they drank they bought they sold they planted they builded. But the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day where the Son of Man is revealed. In that dreadful day impenitent sinners you who now turn a deaf ear to the warnings of God's word - you who neglect the blood of a Saviour - in that day how dreadful will be your condition.

Methinks I see you looking now in wild awful amazement and despair as you feel the earth trembling under your feet - and see the heavens in a blaze and the Lord Jesus descending clothed in flaming fire to take vengeance on his enemies. I hear your shrieking voices calling on the mountains to fall on you and hide you from the wrath of the Lamb. I see the agony of your souls as you look up amid that tremendous scene and see the saints whose names you have despised now safely riding above the storm in the ark of safety. And methinks I see the fiery ocean of almighty water engulfing your soul and sweeping you away into the abyss of blackness of darkness forever.

Sinners around me in the name and by the authority of Almighty God I declare unto you that the ark of salvation is now waiting with open doors to receive you and if you will enter there you will be safe and blessed forever. By the authority of the same Almighty God I also declare unto you that the forbearance of God is almost exhausted and that soon that door will be closed and barred against you forever - and Oh dreadful thought - except you speedily repent the [????] of his indignation will roll in everlasting succession over your ruined soul.

[Additional page, a poem?]

1. The deluge at the Almighty's call.

In what impetuous streams it fell
Swallowed the mountains in its rage.
And swept a guilty world to hell.

2. In vain the tallest sons of pride

Fled from the close pursuing wave
Nor could the mightiest towers defend
Now swiftness 'scape, nor courage save

3. How dire the wreck! How loud the roar!

How shrill the universal cry
Of millions in the last despair,
Reechoed from the lowering sky!

4. Yet Noah, humble happy saint

Surrounded with the chosen few
Sat in his ark, secure from fear
And sang the grace that steer'd them through.

5. So may I sing in Jesus safe,

While storms of vengeance round me fall,
Conscious now high my hopes are fixed,
Beyond what shakes this earthly ball.

6. Enter thine ark, while patience waits,

Nor ever quit that sure retreat:
Then the wide flood, that buries earth,
Shall waft thee to a fairer seat.

7. Nor wreck nor ruin there is seen;

There not a wave of trouble rolls;
But the bright rainbow round the throne
Seals endless life to all their souls.      [Hymn by Philip Doddridge, 1791]

Sermon 129 Way to Zion

[Sermon No. 129, "Way to Zion," Jeremiah 50:5, 1822 Dec,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 7]

Jeremiah 50:5

They shall ask the way to Zion with their faces thitherward.

[This sermon seems to be a parody of Pilgrim's Progress or a Greek myth.]

The Mount Zion so frequently mentioned in the old testament with one or two exceptions was the highest of those hills on which Jerusalem was built. Hence it is often put for the whole city. And as this was a type of the church of God the church on earth and in heaven is often called Zion - and even heaven itself is thus denominated. Ye are come, says Paul, unto Mount Zion and unto the city of the living God - the heavenly Jerusalem. And I looked, says John, and lo a Lamb stood on Mount Zion and with him a hundred forty and four thousand having his father's name written in their foreheads. In the text it may be doubtful perhaps whether Zion represents Jerusalem or the true church on earth or the heavenly Jerusalem. The Jews are represented by the prophet as turning unto the Lord with renewed zeal. In those days and in that time saith the Lord the children of Israel shall come they and the children of Judah together going and weeping: they shall go and seek the Lord their God - and they shall ask the way to Zion with their faces thitherward saying com and let us join ourselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant that shall not be forgotten. The only question here seems to be whether this prediction was fulfilled in the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity or whether it refers to their future conversion to Christianity. I shall adopt the latter supposition and consider the text as describing the condition of those who have turned their faces in earnest towards heaven and are enquiring the way thither. And my object in this discourse will be to describe (somewhat in the manner of a much valued though despised writer) the way to Zion - that is the way to heaven.

1. In the first place it leads through the wilderness of this world.

Any condition in which there is much of confusion and disorder may in the language of scripture be denominated wilderness. Such was the Gentile world regarded by the prophet before the light of the Gospel rose upon it. And he describes the effect of this by saying Then shall lead the same man leap as a hart and the tongue of the dumb shall sing: for in the wilderness shall waters break out and streams in the desert. And the parched ground shall become a pool and the thirsty land springs of water: in the habitation of dragons where each lay shall be grass with seeds and rushes. And a highway shall be there and a way and it shall be called the way of holiness. So in a great measure is this world wilderness to the believer and he must urge on his way and the rocks the desert and the drought - with no cheering springs to quench his thirst with no tree of life to overshadow him and drop down its fruits to support him. There are thorns and briars in the moral as well as in the natural world all springing from the same original curse. And from these thorns the Christian although traveling in the way to Zion is not exempt. He often feels them tearing his flesh and retarding his course and showing to him that this world is not the place of his rest. He looks on the right and left of this path but it is dreary to his soul. It is destitute of that which can satisfy his new born nature which pants for nobler food and for purer enjoyments than those he can afford. He finds too many a beast of prey more furious and dreadful than those inhabiting the natural wilderness who are seeking not to tear his body in pieces but to riot on his soul. He finds the way to Zion a wilderness also because he meets with a few fellow travelers - being compelled to go forward in a path which the multitude avoid. But since these various obstructions remind him that his home is not to be found in such an inhospitable desert they are a powerful stimulus to urge him on to seek an entrance into the heavenly Canaan - the end of his journey. And when the toils and dangers of this passage are all surmounted and he stands on mount Zion above then will he delight to look back and remember all the way which the Lord his God led him for 20 or 30 or 40 or 50 or 60 or 70 years in the wilderness to humble him and to prove him to know what was in his heart whether he would keep his commandments or no. And how loud will be his song of gratitude and praise to that God who led him through that great and terrible wilderness wherein were fiery serpents and scorpions and drought where there was no water who brought him forth water out of the rock of flint: who fed him in the wilderness with manna that he might humble him and that he might prove him to do him good at the latter end!

2. The way to Zion is straight and narrow.

In this respect it differs from any path that ends in perdition. Wide is gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction and many there be which go in thereat. Because strait is the gate and narrow is the way which leadeth onto life and few there be that find it. The Christian pilgrim can not turn aside to that right hand or to the left without imminent danger of never regaining the true road to happiness. So numerous are the by paths sin has constructed on either hand - so much plainer and easier do they appear and so much more trodden that the danger is imminent of being led away finally. Like Lot when leaving Sodom the believer is not permitted to look back on the world or to stay in all the plain but like the miserable wife of Lot he be made a monument of God's displeasure. His appetites and inordinate desires are to be confirmed within narrow limits or they will inevitably lead him astray. For narrow is his path that he must walk circumspectly and enquire diligently for the way in which all the redeemed have walked. Thus saith the Lord stand ye in the ways and see and ask for the old paths where is the good way and walk therein and ye shall find rest for your soul.

3. The way to Zion is sometimes rough and difficult and sometimes smooth and easy.

This is the testimony of every saint who has finished his course. All have found an alternation of darkness and light - of difficulty and ease - of pain and comfort. Sometimes the disinclination of their own hearts has hung like a heavy log upon their progress. Sometimes an enticing world on either side of their path who are gliding evenly along has disheartened them from pressing forward. And sometimes the Spirit of God seems to have forsaken them and pressed down under the weight of temptation and trials. They like the children of Israel in the wilderness are much discouraged because of the way. The darkness thickens upon them and their path becomes dim and they almost despair of ever reaching the heavenly Zion. Again these clouds disappear - light beaks in upon their course - heaven appears in full view - the way becomes smooth and plain before them - and new vigor urges them forward exulting in the bright hope of the glory which awaits them. Their faith gathers new strength. Satan seems to have departed - the current of their affections runs heavenward and the earth with all its allurements has no charms for them. Then do they realize most forcibly that wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness and all her paths peace. As with David they exclaim, Return unto thy rest O my soul; for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee - For thou hast delivered my soul from death mine eyes from tears and my feet from falling. But after season of this peace and joy the believer again perhaps finds his way difficult and hedged up and his progress almost imperceptible. And thus does he alternate between sorrow and joy - most of the way to Zion. The farther he advances in the (divine life however) in his journey to the skies the more pleasant and easy does his way become and the more rapid is his progress. He finds his vigor strengthening from month to month and from year to year and the enemies of his soul less desperate and successful in their assaults – and the nearer view he has of heaven inspires him with redoubled ardor to press forward towards the mark for the prize of his high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

It ought here to be remarked that different Christian travelers find very different degrees of difficulty in their progress. One endeavours to carry with him much of the world and this encumbers him exceedingly. He loads himself with worldly cares or honors or pleasures so heavily that he is borne down by the weight. He finds his feet often entangled so as to fall and he complains much that his flesh is torn by the thorns. After he has been struggling to advance for a long time he finds on looking back that he has made but little progress and when worn out with fatigue he lays himself down to rest. He is astonished on awakening to find that he has lost ground. Ere he is aware of it also he is drawn aside from the true course and wanders a long time in the many paths of sin and sometimes when he comes to a steep and difficult part of the way instead of following the straight and narrow path over the obstacle so heavy is his load that he endeavors to go around it where he is sure to be wounded and ensnared by some enemy who lies in ambush. And all this difficulty and delay he meets with because he still clings to the world and will not leave all for Christ. While another started on the Christian course at the same time outstrips him because he has no such encumbrances and does not endeavor to serve God and Mammon, well knowing that his own heart would be a burden enough to carry and his enemies powerful enough without assisting them. The consequence is that all difficulties give way before him and he passes rapidly and pleasantly onwards toward Zion.

4. The way to Zion is beset with enemies.

Although these enemies are supremely selfish and hostile to one another yet as they all agree in a determination if possible to prevent the Christian from entering heaven they sometimes assault him together and sometimes alone. Along the way that leads to Zion they have made numerous crossroads so artfully constructed as to offer powerful inducements to draw side the unwary traveler and lead him to ruin.

The first of these enemies is Ambition. The road she has constructed is not indeed so alluring at first. But with an ardent and lofty aspect she bids the traveler look forward and see how many places of power and distinction rise conspicuously along its margins where if he will only turn his course he will soon be seated and have every desire of his heart gratified and not be compelled to toil as he now does month after month and year after year without any compensation but neglect and contempt. And if the Christian stay long to listen to these enticements ere he is aware his feet will be torn from the path to heaven.

The traveler is next beset by Fame. Her path too gently ascends – and she bids the pilgrim turn his eyes to the end of it where a lofty and magnificent temple is erected that looks down upon the whole earth in many a name shines forth in golden characters on its pinnacle. She also carries in her hand a silver trumpet and if he will but follow she will lead the way and sound his praises as she passes. And she pours forth a blast so bewitchingly sweet is the sound and so low do admiring courts bend before her that if the believer suffer his eyes to follow her along - if he do not stop his ears to the sound of her trumpet he will forget the way to Zion. For ere long she will convince him that he may follow her for a time without finally losing the straight and narrow way - and when he has acquired a name in the world he can return and render greater service to the cause of religion.

Scarcely has the Christian in his course to heaven escaped the enticements of Fame ere he is accosted by Pride. She points him to the splendid dwellings and costly equipage to be seen along the path which she declares leads to happiness. And these she promises shall be his if he will turn aside from the obscure way he is now pursuing and follow her. She tells him also how mean is his present appearance and how he is the ridicule of the splendid and the rich - and how contemptible are his fellow travellers. At this moment too Wealth steps forward and seconds the advice of Pride by pointing the traveller to the extensive fields - the rich and the beautiful flocks and lands and the shining heaps of gold which she is ready to bestow upon the pilgrim and which will render him independant. Alas! Here and there do these enchantresses find a traveller to heaven weak enough to listen to the fatal charm and turns aside sacrificing his immortal soul to a phantom!

At the foot of mount self denial over which the trail and narrow way passes the pilgrim meets with Pleasure. There has she constructed her path which gently descends and winds down a delightful valley where every thing that is calculated to interest the sense is to be found. With a soft and gentle address Pleasure solicits the weary pilgrim to attend her down this vale. She does not ask him to relinquish finally his object of advancing in the straight and narrow path to heaven but only to turn for a short time to rest from his fatigue and then resume his journey with a keener relish and a firmer step. She points him to the delightful bowers of repose within her dominions and bids him listen to the sweet music that resounds through the groves. But she conceals the dark caverns where her worn out victims live bound in fetters that can never be broken where the voice of wailing and blasphemy are mingled in horrid discord. For none that go unto her return again, neither take they hold of the paths of life. Her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death.

As the traveler ascends the hill of self denial he meets with another enemy called Sloth. She tells him that his path becomes more and more difficult the higher he ascends and that there is also a lion in the way who has torn in pieces many a miserable victim. She tells him also that there is a way that leads round the hill and unites with the straight and narrow path on the opposite side. And if he be persuaded to enter that path he finds it easy and pleasant that sleep overtakes him and he wakes not till a storm arouses him and he has forgotten towards what point to travel.

But if he escape this enemy called Skepticism another accosts him with a sneering and contemptuous look and asks him whether it may not be that he is spending his labors in vain - enquires how he knows that he is not mistaken amid so many crossroads and suggests to him that those on one path are as likely to be right as those on another and that all are equally safe if all are equally sincere - and so advises him to follow his example and take no path at all (and go just where inclination leads).

Soon as he has escaped from Scepticism her sister Philosophy assaults him. By this name I mean false Philosophy: for there is such a thing as a Christian Philosopher.

Philosophy Baptized

*In the pure fountain of eternal love
Has eyes indeed; and viewing all she sees
As meant to indicate a God to man
Gives Him His praise and forfeits not her own Learning has borne such fruits in other days
On all her branches: piety has found
Friends in the friends of science and true prayer
Has flown from lips wet with the Castalian dews. [Cowper, The Task]*

But False Philosophy stops the Christian traveler and endeavours to persuade him that there is another and an easier path to Zion – that the road he is traveling is obscure and difficult while that she points out is every where pleasant and plain and that he can stop by the way and refresh himself without any danger. The pilgrim tells philosophy that he has with him a plain map of the way and of all the crossroads and he feels certain that he is in the right path and points it out on the map. But Philosophy replies that his map is an old one in which are many errors and that it has been corrected and published anew so as to coincide with her view. And besides all maps are liable to be erroneous it is safer in doubtful cases to rely upon our own wisdom and discernment. The traveler from the outset of his journey had constantly carried with him a cross and he had often when fatigued found great relief in leaning upon it. But Philosophy tells him that this is an useless and unnecessary burden and that he will get forward much easier without it. She requested traveller to cast his eyes upon the path she points out and see how many of the great and learned of the earth are travelling in it and asks whether so much learning and so much candor can be mistaken. This path does indeed seem much easier and smoother to the traveller than the straight and narrow way. But at the end of it he sees a dark valley called the valley of death covered with an impenetrable fog and he enquires of Philosophy how he shall be able to find his way across that gulf to which Philosophy is able to make no reply.

There is one an enemy who follows the Christian through the whole of his journey and lends his assistance to the other enemies that beset him and seeks every opportunity of harassing and deceiving him. It is the Prince of the power of the air: and sometimes he casts a mist before the eye of the believer and hides the view of heaven and all other times he renders more vivid the difficulties and dangers of the way - at the same time throwing a lovelier hue over the sirens of the world that solicit him to turn aside and partake in them. In short he assumes every shape and watches every opportunity and practices a thousand wiles to draw the traveler from the straight and narrow path: and alas his efforts are but too often successful.

But fifthly along the way to Zion there are some friends.

Among the first of these the Christian meets is Meditation. Her aspect is indeed pensive and marked by the furrows of thought but her society is eminently calculated to establish and forward the believer in the way of holiness. She learns him how to detect enemies under the guise of friends – how to baffle the assaults of the adversary and teaches him how liable he is to be led astray if left to himself and hence induces him to have his eyes fixed on God for succor deliverance and direction and on the cross of Christ for the renewal of his strength and on the word of God that he may become better acquainted with the way of life.

Another friend the Christian pilgrim is sure to meet in his journey heavenward is Adversity. When first he meets her the sternness of her aspect and the roughness of her manners causes him to recoil from her. And ere he is aware of it she stretches forth an unfeeling hand and plucks out his right eye and tears from his back a load which he had borne so long and so closely that it could not be separated without tearing his flesh. It consisted of certain worldly cares possessions or honors which the traveller deemed essential to his existence and comfort on his journey. And now that they are so forcibly torn from him he sinks down in pain and despondency. But soon he makes an effort to rise and perceives that now his right eye is gone he no longer sees things double and no one longer endeavours to look at two objects at the same time but can turn a single eye towards heaven while he finds a new and unthought of ease and alacrity in this arduous advancement towards Zion now that Adversity has torn from him the load he had so long struggled under - and the deed which appeared to him at first so cruel now manifests itself as a deed of the purest friendship. Adversity saw that the Christian would lose heaven unless the incumbrances under which he labored were torn away and she does not hesitate to inflict this painful but necessary wound.

And so does she sometimes see the Christian insensibly led astray from the narrow path by a too fond attachment to some friend - making him an idol. The child leans too much upon the parent or the parent too much upon the child - the wife too much upon the husband or the husband too much upon the wife - and they both insensibly wander from the strait and narrow path. But adversity springs from and the one is taken and the other one is left. He that is left looks about him in an agony of surprise and murmurs at the cruelty that has thus deprived him of a kind and affectionate friend who was the staff on which he leaned and perhaps too a Christian like himself. But when the bereavement leads him to see that he is departed from God has been wandering in forbidden paths - when he finds himself seeking again and finding the true way to Zion then does he admire the resolute kindness that has broken the charm that was destroying him and restored him to the joys of close communion with God.

And cannot those are my hearers who have recently felt the strong hand of Adversity wrench from them as it were in a moment a husband or a father who had escaped all the arrows of death for fourscore and 10 years - cannot these testify thus soon that the blow has tended to lead them near to God? Cannot they testify that since that time their prayers have been more frequent and fervent and their thoughts and desires and affections more heavenly. Nay cannot they almost adopt the language of David, it is good for me that we have been afflicted! Then are they prepared also to regard adversities as a friend who is doing all in her power to help them to heaven.

Other friends the pilgrim of Zion meets in his way are fellow travelers. It cheers him and strengthens him to find others of like tastes and desires struggling with like difficulties burthens - pressing on toward the same place of rest and happiness. They can discuss together the dangers and trials of the way, take counsel together how they shall best resist and overcome their enemies and help one another when anyone sinks under his burthen. And some such friends the Christian always finds along the strait and narrow path although the Saviour declares them to be few and although some who commence the journey with him prove to be the followers of Judas or Hymenaeus or Demas.

Another important friend and director of the Christian traveller is the Bible. Whenever he is perplexed about the true path he has only to resort to his friend and the way will be pointed to him so clearly that the wayfaring man though a fool need not to err therein. When decoyed by his enemies out of his true course let him look to this friend and he will direct him how to regain it. In short whenever doubt and difficulty and distress encompass the pilgrim's soul that friend is always at hand to enlighten direct and console.

And there is one other friend that never forsakes the traveler till he has entered Zion. It is the Holy Spirit of God. Indeed it is he by his secret influences who effectually guards the pilgrim and without those influences he would infallibly be overcome and never reach heaven. For the prophet says O Lord I know that the way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. But as many as are led by the Spirit of God they are the sons of God. When the Christian traveller is perplexed to find the true path you be hears a voice behind him saying this is the way walk ye in it. And that is the voice of the Spirit. When ambition assaults him the Spirit whispers in his ear whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abused; and he that shall humble himself shall be exalted. When Fame attacks in the Spirit whispers, love not the praise of man more than the praise of God. When Pride endeavors to decoy him the Spirit whispers mind not high things but condescend to men of low estate. When Pleasure allures by her siren voice the Spirit whispers None that go unto her return again neither take they hold of the path of life. When Sloth urges to an easier course the Spirit whispers Go to the ant thou sluggard consider her ways and be wise. When Scepticism sneers upon him the Spirit whispers there shall come in the last days scoffers walking after their own lusts. When false Philosophy is scattering her poisonous the Spirit whispers, Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit after the tradition of men after the rudiments of the world and not after Christ. And when Satan oppresses the believers soul the Spirit whispers Resist the devil and he will flee from you. So when the Christian is borne down with doubts and despondency and discouraged because of the way the Spirit whispers Fear not – When thou passeth through the waters I will be with thee; and through the rivers they shall not overflow thee; and when thou walkest through the fire thou shalt not be burned: neither shall the flame kindle upon thee. And thus does that Spirit guide the believer all his journey through.

Lastly - the way to Zion leads across the valley of death and terminates in heaven.

That is indeed a dark and awful gulf to enter. Satan knowing that he can follow the pilgrim no farther here concentrates all his malice and pours it upon his head and arms death with a thousand imaginary terrors and harrows up the believers soul with sinful forebodings of the terrific conflict. But the moment he enters this gulf he finds a path marked out for him by the Saviour and the rod and staff of that Saviour to comfort him. In one moment all his fears all his enemies and what is much more all his sins are gone and he finds that his toilsome journey is ended and that he now treads the golden streets of Zion and begins to quaff in as the glorious reward of all his labors fullness of joy and pleasures forevermore.

If such be the result of the end of the Christian pilgrimage my brethren who of us does not feel a new resolution bracing him up to a more determined struggle with the enemies of the soul? Who is there that will not set his face as a flint toward Zion and seek more earnestly the way? A little longer struggle with our enemies - a few more rocky precipices to climb - a few more reproaches and pains and seasons of darkness to endure - a little more watching and praying and pressing forward and we shall triumph – nay we shall be more than conquerors through him that loved us.

*Then let my soul march boldly on Press forward to the heavenly gate
There peace and joy eternal reign
And glittering robes for conquerors wait
There shall I wear a starry crown
And triumph in almighty grace
While all the armies of skies
Join in my glorious Leader's praise. [Source: Presbyterian hymn]*

Sermon 130 God Warns Men Once

[Sermon No. 130, "God Warns Men Once," Proverbs 1:30-31, 1822 Nov,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 7]

Proverbs 1:30-31

*They would none of my counsel; they despised all my reproof:
Therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own way and be filled with their own devices.*

From the text many an important sermon might be written as it contains many leading ideas. I shall confine myself to one of them at this time. It is this - that God always gives impenitent men at least one special warning before he finally abandons them to ruin. This seems evidently implied in the text. Solomon here represents Wisdom as enquiring without and uttering her voice in the streets and among other solemn exhortations to the ungodly is that in the text. By wisdom we may understand the instructions of God's word personified or it may mean Christ as the wisdom of God. The latter construction seems most natural for us to adopt since Christ does warn all men by his word his providences and his Spirit in these latter days and it is a curious fact that the words in the original are future. Wisdom shall cry without etc. The earnest exhortations and solemn reproofs and awful threatenings which she utters appear to be directed to all impenitent men within the sound of her voice that is in all the earth where the bible has gone. Certainly there is no reason for limiting them to this or that class of sinners. And the ground on which she delivers to them that they shall be left to eat the fruit of their own way and be filled with their own devices is that they would none of her counsel and despised her reproof. An unavoidable inference therefore is that God gives men a special warning counsel and reproof before he gives them over to endless ruin. To the illustration of this doctrine I shall devote the principal part of this discourse.

And here might I appeal to reason to show that such a proposition is a probable one. For if God has not spared his only begotten Son but delivered him up for us all - if he really desires that all men shall come to repentance he might rationally conclude he would urge upon men the acceptance of his salvation in a manner the most powerfully calculated to avert their attention. But it is not my intention to dwell on such an argument as this. Nor shall I attempt an array of passages from scripture to prove the proposition. Although I might say that when God declares to every one that drinketh come ye to the waters and he that no money: come ye here and eat; and insist whosoever will to come and take of the waters of life freely when he says - I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh - to convince the world of the sin and righteousness and judgment to win all this seems to imply a special meaning and entreaty - nay the very words are a special warning to sinners. But as I use the phrase at this time I mean something more special than the general declarations of the scripture which impenitent men often read year after year with the utmost carelessness. I mean a naming which at the time makes an impression on the conscience of such whether it proceed from the word or providences or Spirit of God. Given the history of the effects of these three things I shall draw an illustration of the proposition that God always gives sinners at least one official warning before he abandons them to eternal ruin.

1. He warns some by his word.

We are told that the word of God is the fire and the hammer to break in pieces the flinty rock, and in another place that it is the sword and the Spirit - quick and powerful, sharper than a two-edged sword piercing even to the dividing asunder of the soul and body and a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart. And such do men often find it. Sometimes a passage of scripture which they have read over an hundred times without feeling its force at all penetrates their heart with the rapidity of lightning and compels them to cry out the arrows of the Almighty are within me the poison whereof drinketh up my Spirit. Sometimes the solemn question how old art thou arrests their attention - sometimes the enquiry how long have I to live - sometimes the declaration There is no peace saith my God to the wicked or the questions who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with the everlasting beings? Sometimes they read that it is high time to awake out of sleep - again they know that the time is short - and thousands of like passages have been made to enter like daggers into the sinner's bosom. Perhaps they first struck him when reading the bible and hearing the preached word. But under whatever circumstances he finds that they fasten upon his thoughts as if directed and continually distress him. They lead him to give up his doubts about the reality of religion and he feels alarmed for his situation and is perhaps is led to go into his closet to pray God to have mercy upon him or to resort to some Christian friend for advice. And whether he believes it afterwards or not that this was a special warning from God for him to prepare for eternity. We do not enquire here indeed whether the peculiar effect of such passages of scripture on the sinners mind be the work of God's Spirit. For it is enough to know that the words that produce the effect are the words of God and that there in the sinner's condition enough to excite all this distress. The man therefore who suffers the anxiety produced in his mind by a passage of scripture to wear away without resulting in his becoming religious neglects and disregards a special warning from God. And the probability is that he will never have another such a warning; but be left to eat up the fruit of his own ways - that is to feel the genuine effect of sin in this world and the pains of hell forever.

2. God often specially warns sinners by his providences.

O Lord, says the prophet, I know that the way of men is not in himself. It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. And we are told by the Saviour that not a sparrow falleth to the ground without his notice and the very hairs of our head are all numbered. The various peculiar and trying circumstances in which we are often brought seemingly by accident are not therefore the result of accident but of the wise Providence of God. Whatever warnings therefore we receive from these are to be regarded as coming from God. And these are various.

God warns one man by the conversation or example of pious friends. That is the sinner is sometimes awakened through their exertions in his behalf. Some word which they drop - some prayer they make reaches and informs their consciences. They are led to look into their hearts and they perceive that all is not right there may they find all to be wrong. They perceive that a deep and thorough revolution must be wrought within them ere they shall be fit to die. Often some word that was dropped from the pulpit perpetually seems to their minds and fills them with anguish. And it is a warning of God to them to prepare to meet Him in judgment. And if they fight it, it may be the last warning.

God sometimes warns men by disappointments and misfortunes. He teaches them in this way that there is nothing on earth in which we ought to set our supreme affections. And often when men have been long and ardently pursuing some object as if it were the supreme good and God dashes the the cup from their hand just as they are about to drink it and their idol is torn away it leads them to see the vanity of worldly objects and have something of a sense of the worth of religion and the favours of God. They are checked in their earnest pursuit and stand hopeless and helpless when they see the object of their fondest desires snatched away. And it is indeed a powerful lesson and a powerful warning. And if a man suffer it to pass away without resulting in his conversion if you permits some other idol to come into his heart and is not lead to place his affections on God there is no reason to expect God will ever more break his sinful slumbers till the day when the final trumpet shall sound. He may leave the man to go on in uninterrupted worldly prosperity – a sign sometimes that he is given men over to reprobate minds and that he has said concerning them why should they be stricken any more they will revolt more and more. For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth and scourgeth every Son whom he receiveth. Let every sinner therefore who has met with disappointment and troubles in times past but who is still in impenitent let him remember that God has given him a solemn and a loud warning and that he has rejected the counsel and the reproof of the all wise God and has no reason to expect but he will be given up to eat the fruit of his own way and be filled with his own devices.

God sometimes warns man by signal deliverances. Their lives perhaps are in imminent danger from the elements or the wicked man. And in the moment when they realize that they are on the brink of destruction how they long to have God for their friend. They pray earnestly to him for help and would give ten thousand worlds in that moment to believe they had an interest in the Saviour. God delivers them from their danger and alas many of them forget their cries and and resolutions in the crisis of danger and become as careless as ever. But let them remember that they have been solemnly warned of their miserable condition without a Saviour.

God often warns sinners by sickness. He weakens their strength and brings them upon the bed of sickness and brings death and judgment to them. They feel the slow approach of the king of terrors and perceive the world to be wholly incapable of affording them any support. They perceive and acknowledge that they are utterly without hope and without God. They long to be spared one more month one more week or even another day in order that they may become reconciled to God. All the extra excuses for neglecting religion with which they have stifled the voice of conscience in days past now vanish and they are astonished that they could have lived so long in neglect of it. They no longer doubt that they are utterly lost and entirely depraved - and that they must persist without the grace of God to change their hearts. O how earnestly do they cry to God for mercy! How certain they are that if he should spare them from the grave this once they shall assuredly lead different lives and seek religion with all their hearts. But death appears near and their anguish is inexpressible. God however has mercy on them and arrests their disorder and gives them another opportunity perhaps of years in which to repent and reform.

Yet how many there are who under fresh circumstances do not carry into effect one of their sick bed resolutions! But will such ever have another warning? Probability says no! For how can they have a louder one? And if they have disregarded this they would surely disregard another. And how can it be that God after such a daring contempt of his threatening and abuse of his goodness should visit them in mercy any more.

God warns sinners by death. The youth perhaps sees one of his companions with no more of religion than himself suddenly cut down in his sins. He is led to enquire why that companion was made an example to warn him instead of his having been called to warn his companion. He cannot help enquiring whether he is prepared for death and finding himself unprepared he is alarmed and distressed and indeed this was to him a most solemn warning to him to prepare to meet his God. But after the anxiety and distress produced by it pass away without resulting in the conversion of the youth and he becomes as stupid and as unconcerned as ever. Yet he will remember it again with an indescribable anguish in another world and the thought that he neglected a special warning of God will be a dagger in his bosom forever and ever.

Sometimes also the person in middle life who has neglected religion all his days is called to see one of his neighbors or friends - it may be a wife or a husband or brother or sister suddenly arrested by the stroke of death and hurried to the judgment. The solemn providence stops him in his career of sin and he looks around him with surprise that he has yet lived and is astonished that he could so long have neglected the salvation of his soul. His anxiety and distress are so great that he resolves never to rest any where again until he rest in Christ. He does not need anyone to tell him that this is a warning from God - he feels it deeply feels it for a time. But alas! In the majority of instances after he is attempted to pray a few times and resolved a few times his anxiety leaves him and he abandons religion that he may again hug the world. But should he be called to lie on a bed of sickness conscience will again remind him that he has had a warning from God and has neglected it. Should his reason be granted him when he dies memory and conscience will then do their office upon him and they will follow him into eternity.

A similar effect may be produced upon the man that is beginning to descend the downhill of life and feels age creeping up on him when the hand of death takes one from him peculiarly endeared to him or of the same age. He looks around him and enquires where are the multitude who began life with me and a voice answers him from the grave yard - here we lie as a warning to you to follow us. He is astonished that when the arrows of death fly so thick around him he has been spared. Father and mother sister and brother and many a child or neighbor perhaps have all gone before him and yet he is spared. And he is led to enquire also what would have been my condition had I died instead of these my friends. O I must not I dare not I will not any longer neglect to prepare to die. I am now warned most seriously for the last time and it must not pass unimproved. And probably such an one if he do not improve the admonition thus given him will be left to eat of the fruit of his own ways.

In the third place place God warns men by his Spirit.

In the cases that have been mentioned where the word and providence of God had a dark and a special effect on the heart that effect resulted probably from the Spirit of God applying that word and those providences. But there are also numerous cases in which neither of these are the means of awakening men but still they are awakened. It may have been that a word dropped in conversation or from the pulpit or even a thought has sunk into the soul of the sinner like an arrow arousing him to a sense of his danger or without any apparent means he finds himself enquiring what he must do to be saved. He may have been a scoffer at religion but he scoffs no more - reality now bursts upon him with overwhelming power and brings him upon his knees. He may have been a sceptick - but his doubts are now all gone and the threatenings of God appear awfully true. He may have been a moral man and fancied that his own righteousness would save him: but now he is slain by the law and perceives there is no hope without a change of heart and faith in Christ. Whatever may have been his previous views and feelings now he finds himself to be a sinner - exposed to the righteous indignation of God - a violator of his law and condemned to suffer its penalties. The awful terrors of eternity pass before him in all their indescribable vividness. He hurries into the business and pleasures of the world: but the thought of an unreconciled God - and of the soul unprepared for heaven follow him there and goad him with a perpetual sting. Wherever he is whatever he does he realizes forcibly the declaration of God that there is no peace to the wicked and that they are like the troubled sea whose waters cast up mire and dirt. The passage of such of man appears to him like an unprofitable waste without a single flower or fruit or prospect on which he can fix his eyes with pleasure. He feels that he has been living all his days in the service of this neglect of God - neglect of the bible and of prayer and of the many opportunities set before him to obtain religion and now he fears that the door of mercy is shut against him and that God will soon appear to execute his vengeance upon him. He fears that the Spirit is already grieved away from him and that he is given over to hardness of heart and blindness of mine and vessels of wrath fitted for destruction. And he realizes too in some measure that it is just in God thus to forsake him since he has so long forsaken God.

This it is my hearers to be under the special convicting influences of the Spirit of God. And if this be not a warning from God to prepare to meet him in judgment we know not what can be. And if a man neglects such a warning surely it must be just in God to leave him to eat the fruit of his own ways and be filled with his own devices. Yet multitudes do neglect this warning - yes I have reason to fear that many in this house have neglected it and are now more unconcerned than before they received it. They may even forget that they were thus warned: but except they repent they will remember it in hell.

With a few inferences I close this discourse.

1. It is be found the subject shows us the reasons why so many of us are so little affected by the words and the providences of God. Probably in former years we have been specially awakened and alarmed for our safety either by the word or providences or Spirit of God and we neglected that warning and now though similar afflictive providences may come upon us they produce little effect because the Spirit of God does not apply them. We have grieved him away and now we are left to eat of the fruit of our own way and be filled with our own devices. Formerly perhaps a passage of God alarmed us but we shook off our convictions and now the most awful threatenings of the bible do not move us at all. The death of some dear friend or some signal deliverance or some heavy disappointment or some sickness called us in some past season to be anxious for our souls yet we shake off any alarm and these same things have been repeated upon us perhaps but had no abiding effect. And why? Because the Spirit of God has been resisted and we are left to our own devices.

2. We learn from this subject what is the best evidence that the Spirit of God has forsaken a man. It is this. When the passage of scripture that once alarmed him exceedingly now alarms him no more - or when a solemn providence which once led him to enquire what he must do to be saved now when it is repeated upon him produces no such effect although he is yet unregenerate. A man for instance was once most solemnly impressed by the death of a friend: but since that time he has buried many others especially dear: no such effect was produced - nothing indeed but sorrow for the loss of a friend and no special concerns for his soul. Now if such a case does not show a man given over to eat the fruit of his own ways - if it does not show the Spirit of God to abandon him I know of nothing that can prove it. Stupidity my hearers stupidity when God speaks to uses as he does whenever he afflicts us is a most conclusive evidence that we have neglected his warning voices in times past and that we are now left to our own chosen way.

3. We learn from the subject what will stop the mouths of the wicked in hell. It will be the reflection that they have been solemnly and loudly warned by God while in this world. They will recollect the way passages of scripture the very sermons or exhortations or providences that awakened them. And knowing that they willfully neglected the warning they will not dare to open their mouths with one murmur against God - but the whole world of hell will become guilty before him. If there existed upon your farm a high and dangerous precipice and you saw your neighbor going towards it and you earnestly and affectionately told him of his danger and besought him to turn his course if that neighbor persisted in approaching the precipice and at last actually tumbled over it and mangled his body would he presume however great his anguish to reproach you as the cause of his misery? No more reason will the condemned Spirit in hell have to murmur against God as the author of their anguish. Their bitter and eternal wail will be we have destroyed ourselves - how have we hated instructions and despaired reproof! Now are we filled with our own devices and are eating the fruit of our own ways.

4. We learn from the subject what will be the chief torment of hell. It is the recollection of the warnings of God which the wicked have neglected. Continually will the thought occur to them that they were once most solemnly told of their danger and exhorted by God to flee from it. They had heaven and hell set before them the one in all its joys and the other in all its horrors and they chose hell when nothing was hurting but the choice to conduct them to heaven.

5. We learn from the subject what it is that ought to be the greatest cause of alarm to the impenitent. It is the fact that they are unalarmed. If what we have said in this discourse be true this last furnishes the utmost reason to fear that they are abandoned to their own devices - and how dreadful the thought that we are given up of God. That do what we will we shall never feel any anxiety about our souls but shall only continue and harden in sin while we live and lie down at last in eternal sorrow.

I have said that with some inferences I should conclude this discourse. Best can I conclude until I have enquired of you my hearers whether you have not been at some former time specially warned of God and alarmed at your danger? Is there one person present who has become a moral apart tomorrow that has not at some time or other felt a special anxiety for his or her soul. If there is not then depend upon it my friend that God has solemnly and specially warned you of your danger and if you neglected that warning and have become again careless and unconcerned you have surely awful reasons to fear that God has abandoned you as you have abandoned him. After he has warned and men turn not he strikes. How soon or how sudden the blow may follow the warning in some cases we know not - but you have reason to fear it every moment. You have no reason to expect that another warning will be given you. You have every reason for fearing that you will be left to live on in your present stricken course of sin until the hour comes - and depend upon it the thought that you have been once awakened and neglected his admonition will sting you with anguish and grieve you with despair throughout eternity.

Sermon 133 Resignation

[Sermon No. 133, "Resignation," Acts 21:14, 1822 Nov,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 8]

Acts 21:14

The will of the Lord be done.

True resignation, says a late excellent writer, is the hardest lesson in the school of Christ. It is the oftenest taught and the latest learnt. It is not a task which, when once got over in some particular instance, leaves us master of the subject. The necessity of following up the lesson we have begun presents itself almost every day in some new shape occurs under some fresh modification. The submission of yesterday does not exonerate us from the resignation of today. Thus Hannah More

The correctness of these remarks will be questioned by no one: and they show the importance of frequently exhibiting and enforcing true Christian resignation - since though no virtue be more difficult yet none is calculated to produce more genuine happiness to the believer. It brings him just into that situation which is proper for a lost sinner who is saved only by grace. It empties him of self-confidence and pride and binds him to closer communion with God the source of all peace and satisfaction. I propose at this time to explain the nature and force the duty of resignation to the will of God. The text scarcely needs any explanation. It contains an instance of resignation of the genuine stamp. Paul was in the house of the evangelist Phillip in Cesarea on his way to Jerusalem. But a certain prophet in that place predicted the woes that awaited him should he go to that city. And his disciples with one consent besought him not to go up to Jerusalem. Then Paul answered what mean ye to weep it to break my heart? For I am ready not to be bound only but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus. And when he would not be persuaded, says the historian, we ceased saying the will of the Lord be done. As soon as these humble Christians were satisfied that Paul acted in conformity with God's will in giving to Jerusalem faith triumphed over the feelings of affection. Thus to say and thus to feel in every situation of life prosperous and adverse is the duty of the Christian. But in order to avoid taking up with false resignation, I shall first endeavor to explain the nature of that which is genuine.

And first Christian resignation implies something more than philosophical fortitude.

Philosophy teaches her votaries to bear with composure the evils of life because they cannot be avoided. And there were in the Grecian and Roman states numerous instances of this kind of fortitude. The Stoics taught that a wise man ought not to be affected either by joy or grief and that all the ills of life such as pain poverty and the like are fancied not real evils. The Cynicks bore trials with a vain and haughty contempt being too proud to murmur and repine. Indeed a sullen and obstinate pride is consistent with and probably constitutes the essence of all that usually goes by the name of philosophical fortitude. And though it may sometimes counterfeit the appearance of Christian resignation, yet it may always be distinguished by the absence of a deep and pervading desire that the ills we suffer are according to the will of God and will promote his glory. Philosophy submits because she is forced to it. Christianity submits because it is God that inflicts them.

There is a resignation akin to this which I here call philosophical which we not unfrequently see manifested. A man is called to see a friend torn from him by death. And until the moment when the recovery of that friend is regarded as hopeless he thinks nothing of submission - but when he sees it the grasp of death cannot be unclosed then he is all resignation. And why. Because he is compelled to it. Or such a man may be called himself to a conflict with the last enemy. And so long as he has any hope of life he manifests nothing like resignation but when all hope of recovery is gone or pain presses him so keenly that his soul chooses death rather than life he answers his anxiously enquiring friends by saying that he is resigned to death: whereas he ought to say that he is forced to submit which in a scriptural sense is no resignation at all.

2. Genuine resignation does not imply a willingness to suffer the pains of hell forever.

Something like the affirmative of this assertion has been advanced by writers on theology. But true resignation is our unreserved submission to the will of God. And that will must be learned from his revealed word: but that's declares God does not will that any should perish and although some will perish finally yet no man can know that it is God's will that he should perish. Nay if he knows himself to be a Christian or if he believes himself to be one then if he is willing to suffer perdition he is willing to endure what he believes to be contrary to the will of God. He is willing to be made an eternal enemy of God and of all good. Which is indeed a strange sort of submission. Moreover there is no precept or scripture enjoying such a resignation. Two passages however are produced which are said to be examples of it - the one in which Moses entreates God to blot him out of his book if he will not forgive the sins of the Israelites and the others in which Paul wishes himself accursed from Christ for his brethren his kinsman according to the flesh. But the latter passage probably means no more than that the apostle could wish to die for his brethren if by that means they could be saved. And the former passage has no relation to the subject: for Moses prayed to be blotted out of God's book (that is doubtless to suffer temporal death) provided God would not spare his countrymen; just as on another occasion he prayed that God would kill him or release him from his heavy burdens that lay upon him. And indeed let men reason as they may on this front - nay let sincere men actually believe themselves willing to suffer eternal perdition to glorify God - yet the truth is no Christian ever can be brought no Christian ought to be brought to be willing to become an enemy of God and a companion of devils.

3. Christian resignation does not imply an insensibility to the evils we suffer.

The language of Paul at the time the text was uttered shows how keenly the disciples felt the pang of separation from him and of yielding him up to his enemies. What mean ye to weep and to break my heart? At the tomb of Lazarus Jesus wept. And when he came into the garden of Gethsemane although he there exhibited the most perfect example of resignation the world has ever witnessed yet his agony was so great that he sweat as it were great drops of blood. To be insensible to the evils God brings upon us in Stoicism - is atheistical apathy. To be keenly sensible of them and yet be able to say thy will be done is Christianity. When the ties of the tenderest earthly affections are rent asunder by the violent and unsparing arm of death why should we wish to hide the falling tear or suppress the heaving sigh? Why desire to mail ourselves in an unfeeling philosophy? Religion teaches us to cultivate and improve instead of blunting and deadening the sensibilities of our nature and it is in the icy halls of philosophy and not in vernal warmth of pure and undefiled Christianity that we may expect to find the affections frozen and the heart callous. The tear which we drop on the grave of friendship or over our disappointed hopes is often the signal nature gives that she acquiesces in the will of God.

It gives the mourner's heaving bosom vent and quenches the anguish that would else consume. And flowing through the channel nature give softens a heart that else would stiffen into stone. So softened there a heavenly seed is sown which shoots a plant that bears an hundredfold.

4. Christian resignation is not inconsistent with earnest supplications to God for deliverance from the evils we suffer.

Some of the ills of life come upon us suddenly before we have had opportunity to implore God to spare us - and others are altogether without remedy - such as the death of friends - none of whom can ever return to us however earnestly we pray for their resurrection. But many of the trials we suffer are such as God in his providence without violating the fixed laws of his government can remove. Now each of these evils is intended to produce a given effect - and none but God knows how long it is necessary we should suffer them. So that while we have a feeling that acquiesces in their continuance if such be God's will we may likewise earnestly entreat him that he would remove the burden: for perhaps the utterance of that very prayer with a proper Spirit is the precise state of feeling which God will bring us by the affliction and when that is produced he may consistently relieve us.

But we have an example on this point more conclusive than our reasonings. Thrice did the Saviour in Gethsemane pray earnestly that if it were possible the cup might pass from him. And if he could offer such a prayer under such circumstances and at the conclusion say nevertheless not my will but thine be done there is no evil however severe and apparently necessary from which we may not pray for deliverance provided true resignation possesses our hearts.

5. Christian resignation implies that we are sensible that the evil we suffer are deserved.

Some of the most devoted servants of God have been called to pass through the deepest waves of affliction and trial ever experienced by man. But never was there such an one who did not deserve it all and much more as punishment of his sins. For we all profess to believe my brother that our sins deserve eternal punishment in hell. And what mortal suffering can be compared for a moment with this? The fact is seen as the abominable thing which God hates and so long as he hates it it deserves his indignation. But the Christian is delivered from the condemnation of eternal death and any sufferings he feels here on earth therefore to be regarded as infinitely less than his iniquities deserve. Yet it is not an unfrequent thing for men when under the pressure of certain kinds of trouble to feel as if they did not deserve it. Thus we may be ungratefully treated by our nearest friends for whom we have labored much and suffered much. And we are apt under such trials to feel as if we did not deserve such treatment. And perhaps we do not from man but we certainly do from God and whatever we suffer we ought always to recollect that it comes upon us by the appointment of God. Affliction cometh not forth of the dust neither doth trouble spring out of the ground. Why then should a living man complain – a man for the punishment of his sins?

Still however it is not infrequent for men to feel as if their lot in the world was a hard one and when they see others whose lives have been worse than their own surrounded by prosperity and gliding easily along its unruffled stream they are often disposed to murmur at their trials and to enquire what they have done to render them deserving of so much more severe a fate than their wicked neighbors? We might reply that they have sinned and that whatever be the condition of others around them their lot is much more happy than they deserve. Until they have such a feeling as this they will never know anything of true Christian resignation to the allotments of Providence.

6. Christian resignation implies a firm belief of the wisdom and equity of God's overriding providence.

There is a strong disposition in man to keep the agency of God in the events of life out of sight. In all heathen lands and in some Christian lands adverse events have been ascribed to the power of evil Spirits. And even at this day we often hear so much said about events happening by chance or by accident that there is reason to fear many believe the providence of God does not extend to every event but that he has left the universe to the direction of certain fixed laws and has retired himself into a kind of Epicurean repose. Not that any man will acknowledge speculatively that he believes in any thing like this: for the declarations of scripture that not a sparrow falleth to the ground without his notice and the very hairs of our head are all numbered stand directly opposed to such a supposition. But there is much practical disbelief of the providence of God. The truth is all the adverse events and crosses and trials we must endure are as really the work of God (as anything can be) as the act of eating and drinking is the work of man: because he has so constituted things that these evils must unavoidably come upon us. And unless we realize the hand of God in our afflictions we may submit to the evils we suffer - because we cannot avoid them but we shall not submit to the will of God which only is Christian resignation.

7. Christian resignation implies correct views of the character and requirements of God.

Suppose a rebel against the national government were called upon to resign himself up to the will of the government and be made to believe that the government was altogether merciful would never punish him nor require any atonement for his offences no doubt he might be made cheerfully to commit himself into their hands. But let him be told that a trial awaited him and that without certain conditions performed his life would be forfeit to his crimes and that not one jot or tittle of the law would ever be abated until his compliance and instead of submission there would be stirred up within him a more determined opposition than ever. So a man may persuade himself by his reasonings that God is altogether merciful and forget that he has an attribute of justice to support and into the hands of such a God he is willing to commit himself - and relying on that unmix'd mercy he may even be composed in a dying hour. But let him be made to see that the same God who styled himself long suffering and gracious declared also in the same sentence that he will by no means clear the guilty - let him be told that unless you repent and reform God will be to him a consuming fire and every principle of resistance will rise to a higher pitch within him and he will be the furthest possible from Christian resignation. It is one thing to submit to a God of our own imagination and quite a different thing to submit to the God of the bible.

In the eighth and last place Christian resignation implies an unreserved surrender of ourselves to the will of God.

This comprehends indeed the sum and substance of resignation. The man who is possessed of this feeling finds every murmur and every cavil to have vanished from his mind. His distrust and doubt are banished and in their place he finds a filial confidence possessing his bosom leading him to repose his soul and all its interests in God. He feels assured that God is just and true in all his judgments: and though borne down under the rod of God's chastisement he still looks up to heaven and exclaims with Job shall we receive good at the hand of the Lord and shall we not receive evil? Though he slay me yet will I trust in him. It is the confidence of one who feels that he is weak and God is almighty - that he is ignorant and God all wise - that he is sinful and God all merciful, It is the confidence of a child who feels that his father's corrections are deserving and who is led thereby to weep and mourn over his ingratitude. It is the confidence of the returning penitent who had long wandered from his father's house and on his return is met by his forgiveness and tenderness while yet a great way off. And that confidence that sense of God's goodness leads a man of Christian resignation to have an earnest desire that he may glorify God in his body and in his Spirit - and he feels willing and rejoices to be in the hands of such a Being to be disposed of for his glory - and to be made an instrument of the promotion of Christ's kingdom on earth. He longs that God would bind his soul to his throne and that he would not suffer him again to depart from his presence nor permit his will any more to rebel against the will of God. He feels that then only is he safe – then only is he happy when he his will is swallowed up in the will of God.

This it is to be truly resigned to the will of God. And blessed is the man whose heart divine grace has subdued into this sweet and child like submission. Yet alas how many of us in the language of the apostles are self-willed - preferring our own interest to the glory of God and refusing the entire surrender of every faculty of body and soul to his service. But in so doing how unreasonable how treacherous to our truest happiness and best interests are we! For in the first place the government of God over the world is altogether just and right.

It is impossible a being of such attributes as ascribed to God should rule in any other mode. There is if I may so speak a necessity of his nature to hold the reins of dominion in such a manner that his own glory and the best good of the universe shall be promoted. When therefore we murmur at that government in other words when we are wanting in Christian resignation we oppose his glory and our own best good.

We set up our wills in opposition to the will of God - and however startling the idea may be we do in fact profess to be wiser than God. O that we could all unite in the way of Moses and the Lamb! Great and marvelous are thy works Lord God Almighty! Just and true are thy ways thou king of saints. Who shall not fear thee O Lord and glorify thy name for about only art holy.

Again - every adverse event God brings upon us is intended for our best good.

What son is there whom the father chasteneth not? But if ye be without chastisement whereof all are partakers then are ye bastards and not sons. Furthermore we have had fathers of our flesh which corrected us and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of Spirits and live. For they verily for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure; but he for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness. And is this the benevolent intention of God in bringing upon us trials and sorrows. And shall we by our own murmuring spirit by our want of genuine resignation defeat that intention and cause them to prove a savour of death unto death?

Again my hearers look at the example of Christ.

Never was there a cup of misery so bitter as that which he drank up in Gethsemane! It was the cup of the wine of the fierceness of God's wrath. There was mixed in it the curse of a broken law - the penalty due to a sinful world – yet the Saviour in full view of the dreadful agony before him cried not my will but thine be done, and drank it to the last drop. Let none of his disciples shrink from submitting with cheerfulness to the comparatively trifling evils they are called to endure. Let them look at Gethsemane and the cross and their subdued feelings will all be conquered.

Once more my brethren permit me to urge the duty of resignation by the consideration that until we practice it we can never be truly happy.

What is it that constitutes the peace and joy and consolation of the Christian? It is resignation to the will of God. What is it that makes up the blessedness of heaven? It is to have the will of angels and glorified Spirits swallowed up in the will of the Creator. While unsubmissive we are endeavoring to build up an interest that is separate and inconsistent with the peace of universal benevolence God is carrying into execution. And on such selfishness there rests a curse. It is not till we join heart and hand in the benevolent designs of Jehovah that we can feel anything of the happiness which God feels and we shall never cordially unite in those designs until a Spirit of pure and holy resignation take possession of our souls. The more that Spirit governs us the nearer do we resemble God - and just in proportion as his blessed image becomes brighter within us will be the increase of our happiness.

Two remarks will close.

1. To be truly resigned to the will of God is a certain evidence that we are the children of God. In other words have been born again of water and the Spirit.

Never does proud and apostate man heartily bow his will to the will of God till the Spirit has subdued it and he becomes a new creature in Christ Jesus. To feel that he deserves the severest afflictions of life as the punishment of his sins - to have a realizing belief and sense of the overriding providence of God and correct views of the character and requirements of God and to surrender himself unreservedly into the hands of God - these are exercises the unrenewed heart is a stranger to: for the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit. Whoever finds them existing within him is a believer.

But secondly there is no evidence of piety so difficult of application so liable to be counterfeited as resignation. This I have already shown by exhibiting in this discourse several things which are often mistaken for genuine submission to God. It is no difficult matter for almost any person to persuade himself that he is resigned to God's will: but it is a difficult and a rare thing to be really so. Let us then be cautious my hearers how we lay too much stress on a mark of regeneration so equivocal and deceptive. Indeed let us so live that we shall never be compelled to rely on any single evidence of our piety: but be always able to summon from our hearts from our closets and from our lives a host of witnesses who shall unite in testifying that we are adopted into the family of God.

Finally how miserable is that man who never felt genuine resignation of the will of God! I care not what iron strength of nerves what stoical indifference what philosophical calmness he may possess. If he has never known the sweet peace of surrendering his soul and body his temporal and eternal interests into the hands of God then he knows nothing of true happiness. He carries within his bosom an unkindled heart in which happiness can never dwell. Is there not some soul before me that from day to day is uneasy and discontented - that secretly murmurs when trials come and feels a restless desire after some more substantial happiness than the earth can yield? O come thou agitated soul and learn from this subject the secret of your wretchedness. It lies in your want of submission to the will of God. Make at once the surrender the entire surrender of all your powers and interest into the hands of God and the secret of peace and happiness will be put into your hands and your disenthralled spirit will henceforth exult in its liberty. The world that now looks so barren and cheerless will become a flowery and a fragrant field and when the waves of trouble sickness and death come rolling over you you will have in your hands the magic wand that can divide the waters so that dryshod you can go through.

*Resign - and all the load of life
That moment you remove.
Its heavy tax - ten thousand cares
Devolve on one above...*

[Source: Resignation, Edward Young]

Why should this anxious load

*Press down your weary mind?
O seek your heavenly father's throne
And peace and comfort find.
His goodness stands approved
Unchanged from day to day
I'll drop my burden at his feet
And bear a song away.*

Sermon 135 Preparation for the Lord's Supper

[Sermon No. 135, "Preparation for the Lord's Supper," Revelation 19:7, 1822 Nov, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 8]

Revelation 19:7

The marriage of the Lamb is come and his wife hath made herself ready.

The relation between Christ and the church is often in the scriptures represented under the figure of marriage. So it is described throughout Solomon's Song and the parable of the ten virgins is founded on the same idea. Say Paul to the Ephesians, I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy. For I have espoused you to one husband that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ. And to the Ephesians he says, No man ever yet hated his own flesh: but nourisheth and cherisheth it even as the Lord the church. For we are members of his body of his flesh and of his bones. For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother and shall be joined to his wife, and they two shall be one flesh. This is a great mystery: but I speak concerning Christ and the church.

By the marriage of the Lamb is usually understood the future union of Christ and the church in heaven. It may refer also to a state of greater prosperity and purity to which the church will be raised in the millennial days or at any other period when the church general or a particular church is revived and brought nearer to God. In which of these senses the text is to be understood may be doubtful probably however in the former. And now I have a question to propose - in what respect a preparation to meet Christ at his marriage supper in heaven differs from a preparation to meet him at his supper on earth? The preparation my brethren is essentially the same only perhaps different in degree. The very same qualities of heart the very same exercises are requisite to our coming to Christ's communion table on earth as are necessary to coming to his communion table in heaven except on earth sin will be mingled with all the believer does: not in heaven he will be freed from it. This fact indeed will render necessary for celebrating the Lord's supper on earth some peculiar duties and exercises which will be unnecessary in heaven such as prayer and repentance. But the man who is in a proper state of heart to approach the Lord's table in his earthly courts is prepared for his marriage supper in the New Jerusalem. Permit me then to attempt a short description of that state of heart and life it is requisite we should possess in order this day to celebrate acceptably the dying love of our Redeemer.

In the verse following the text it is said, And to her (the church) was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen clean and white: for the fine linen is the righteousness of the saints. This then is the preparation requisite to meeting the Lord. It implies surely that they must possess holiness of heart without which we are told in another place no man shall see the Lord. It implies also that they must be interested in the merits of Christ in order that their righteousness may be accepted. Without this index their righteousness is but as filthy rags and not the clean and white linen described in the context. For however advanced a man may be in holiness he is still a sinner and sin is mixed with all he does so that he must have the robe of Christ's righteousness cast around him in order to be pronounced clean. Indeed some good commentators as Scott suppose the righteousness mentioned in the text to refer entirely to Christ's righteousness received by faith. But I rather incline to regard it as it as their own personal righteousness: because the word in the original is plural - and the whole tenor of Scripture teaches us that it is only through Christ's merits that the holiness of the holiest man on earth is accepted. Or rather the text seem to refer both to the personal righteousness of the saints and to the righteousness of Christ counted unto them for justification through faith.

The two general ideas in the text then which describe the preparation of the Christian for meeting his Lord in his earthly or heavenly flesh are 1. That he must possess holiness and righteousness in himself, and 2. That he must have received the righteousness of Christ. I now proceed to describe more particularly the effects of these principles when combined upon the believer.

1. The man who has the righteousness of the saints will have a deep sense of his lost condition by nature and this is essential to a right approach to the Lord's table.

By a state of nature I mean that condition we are all in before we are brought into a state of grace - I mean the condition to which we are introduced by our birth. We are told by Paul that this state of nature is a state of wrath in which we are all concluded to be under sin. The truth is we begin to sin as soon as we are capable of it and the moment we have sinned once we incur the curse that is threatened in the law of God. Which is everlasting punishment. And from this curse the united power of many angels and devils by ever so many prayers sufferings and efforts cannot relieve an individual. The Son of God must take human nature upon him and magnify the law and make it honourable by bearing our sins in his own body on the tree or that curse must have its inextinguishable accomplishment upon the criminal.

But farther still: The Christian in a proper frame for approaching the Lord's supper will feel no disposition to palliate the matter of his sinfulness by endeavouring to show if we come into the world with depraved natures the blame lies with God and not upon him. It is sufficient for him that he feels a wicked heart of unbelief and depravity within him and a conscience reproving him for indulging it. And every returning year shows him more and more of the depravity that lurks within him. And the character of that depravity assumes a more hateful form the longer he experiences the long suffering and mystery of his God and contemplate upon what God has done for man. The ingratitude of sinning against such as God appears more and more base. And the magnitude of the evil of sin rises higher and higher in his estimation. So that he is never much alarmed lest men should use too strong expressions concerning the depth and vileness of human depravity or the demerit of sin. It will be difficult to represent it in a worse light than it has appeared to him. And every time he returns to the communion table he brings with him a seemingly heavier load of sin and feels more uneasy under it and is led to cry more earnestly for deliverance.

Unless the Christian has a deep sense of his lost condition by nature he cannot be sensible of his obligations to Christ in shedding his blood and ransoming him from the effects of sin. Just as low as his views of himself are so high will his gratitude to his Redeemer arise. If he fancy himself not to be utterly lost by nature but has within him some native seeds of holiness he can feel but little comparative gratitude to Christ. When indeed he is comparatively but little indebted to him. The man who is cured of the plague will certainly feel more thankful to the physician than he who is cured only from the tooth ache.

Again this deep sense of his lost condition by nature will cause the Christian when he comes to the Lord's supper to have a deep and penetrating sense of his entire dependance on the grace of Christ for the continuance of holiness in his heart. For every holy desire he has had - for every fervent prayer he has prayed for every holy action he has performed he will give God the glory - and he will solemnly feel that if he ever has another right feeling or does another right action he shall be dependant on the same grace. If he be left to himself he well knows from his sad experience that he shall return like the dog to his vomit. But if he have an impression that he is not so bad by nature and does not carry within him so utterly corrupt a heart he will not feel thus entirely indebted to the grace of God: but will impute some of his goodness to his own exertions and he will not suppose that he shall immediately lose all his holy desires and feelings though he be left to himself.

In the second place the man who is clothed with the righteousness of the Saints will have an exalted view of the character and especially of the holiness of God and this is essential to his readiness for the communion table.

The Christian is often lead to contemplate the natural attributes of God in the works of creation and is brought to exclaim with the Hosts of heaven great and marvelous are they works, Lord God Almighty. In wisdom hast thou made them all. And still oftener will he meet in the word of God with the most exalted description not only of his natural but moral attributes - and like Zophar he will be constrained to say canst thou by searching find out God or the Almighty unto perfection? It is as high as heaven what canst thou do? Deeper than hell; what canst thou know? And when he looks back on the history of the Israelites and sees the many striking evidences there how jealous God is in holiness, how he walked about mount Sinai lest sinful man should approach him how he smote 50,000 in Bethshemesh and for presuming to look into the holy ark. Those with leprosy seized Uzziah for intruding into the jurists office - when he reads the appalling history of the angels who swept away the first estate and especially when he looks beyond the symbols displayed before him at the Lord's Supper and sees the Son of God abandoned to the frenzy of his enemies and feeling the shafts of divine vengeance in his soul in Gethsemane and on the cross - and all to render it consistent for the holiness of God to extend to man the offers of pardon and peace, then especially will the Christian have a deep and overwhelming sense of the holiness of God so as almost to be constrained to cry out with the men of Bethshemesh who can stand before this holy Lord God? And when he brings this unapproachable purity of Jehovah in comparison with the pollution of his own heart O it will sink the Christian low in the dust and he will exclaim with Job, Behold I am vile - what shall I answer thee? I will lay mine hands upon my mouth.

3. The man clothed with the righteousness of the saints will have exalted views of the character and works of Christ and this is essential to a readiness to partake of his supper.

There is such a thing as a man's having so deep a sense of his sinfulness as to feel that no ordinary effort - nay as if no created being could atone for his sins. But it must be him who thought it not robbery to be equal with God - or the sacrifice would not in the view of such a person be adequate for his redemption. It is indeed the vicarious sacrifice of Christ that forms the foundation of the believers hope and when he looks at the holiness and justice of God which spared not the angels that kept not their first estate when he looked at the wide deep rooted and universal result of mankind from their Maker when he looks into his own own polluted heart and sees what a stubborn mass of resistance to God is there lodged - when he looks at all the preparation of ages by prefiguring sacrifices and oblations - priests and prophets among the Jews all pointing to the expiatory offering of the Saviour - when he looks to the birth and life of that Saviour and sees him in Gethsemane and on the cross he cannot be tempted to form low ideas of the works of redemption. He cannot but believe that Christ was really a substitute for man being worded for his transgressions and bruised for his iniquities. Nor will he be left for a moment to suppose that all this preparatory work - this splendid prelude and his intense and unheard of sufferings was merely for the purpose of proving the missions of the Saviour to have been from God. He cannot believe that he who in the beginning was with God and was God who is over all God blessed forever and who thought it not robbery to be equal with God should have been made in the form of a servant and become obedient unto death even the death of the cross merely to tell man that there is another world and to give him a more correct system of morality. And his own experience testifies with overwhelming power that there must have been an atonement made for our sins or we should never be saved. For when brought to see himself a sinner or no thought could sooth his distress but the declarations of scripture that Christ had died for his sins and made a propitiation for them. Nothing else could slay the enmity of his heart but the cross of Christ. To give up this doctrine therefore he must give up all his hopes since here they are founded. And when he comes to the table emblematical of this atonement he cannot help having his views of the works and character of that Saviour exalted. Were he disposed to doubt on the subject let him ascend to the gate of heaven in there listing he will hear a voice from the throne of the Eternal - let all the angels of God worship him. Again let him listen and he will hear ten thousand times ten thousands and thousands of thousands of voices joining in the new song. Thou art worthy to take the books and open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by the blood out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation. Worthy the is the Lamb that was slain and received power and riches and wisdom and strength and honor and glory and blessing. He will hear every creature which is in heaven and on earth and under the earth and such as are in the sea and all that are in them saying blessing and honor and glory and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb forever and ever. These songs of worship to the Lamb must the Christian hear on earth or he can never repeat them in heaven.

A forth thing essential a readiness for meeting the Lord Jesus Christ at his table is a spirit of humility penitence and prayer.

The proper place for sinners is in the dust. We are all sinners and therefore it becomes us when about to come to this solemn ordinance to take the place of the humble and contrite publican crying God be merciful to me a sinner. A sense of our sins before we professed religion and especially a sense of our transgressions since that period may well cause us to feel less than the least of all the saints and to draw forth from our eyes the tears of penitence. Prayer too is essential for without prayer we can have no communion with our Saviour and if we have no communion we are strangers to him and if strangers we deserve no place among his friends at his table. The man who spends most time on his business in the valley of humiliation and penitence and who therefore feels most unworthy is really the most worthy of communicants.

A fifth thing essential to a readiness to come to the Lord's supper consists in strong resolutions of amendment.

Amendment in prayers - amendment in self-examination and reading the scriptures in efforts to promote the cause of Christ in our various relative duties and in regard to our selfishness. No man who is a Christian can look a moment at his past life without feeling his need of such reformatations and no man can celebrate the Lord's supper as he ought without performing them with a firm determination not to suffer them to be broken. To confess our faults at the communion and yet make no reformatations the only adding sin to sin. We must come from that table resolving to take up the cross and actually take it up already or we have eaten and drunk unworthily.

In the sixth place the Spirit of brotherly love and active benevolence towards mankind constitute another part of the readiness for meeting Christ at his communion table.

My brethren what think ye will be the feelings of the communicants towards one another at the Lord's table in heaven? Nothing but unmingled love will reign in their bosoms. They will literally love their neighbor as themselves. What then ought to be the feelings of those who surround the table of Christ on earth preparatory to his final marriage supper. A new commandment says John I give unto you that ye love one another. Yes my brethren and if we ever mean to sit down at the marriage supper of the Lamb in heaven we must love one another here. Let all bitterness and wrath and anger and clamor and evil speaking be put away from you with all malice and be ye kind to one another tender hearted, forgiving one another even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you. If thou bring thy gift, etc.

And what is the employment of the inhabitants of heaven? Are they not all ministering spirits sent forth to minister to them who shall be heirs of salvation? And shall not Christians who expect soon to go and join these holy beings in acts of beneficence begin the work on earth. Shall they continue to live in selfishness all their days and at death become all at once filled with universal benevolence? No my brethren in and we must begin to do good here if we mean to be employed in the blessed work in heaven. We must regard our time our talents and our property as not our own but as due to our fellow men. How ashamed ought we to be if we presume without having given our time talents or money in the cause of benevolence to come and take our seat at the table of that Saviour who laid down his life for us!

A seventh important requisite for a readiness to approach the Lord's table is a tender and earnest desire for the salvation of the impenitent.

More than seven eighths of mankind even in those places where the Gospel is preached never approach and we have reason to suppose none of them ever wish to approach the Lord's table. And how sad and affecting spectacle to see more than half of the congregation go away indifferent to the kindest of all invitations to come and take up the waters of life without money and without price. How distressing to see the precious blood of the best of Saviours go neglected even perhaps by those who are bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. And how awful to be found to the conclusion by their lives that the greatest part of them will never sit down to the marriage supper of the Lamb in heaven! The communicant who partakes worthily cannot avoid this overwhelming view as he sees so many depart from the sacred feast and he must feel a spirit of earnest prayer that God would have mercy upon their souls.

The eighth essential of a readiness to partake of the Lord's supper is an earnest desire to live more to the glory of God.

This is the employment of saints and angels in heaven and constitutes their chief happiness. The promotion of that glory is the chief end for which we were created and just so far as that is promoted will happiness be increased and just so far as it is neglected will misery prevail. But the Christian will have cause to weep over the broken elements of Christ's body when he recollects how selfish he has been and how little he has done for God. His desires cannot therefore be prevented from going up to heaven that in future he may be enabled whether he eat or drink or whatever he does to do all to the glory of God.

The last essential of a readiness to partake of the Lord's supper is an earnest hungering and thirsting after righteousness.

The table of Christ is the place for being filled with the manna of heaven the bread of life and the water of life. There too if the Christian if he be in a proper frame of mind will feel most his leanness and poverty and have his appetite for holiness the most voracious. He feels as if he must be more like God - as if he could not be denied a greater share of holiness. And if such feelings really possess the soul around the communion board they will rise in fervent ejaculations to heaven. And we have the assurance of the Saviour that such prayers always find audience and will bring down and answer. Blessed are they that come and thirst after righteousness for they shall be filled.

Such are the essentials of a preparation of heart to receive in a proper way the emblems of the Saviour's love at his table. And you have probably my brethren decided as I went along whether you possessed them. It is not difficult to determine if we will be faithful whether we have a deep sense of our lost condition by nature. Whether we have an exalted view of the character of God and of the character and work of the Saviour and a spirit of deep humility penitence and prayer and whatever we feel within no strong resolution of amendment and a feeling of brotherly love and a spirit of active benevolence and tender earnest desire for the salvation of the impenitent and an earnest desire to live more to the glory of God and eager hungerings and thirstings after righteousness. If in any of these things we feel ourselves deficient permit me to press upon your consciences and my own two motives to an immediate preparation for the Lord's supper lest we this day eat and drink damnation to ourselves.

1. If we are not prepared for the supper of Christ on earth we shall never be prepared for his marriage supper in heaven. The mere mention of this motive is enough to excite solemn apprehension within us lest we shall finally be of that disappointed number who shall cry Lord Lord open up unto us and he shall answer I remember you depart from me ye workers of iniquity. And it ought to stir us up to immediate repentance.

2. Consider brethren the acute ingratitude of neglecting a preparation for meeting our Saviour at his table.

Let me illustrate this by a parable. A certain powerful prince was at the head of an extensive empire which he governed by the wisest and most equitable laws so that his subjects rejoiced in his government and loved and revered his character. At length however an individual a poor ignorant man in a remote part of the empire revolted from him took up arms and obstinately persisted in his rebellion and slew several ambassadors sent to him. The subjects of this Prince expected ere long to see the rebel made an example to justice: but to their surprise the Prince sent his only son to carry to him proposals of reconciliation. This son after being long abused and wounded by the traitor at length succeeded by his patience and kindness in subduing his heart and winning his love and he returned joyfully to the allegiance of the prince and his sons promised to plead for his life. They also bestowed upon the poor man a fortune so large as to satisfy his most craving desires and he had the honor of being called an adopted son of the Prince. Every year afterward the Son of the Prince used to make the poor man a visit always at such times loading him with some new favour. For a time the poor man was delighted with such visits and wanted to make every preparation for seeing him in his powers. But after a few years although the son continued visits the poor man treated him with the greatest neglect appearing before him in the most slovenly dress manifesting no gratitude for his renewed favours. And what base ingratitude my hearers did he manifest?

And how much baser ingratitude my brethren do we manifest when we treat the visits of the Son of God in this same way! Every one of us were like rebels against the merciful government of God and it was only through the mission sufferings death and intercessions of this favour that we can be restored to the power and love of God. And if we are Christians he has reconciled us and made us heirs to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away. And he briefly continues his visits of mercy to us at short intervals inviting us to his table and loading us with heavenly gifts. And now after all this for us to make no preparation to meet him - how black is the ingratitude how vile the disposition!

The ox knoweth his owner and the ass his master's crib but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider. O tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Ashkelon.

Sermon 136 Family Government

[Sermon No. 136, "Family Government," Psalm 133, 1822 Oct,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 8]

Psalms 133

*Behold now good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!
It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard: that went down to the skirts of his garment; As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion:
for there the Lord commanded the blessing even life forevermore.*

It would indeed be an interesting spectacle could we see the whole human family who are the children of the same first parents partakers of a common nature and traveling together on the same road to eternity. It would be a transcendently beautiful spectacle could angels look down from heaven and behold all these dwelling together in unity - laying aside the weapons of war and forgetting the reproach of the tongue and feeling towards one another the affection and tenderness of those ought to feel who are linked together by the peculiar relationship of father and mother - brother and sister. The Psalmist doubtless had a special reference to the union that then so happily subsisted between the tribes of Israel - but the expressions are general and alike true of the unity between mankind at large - or between the members of the particular states or societies - or towns or neighborhoods or families. I am at liberty therefore to apply it to any of these and shall at this time consider how good and how pleasant it is for the members of a family to dwell together in unity. In other words my object at this time is to give a general description of a well regulated family. And I shall consider

1. Their conduct and feelings toward one another
2. Their contact and feelings toward others
3. Their conduct and feelings toward God.

1. Their conduct and feelings toward one another.

The parents of such a family being the head of it and sustaining the most responsible station first claim attention. And here let it be remarked that them the harmony and good regulation of a family will greatly depend upon the manner in which the parents conduct towards one another. God himself has condescended to give the most explicit rules to regulate their conduct. Let every one of you in particular says the apostle so love his wife even as himself; and the wife see that she reverence her husband. Let the husband render unto the wife due benevolence and likewise also the wife unto the husband. Husbands love your wives and be not bitter against them. All bitterness between those so nearly related all unkind words or looks or feelings are the death of all good order and harmony and peace in the family. Let children or domestics be accustomed to hear the heads of families contending and depend upon it all their respect is at once at an end and the like discord will spring up among them. There should never - we repeat - there should never be harsh and unkind word uttered by a man against his wife or by the wife against her husband. In the former case it is brutality - in the latter it is insufferable petulance. Husband and wife most certainly should strive for one another's peace and happiness here and hereafter. If they live together in that unity which is so good and pleasant they will endeavour to comfort one another in times of affliction and to sympathize together in trials. They will manifest by mutual enquiries an anxious interest in each other's welfare especially in the welfare of their souls.

These parents will also mutually unite in exertions to maintain family government. Without the maintenance of order and subordination among the children and domestics all will be confusion and discord. They will begin to govern their children from the first moments of their childhood in which they are capable of obeying and not delay the works till they will have become stubborn and they will listen to no admonitions. It is of the greatest importance that we begin this work in season and make it a thorough work at first: otherwise we shall find that all after exertions will be in vain. Chasten thy son while there is hope and let not thy soul spare for his crying. He that spareth his rod hateth his son but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes.

But mere correction is but a very small part of family government. Besides this there is advice, commendation whenever deserved, blame reproof rebuke admonition expostulation restraint, confinement, rewards, the deprivation of their enjoyments, the infliction of disgrace the denial of favours, etc. And in all these various modes of procuring obedience will the faithful parent be constant and persevering. He will not today set up his authority and compel his children with tyrannical severity to submit to them: and tomorrow let loose the reins and leave his children uncontrolled. The parent who governs well his own house will also be uniformly kind in that government. Whenever compelled to correct he will do it in such a calm conscientious manner that the child cannot doubt he is compelled to it out of a sense of duty. All appearance of anger will be entirely out of sight and indeed all feeling of anger. And should the evil conduct of his children excite for a moment his irrational feelings like the philosopher of old rather than apply the rod under such a state of mind he will say, I would punish you were I not angry. In short that is the best kind of family government in which the child is forever to obey his parents because he loves them too well to disobey them.

Such parents will also endeavor to explain to their children and domestics the reasonableness and equity of their commands. They will not desire to be tyrants over them nor to exercise any act of authority for which they are not ready to assign a reason and therefore knowing their children to be reasonable beings they will endeavour to exhibit to their understandings the grounds of their conduct.

In the regulation of their family in these several modes will those parents who are faithful to their trust be diligent constant and persevering. They will establish certain rules for all their household to be observed constantly without a reasonable excuse. They will have certain hours for the various family duties in which all unite and although not unreasonably rigid in their requirements yet they will be firm in demanding obedience and in punishing disobedience.

On the other hand the children of a well regulated family will be uniformly subject to their parents. The will of their father and mother they will regard and ought to regard as their law. They are themselves altogether unfit judges in regard to what they ought to be indulging in and what they ought to be restrained in. Children obey your parents in all things for this is well pleasing unto the Lord. Cursed be he that setteth light by his father or his mother. They will regard their parents with respect reverence and love at all times - even when restrained by them from indulgence in those things for which they have an ardent desire realizing that the superior experience and judgment of their parents is better able than they are to determine what will be injurious to them. In their words and actions both at home and abroad they will honor their father and mother and treat them with the utmost affection and respect. To their commands they will be always ready to submit both when they are present and when they are absent with cheerfulness and readiness well ensuring that all other obedience is abominable in the sight of God. So deep will be their sense of the obligation they are under to their parents that the pain of disobeying them would be greater than the most trying self denial. Feeling obligations they will endeavour to do all in their power to promote the happiness of their parents. And they well know that their amiable and virtuous conduct will be the most effectual method in which this can be done. When their parents are distressed they will be distressed and endeavour to sympathize with them. If they have by misconduct wounded the feelings of their father and mother they will weep over their ingratitude and humbly implore their forgiveness.

And finally all the members of the family we are describing will be constantly endeavouring to improve themselves and one another in knowledge and virtue. Industry will be manifest in all their conduct. When not necessarily employed in laborious manual pursuits they will resort to books whereby they may improve their hearts and minds. The long evenings of winter which those who are poorly brought up usually spend in idleness or in unprofitable conversation will be spent this family in such a manner that they can give some account of them without blushing. The father and the mother will endeavor to instruct their children also by conversation at every favorable opportunity and the children will also endeavor to improve one another in the same way: not by conversing upon the faults of their neighbors or the trifling concerns of the world around them but upon subjects of importance. Especially will religion occupy a conspicuous place: and by the free and easy yet reverential manner in which this subject is treated in such a family a stranger is at once led to conclude that it is a frequent topic in their conversation. The husband often converses with the wife and the wife with the husband - the parents with their children and the children will one another concerning the state of their own hearts in relation to God and if anyone is destitute of religion the others will frequently state to him plainly and affectionately his danger. And if anyone is guilty of doing wrong the others are not backward to give him gentle reproof. In short it is evident to a stranger that such a family is well-regulated and that the members of it love one another with a pure affection and are doing all in their power to promote each other's temporal and eternal welfare.

But their concern and kind efforts do not cease here. For in the second place they feel for their brethren in the world around them and endeavour to do them good. The children are taught to suspect others and treat all men politely and kindly. The parents never set the example before their household of slandering their neighbor nor of retelling their faults and infirmities. They learn their children to treat the reputations of others with tenderness and to censure others for nothing but manifest corruption. They teach them to take a lively interest in the suffering and the welfare of others so that the pleading voice of misfortune and distress never addresses them in vain. The stranger finds under their roof a welcome and a kind retreat and all the members of the family are interested to make him happy. All members of it are taught to do unto others in all things as they would they should do unto them and to harbor no resentful or inimical feelings towards any one of the human family. They are taught to esteem others better than themselves and to feel that they are created not merely for themselves not for gratifying their own desires but also for the good of others whose welfare they are bound to consult.

In the third place I am to consider the conduct and feelings of such a family towards God.

The grand secret of the order and unity of this family consists in the parents resolving and persevering in the resolution that as for them and their house they will serve the Lord. They feel that they were immortal beings into whose care other immortal beings are committed and that ere long they must exhibit an account to God of the manner they have executed their trust. They resolved therefore that they would bring up their children for God and that they would resolutely deny them all those gratifications that would be inconsistent with a strictly religious education. Early therefore did they begin even with the first dawning of the infant intellect, to instruct into their minds the great principles of religion. By every method in their power they endeavoured to instruct them concerning the character of God and the plan of salvation by a Redeemer. Early did they begin to pray that these instructions might take root and spring up and bear fruit. From the day in which their children opened their eyes on this world they were accustomed to assemble morning and evening around the family altar and soon as they knew the meaning of the service were they taught to lift up their hearts to God along with their voices. And when the evening bell admonished them that hour of sleep was come they were instructed never to be absent from their Father's house and irregular hours and omissions of family prayer would not be tolerated. And it is these morning and evening prayers my hearers that contribute more than anything else to the good government of a family. If they do not prove the means of the conversion of all the members of the family yet they produce in all habits of regularity and there is an awe and a reverence inseparable from them which operates as a restraint upon every member of it during the day. And how dare any man who is going soon as all of us are to be judged for the manner in which he brings up his family how dare he how can he neglect this morning and evening sacrifice. How dreadful is the example before his household. Let him be ever so faithful in the instruction of his children yet this duty being neglected his words will seem to them mere idle tales which he primarily does not believe! No matter what other things they are taught if they are not taught to pray.

But some one will say I have no confidence to engage in this service. I am only to answer in the language of inspiration. I would that men pray every where lifting up holy hands. Another may reply I have no reason to think I am converted and the sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord. Again I answer in the name and by the authority of Jehovah - I would etc.

But to return – The children and domestics of the household we are describing are taught to pray not only in the family but also in secret. They are thus made to feel their dependance on God and they are constantly instructed that it is their duty to consecrate themselves entirely to the Lord in body and spirit as their reasonable service. And although all the members may not be actually be born of God yet all have by these various means acquired such a reverence for God and religion and such a habit of essential duty that it may be said of them - they are not far from the kingdom of heaven.

And my hearers how beautifully does the text describe such a family as this! (Repeat it) Yes on such a family the blessing of God will rest. The parents should go and they have the promise of God that when they are old they will not depart. Nay they have a promise [????] the grave. The blessing provided is not temporal it is eternal it is life forever.

And are we my hearers bringing up families in this manner? If not there is awful reason to fear that the prayer of Jeremiah that God would pour out his fury on the families that call not on his name will be answered on our heads. If the picture that has been attempted to be drawn of a family that dwell together in unity will not move us to imitate it then there is another picture which may be presented before us. It is the picture of you and me heads of families, it is the picture of you and me with our children and household standing up at yonder judgment.

I have only touched this morning my hearers upon the limits of an important subject. I have however been purposely brief in my remarks that I might have an opportunity to exhibit to you a continuation of the subject as it is presented by the General Association of Connecticut in the last Pastoral Address to the churches. I could have incorporated it with this discourse putting it into my own language: but I found the force of it would be weakened and therefore present it in its original form. God permit it may sink deep into our consciences.

Sermon 139 Coincidence Between Natural Theology and Christianity in Regard to the Fallen State of Man

[Sermon No. 139, "Coincidence Between Natural Theology and Christianity in Regard to the Fallen State of Man," Romans, 1822 Dec, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 8]

Romans 1:18,19 and 20

*For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men who hold the truth in unrighteousness. Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them.
For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made even his eternal power and godhead: so that they are without excuse.*

The sacred writers often direct our attention to the works of creation and providence to prove or enforce the truths of revealed religion. Indeed were we to accustom ourselves to look on the objects with which we are surrounded and contemplate the ordinary events passing before us with a reference to God or religion we should find them full of instruction. All men are sensible it is true that the being and attributes of God are demonstrable from his works. But there are other truths taught in the creation and in providence which many are apt to overlook. The analogy between natural and revealed religion does not terminate with the mere existence of God: but extends also to other important truths and were we able to look far enough no doubt this analogy would be found to reach to every doctrine and every precept of Christianity. As every instance of such coincidence corroborates the faith of the Christian in the divinity of the scriptures and furnishes profitable matter for meditation I shall direct your attention at this time my hearers to the illustration of an important truth revelation from the works of creation and Providence. It is the declaration of scripture that man is in a fallen state - that is he is a sinner exposed to punishment and yet not beyond the reach of mercy. And this same truth is taught by the constitution of the globe we inhabit and by the situation of man upon it. The proposition I shall endeavor to establish from a consideration of creation in providence is that man is placed in a situation partly penal and partly merciful - that is a state in which there is enough of disorder and misery to evince that it is not utterly excluded from mercy and may be restored to the favour of God - in other words is a state in which there are instances enough of good conduct being rewarded to show that God will have mercy on the penitent. To the illustration of this position I now invite your attention.

This illustration I shall derive -

1. From the state of the external part of the earth and circumstances connected with its surface.
2. From circumstances connected with the structure and nature of the human frame.
3. From a consideration of the faculties of the mind.
4. From facts in common life.

But in this place it is proper to remark that the text evidently implies the truth we have laid down. It represents the gentile world as without excuse for being ignorant of the existence and character of the one and only living and true God. It represents the wrath of God to be revealed from heaven against all unrighteousness and ungodliness of men even to the heathen who had never heard of the scriptures and therefore must have learnt the lesson from the creation and providence of God as explained and reinforced by the voice of conscience and reason. Because says the apostle that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shown it unto them. For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen being understood by the things that are made even his eternal power and godhead.

I now proceed to consider the conditions of the exterior crust of the earth and some circumstances connected with its surface.

Whenever the globe we inhabit has been penetrated a little below its surface we find, amid evidences of the original order and regularity, other proofs of disorder and convulsion. In one place the deep cavern opens its mouth - in another mountain is rent from mountain - in another rocks are piled upon one another in wild confusion forming the overhanging and dizzy precipice - in another immense mountains of rocks are separated in their midst one part sunk and the other raised many a fathom. In one place we find imbedded in solid rock sea shells and sea animals and in another land animals. Even on the highest mountains do these phenomena occur thus evincing that the ocean once flowed over the loftiest hills. Again we find every where immense blocks of stone scattered over the surface and mixed without order with the soil. Indeed we every where meet with evidences of violent convulsions in former days - by which the earth has been materially changed in its aspect and constitution.

Now if we compare this state of the globe with other works of God with which we are conversant we perceive a striking difference. In every thing else we find an undisturbed and uniform harmony in their construction. Why is this so wanting in the case of the earth? It surely indicates that the present state of the crust of the globe is not the original one but that it has been changed by some catastrophes in former years: and it is a tradition found among all nations from the polished Greeks and Romans to the barbarians of the islands of the Pacific that these catastrophes were the result of the displeasure of God manifested against the wickedness of man. Indeed the violence which the earth everywhere appears to have suffered certainly looks like something penal. And since man is the only accountable being inhabiting it man must have been the transgressor.

The argument my hearers is simply this. A world which was intended to be the residence of a race of perfectly holy innocent and happy beings would not be one bearing so many marks of convulsion and disorder - that is it is not consistent with our ideas of the benevolence of God to suppose he would place them in such a world. And the argument may be extended with even more force to other circumstances connected with the surface of the earth.

I have exhibited to you on a former occasion the ravages made by volcanoes and earthquakes. By these thousands and even millions of human beings have been suddenly swept from existence being overwhelmed by the burning torrent or swallowed up in the opening gulph without any warning or possibility of escape. And this surely looks like something penal in the conduct of the Deity and not like what we should suppose would be his treatment of beings who had never offended. Not that those who have been thus destroyed were sinners above all the others nor that God selected them for punishment because they are worse than others as he did the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah but simply that they like all other men were sinners and exposed to the Divine Indignation.

When we cast our eyes over the map of the history of the globe we perceive that a great proportion of its surface is uninhabitable. On the one hand are immense regions buried in broken ice and on the other extensive tracts buried in sand or covered by rocks and morasses and thus rendered incapable of culture. Now although there may be important appropriate uses to which such regions are applicable under the present economy of the globe yet their existence is hardly reconcilable with our ideas of a world adapted for the residence of beings who had never fallen from their original condition of holiness and happiness. Very different is the actual state of the world from that Paradise we should picture to ourselves as provides for their residence by a kind and benevolent God. And very different is it from the garden of Eden the sacred scriptures actually describe. Indeed the voice of experience testifies to the curse which the scriptures declare to have been pronounced on the earth at the fall and the thorn and the thistle and still show us that we live in a revolted world.

But although there be so many evidences of convulsion and disorder on the surface of the globe and though the volcanoes and earthquakes testify in their ravages that man is a sinner and that God will by no means clear the guilty and though the curse of barrenness and desolation rest on so large a portion of the earth yet still there is enough order in the construction of its exterior part to show that God stayed his thunders in mid volley and did not intend these catastrophes whatever they were to be the final one. There is enough of security from the volcanoes and earthquakes to excite our confidence in the mercy of God and our gratitude for his favors. There is enough of fertility and convenience in many parts of the earth to sustain the heart against despair of the divine forgiveness - enough to teach us how long suffering and gracious God is.

2. I proceed to consider certain circumstances connected with the structure and nature of the human frame.

Man in his infancy and old age is the most helpless and exposed of all animals. Naked and unarmed he comes into the world requiring daily supplies of nourishment without any means of processing it liable to be assaulted by the wild beasts and incapable of resisting them or escaping by flight and exposed to destruction from the elements. Susceptible of powerful impressions from them and unable long to resist the heat of summer on the one hand or the cold of winter on the other without the modifying care of parental affection and superintendence. Were he placed in a paradise where everything was gentle and no extremes of heat and cold with no wild beast to devour and with a spontaneous superabundance poured forth from the lap of the earth were he in such a state such a frame might be adapted for his comfort and happiness. But in the present state of things a constitution so feeble and exposed indicates man to have lapsed from an original state of security and happiness and to be labouring under the displeasure of an offended God. Yet when we consider how well calculated this very feebleness and exposure are to lead man to feel his dependance on God and to put his trust in an Almighty arm - how these things tend to prepare his mind for the reception of the security Christianity provides by the death of the Saviour we are constrained also to acknowledge that this peculiar structure of the human frame is an indication of a merciful intention on the part of God towards the race.

Look also my hearers for a moment at the exposure of the human frame in its present condition to the attacks of disease and pain. The mere existence of these would not indeed prove that they were not an original appointment of the Creator. They might be necessary to remind us how great is the blessing of health and ease but there are numerous instances in which individuals are subjected to pain and disease every day and every hour of their existence from the cradle to the grave. And does this look like a state of original innocence and peace - like the state we should suppose man would be placed in by a merciful God? Consider too the uncertainty of health - how like the vapours that appeareth for a little while it may soon vanish away and the violence with which disease often fastens upon the unsuspecting victim - not infrequently the tender infant filling it with torture and agony inexpressible. Consider the parental agonies by which man is first introduced into resistance and the limb fractured in the by some untoward accident or the fury of man or vile beasts and surely we discern in all this something of a penal character - some indication that man is in a fallen state.

The necessity of animal food also instructs us in the same lesson. There is something altogether repugnant to our notions of a paradise and the idea that men should be compelled to dip his hands in blood in order to take support of his body. And we find accordingly that man while innocent in Eden had given unto him every herb bearing seeds which is upon the face of all the earth and every tree in which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed: but no grant was given him to partake of animal food until his fall - When every moving that liveth has to be meat for him.

Among the greater evils with which mankind have been afflicted for thousands of years none is more tremendous than war. And none declares to us in plainer language that man has lost the image of his Maker and that those barbarous passions which subject his body and soul to their dominion and flow out into dreadful acts of deliberate and systematic murder must be very different from what they were in a state of holiness and innocence. The permission this scourge has to desolate the earth and to make whole countries a vast Golgotha tells us in language not to be mistaken that man has departed from his original purity and has become deeply corrupted in his heart and blinded in his understanding.

The occurrence of death too in its countless and frightful modes of accident disease famine and the sword - show us that there lies upon us a curse from the Almighty because we are sinners. It then comes upon the new born infant in all its dreadful aggravations - and if man lay not under the displeasure of his Maker it would be difficult to reconcile the melancholy fact with the character of God. In exact coincidence revelation testifies to the fact that by one man sin entered into the world, etc.

3. I proceed to consider certain circumstances connected with the human mind.

In all nations of the earth it has ever been found necessary to establish and maintain civil government and to enact numerous laws binding on every individual and society. And why? Plainly to restrain men from the commission of wickedness. Take away these restraints and men would become mutual robbers and defrauders and enemies and petty wars would spring up between neighbor and neighbor and society would become a chaos of bloodshed and misery. All this has been exhibited in the history of many a nation and what is proved by it? Certainly that man is corrupt - that he has corrupted himself - and that evil is the element of his character. It shows the human faculties to be under the dominion of sin - and that a deep rooted depravity lurks within his bosom which demands all the restraints of government and education and good example to prevent its bursting forth into a frightful inundation upon society. And surely it shows too that man has fallen from a state of purity and holiness. For it is irreconcilable with our ideas of God to suppose that such a nature as we find man to possess to have been originally implanted in them by that God whose character we learn from the scriptures is to be supremely benevolent and opposed to sin.

Get in the midst of this wide spread and deep rooted corruption we find some instances of reformation. The drunkard the spendthrift the extortioner the robber and the thief do sometimes cease to be such and become sober members of society and this fact leads the student of natural theology to indulge a hope that God may work a radical change in the character of men and thus restore them to the holiness from which they have fallen.

The intellectual powers of man evince his noble origin and high destiny - but at the same time they appear notwithstanding all that has been done by learning in the world these faculties appear like a lofty edifice in ruins. The most intense application of mind does not always secure the possession of the on thee knowledge we need – nor the most acute discernment arrive at any thing like certainty in its results nor investigation always discover to bring any thing but the hopeless condition of himself. There is a feebleness a cloudiness an imperfection resting on the highest achievements of man producing a painful uncertainty in regard to every object of research.

*What is it to be wise the poet asks?
Tis but to know how little can be known
The poet answers - and the virtuous soul
Now deep sources of knowledge it has drank
With cordial feeling will respond - amen
For ah! how weak at best is human intellect
How many bars impede its every step
How with corporal grossness mind is clogged!
Long it must struggle up the slippery steeps
Of science ere it gain a resting place
Where clouds and darkness do not hide its view
And then perhaps the wearied body fails
And leaves the fattened mind unnerved unstrung.*

But all this retardation uncertainty and weakness my hearers we have every reason to conclude would not exist in a paradise. The conclusion then once more returns upon us that man is fallen and that his understanding is darkened and that the glory has fallen from his brow. But still amid the ruins his intellectual faculties are a germ that may one day rise and bloom in eternal vigor and beauty in the garden of God.

4. I proceed to consider certain facts in common life in relation to our subject.

Nearly all men in order to obtain subsistence are compelled to submit to labour either of body or mind - usually of both. And this simple fact without any explanations might not be regarded as inconsistent with a state of holiness innocence and happiness. Indeed we know that to till the ground was the pointed business of Adam and Eden. And it doubtless would in many ways contribute under given circumstances to the happiness of holy beings. What then are the circumstances attaining human labour in the present state of the world? It usually contributes to health but often men are compelled to submit to it so intensely that it has the contrary effect and impairs the constitution and brings on premature death. We are often forced to labour not merely to set in motion the system but to continue it when that system is exhausted and the labour becomes painful and distressing. The alternative often lies between the actual starvation of ourselves and families or labouring when we are altogether unfit for the effort. And besides we are liable to be utterly disappointed in the results of our exertions. The fire the flood or the unpropitious season may render abortive the most laborious industry and we may thus be left in distress and be compelled to rely on the charity of our neighbours. The manufacturer and the merchant also are subject to the same precariousness in the results of their efforts to support themselves and families and sometimes they fall victims to their possessions. And thus it is that labour becomes a toil instead of a pleasure a curse instead of a blessing. How exactly does this accord with the sentence revelation declares to have been pronounced upon many at the fall. Cursed is the ground for thy sake. Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee. In sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread.

But on the other hand when we reconsider how happiness results to man from the necessity of laborious exertion - how notwithstanding all failures the earth produces enough to supply in general the necessities and often minister to the conveniences and luxuries of her inhabitants and how sure the industrious farmer or manufacturer a merchant is of a competence we cannot but acknowledge that amid all the evidences that God's displeasure is manifested against sin there also beam forth indications and teachings that his mercy is not clearing out forever but that there is still pardon for rebellious man.

I have but just touched my hearers upon the limits of an interesting and extensive subject. Should any of you wish to pursue it farther I would refer you to a volume entitled "The Testimony of Natural Theology to Christianity." My principal object has been to furnish matter in the objects of creation around you and in the ordinary occurrences of life for profitable meditation. I have shown you that the very earth we tread upon - and the structure of the human body and of the human mind and the ordinary concerns of life all unite with revelation in testifying that this is a fallen and a sinful world lying under the penal curse of God yet not wholly abandoned by him but in a state of mercy. Let the faith of the believer in the truth of revelation be strengthened by this wonderful coincidence between the voice of nature and the voice of scripture. Let the man disposed to doubt the truth of scripture account if he can for this striking analogy. And if he cannot let him acknowledge that all scripture is given by inspiration of God and contains the words of eternal life.

And what a view my hearers does the subject exhibit to us of the evil of sin!

The crust of the earth we find to have been convulsed and thrown into tumultuous disorder - and when we look back into history for the cause the traditions of all nations and the records of holy writ tell us it was the sin of man - which provoked the wrath of God. Yes, my hearers, the very rocks have been rent asunder and dislocated at the sin of man - and shall we be less sensible than the rocks? The weakness and distress to which our bodies are subject - every pain we feel - every sign we draw every calamity we meet - the dogs that obstruct the free range of our intellect - the wars and fighting in the earth - the necessary restraints of civil government - our disappointments and trials and hard labours in our several callings - these and a thousand other occurrence are striking and ever present mementos of the ravages of sin. And shall we encompassed by such a cloud of witnesses remain insensible to its effects? God forbid that we should be unaffected by that which has thrown this world into confusion and filled it with weeping and wailing and blood.

And if we are in this fallen state my hearers and if there is a plan of rescue proposed shall we sit unconcerned under the curse and make no efforts to escape it. It is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptance that Jesus Christ came into the same sinners and God is now reconciling the world through Him unto himself. Let us not remain among the number who reject the offers of mercy. Let us rise and burst the chains of sin that we may be among the happy number who shall inhabit the new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness and where the disorders sin has entailed upon this miserable world will be succeeded by eternal order and perfect harmony and incomparable beauty.

Sermon 142 Inconstancy in Religion

[Sermon No. 142, "Inconstancy in Religion," Galatians 5:7, 1822 Dec,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 9]

Galatians 5:7

Ye did run well; who did hinder you that ye should not obey the truth.

[See the last 4-5 paragraphs where he seems to suggest there has been a decline in religious enthusiasm in his church.]

The Galatians entered upon the Christian course with alacrity and resolution and seemed to promise much fruit. Paul testifies of them that if it had been possible they would have plucked out their own eyes and given them to him. But during his absence false teachers had come among them and indeed many to reject the doctrine of justification through the merit of Christ alone without works. And when Paul addressed to them his Epistle he tells them in the very beginning, I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another Gospel. They had exhibited a melancholy instance of that fickleness of mind that disposition to follow new doctrines and new teachers of which the history of man presents us so many examples. For the Galatians are not alone in this want of stability and consistency in religion. Many a Christian like Paul has had occasion to mourn over the irregularity and inconsistency in the conduct and feelings of many whom they supposed to be real children of God.

The text then contains a censure of inconstancy in religion. In dwelling upon it I propose to direct your attention

1. To Some marks of inconstancy, and
2. To the consequences of inconstancy in religion.

Marks of 1. inconstancy in regard to religion.

This inconstancy may be exhibited both in regard to the belief and the practice of religion. Men ought always to be open to conviction in regard to every subject and especially in regard to one so important as the welfare of their souls and the character and will of God. But at the same time these things are very clearly revealed in the scripture and he who studies the word of God with prayer will certainly be directed into the belief of the grand fundamentals of the Gospel: and if after a man has done this he frequently is observed to change his views fundamentally – to go from one denomination to another and to be equally zealous for the peculiarities of them all as he successively embraces them we may conclude that he is one of those who are described by Paul as carried about by every wind of doctrine. There is such a thing as being rooted and built up in Christ and established in the faith and the man who is in this condition is not to be easily moved from his belief. When a man of contrary opinions reasons with him out of scriptures to correct him to a different creed the texts of scripture he produces are those which this man has deliberated upon many a time and prayed over them with fervency to be guided into the truth. But the man who is unstable took up with his opinions suddenly and without much prayer over the scriptures and although he may be very zealous in his sentiments for a time yet he cannot stand the trial of his creed because although it may be correct he has not taken the proper measures to form it originally. The firm Christian digs deep and places his foundations sure and though the floods come and the winds blow and beat upon the edifice it stands firm because it is founded on a rock even on the bible. But the man of a fickle changeable character builds on the sand and he is in danger of being spoiled through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ and he is apt to be carried about by every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness whereby they lie in wait to deceive.

And here it may be proper to remark that men who are unstable as water in regard to their sentiments in religion usually manifest more zeal in defense of the various doctrines they embrace than men who abide unmoved by the same faith. This year you will hear them eagerly maintaining those very points which the next year they will zealously oppose. And as they enlist under the banners of different sects they will denounce as fundamentally erroneous all others not excluding even the denomination which in a few months they will join. Now what does this singular fact teach us? It shows that such men are governed by their imagination or feelings more than by the word of God. Whenever the current of feeling flows they are borne along and as it always runs furiously and is as changeable as the moon they of course are urged with equal impetuosity in opposite directions. While the established uniform Christian moves on in calm and steady flow towards the same horizon like the deep and broad waters of some mighty river - these men dash and foam and change their course like a mountain torrent.

As already remarked there is also an instability in experimental religion. Indeed this is much more common among Christians and those who endeavor to be Christians than inconstancy in the faith. There is in truth a degree of irregularity attendant upon the progress of every true Christian. All find themselves advancing much faster at one time than another. But still those who live nearest to God and are best established in their religious exercises manifest so much uniformity in their lives as to give a general consistency to their characters. Their faith is like the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. And it is the duty of all Christians to aim at a perfect consistency and uniformity of character - and the more irregular they are in their exercises and actions the farther are they from the standard of the Gospel. Yet there are very many in Christian lands and in the Christian church whose conduct and exercises this week are no evidence of what they will be next week. At one time their zeal is so ardent that they outstrip everybody else. Their prayers are more frequent in their closets - their bibles are more alluded to - they exhort sinners more - they are more constant in attendance upon the worship of God on the Sabbath and at the other times and seem to feel the worth of souls more than any of their brethren. They complain indeed of the stupidity of their brethren and earnestly exhort them to come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty. They talk too of the rich enjoyments they experience from the love of the Saviour and a stranger would suppose they never could lose the favour of that love. But let a few months pass over them and you will find them at the antipodes. Their place at the conference and prayer meeting if not in the house of God is usually vacant - sinners are no longer troubled with their exhortations - their closets are an unfrequented place - their conversation and thoughts are worldly and they cannot bear to be told of their apostasy.

A revival of religion gives alas frequent opportunities for witnessing instances of this character. Such persons may well be denominated revival Christians - for it is only at such seasons that they exhibit anything like religion. Then the general attention of those around them to the subject - the contagion of sympathetic feelings and the much that is said upon religion excite within them the kind of zeal which they fancy to be a zeal for God. But as soon as the revival goes by revert to the state in which they were before the works began and there they remain slaves to the world and slaves to sin until some five or ten years pass over them and another revival commences and they go through another exhilarating process. And fancy themselves on this account to be possessors of religion. That is they make five months of fancied religious feelings to counterbalance the evidence of five years of almost uninterrupted neglect of God and religion. But my hearers these periodical feelings – this excitement of a few months which is succeeded by years of irreligion is no sort of evidence that a man has piety in his heart. And if ever men are given up to strong delusions to believe a lie it is such. That holiness without which no man shall see the Lord – that faith which overcometh the world is a thing that abides by the Christian and follows him into all the scenes of life - operates upon him in the hour of business - goes with him when he goes abroad and returns with him to the bosom of his family follows him into his closet - lies down with him at night and rises with him in the morning. It is not a coat that may be worn one month and cast aside five years and then resumed again.

There is another mode in which inconstancy in religion manifests itself. It is that to which the text has special reference. After Paul had gone from the Galatians certain men sprang up among them and endeavoured to persuade them that it was necessary they should be circumcised or they could not be saved and many were drawn away from the simplicity there is in Christ. By turning their attention to this unimportant ceremony they lost sight of the grand fundamentals taught them by Paul and became at length convinced that this rite was essential to their salvation. And thus it has been in every age of the church. False teachers have sprung up teaching some new rite or ceremony or perplexing the minds of honest sincere Christians with some unimportant distinctions so that instead of pursuing the works of faith and labors of love and patience of hope they are led away with a blind zeal for external rights and ceremonies and go to content for shibboleths of a party instead of the faith once delivered to the saints. Nay many are induced by designing men to leave the society of their Christian brethren and become the proselytes of some other sect. And the two grand instruments by which these crafty leaders have in every age made proselytes are to represent to Christians that the reason they do not enjoy more of the comforts of religion is because they do not join their party and adopt their peculiarities and that the denomination to which they belong is labouring under persecution. And with these engines notwithstanding they have been so often used many an honest Christian is first perplexed then tempted and then drawn away to the obsequious followers of ambitious men who under the form of godliness deny the power thereof.

Another class of persons (whether they be Christians or not God knoweth) who are changeable with a most unworthy inconsistency in religion are such as commenced in earnest the work of religion: first finding it a very different thing from what they experienced and not being able to obtain certain evidence of their being born of God settle down into a state of dormant inaction and live along with just enough of religious feeling to make them miserable – whereas were they to be active in the cause of the Redeemer and resolve that they will serve God whether he saves them from this misery or not they would find hope and comfort gradually growing up in their hearts and new vigor urging them forward in the path of duty.

Still more inconsistent are those who having had their attention powerfully arrested by the Spirit of God and an awful anxiety excited within them for their souls welfare have notwithstanding resisted all these convictions and are now more careless more secure and more insensible than before. This is an inconsistency so great as to make the Christian shudder with horror for their fate. It is an inconsistency that makes even devils tremble while they rejoice at it.

2. I proceed to consider the consequences of inconstancy in religion.

And first it destroys all decision of character. Even in the affairs of this world if a man have not a steady opinion of his own he can effect but little. He will meet with so many sorts of advice that he will be left forever in doubt what course to take. Much more in religion will the want of decision neutralize all our exertions. And although the fickle minded man may have for a short time a burning zeal for the particular tenets he adopts yet in a short time he will have utterly abandoned them and such zeal so flashy and changeable does not deserve the name of decision but rather of indecision of character.

Again it usually results in universal scepticism. And why should it not? The man finds himself denying today what he firmly believed yesterday - and how can he tell but he may go on this rendition of opinion until he shall have alternately received and rejected every doctrine of the Gospel. Under such circumstances he suffers himself to reflect he will be thrown into increasing doubt concerning the whole. Unfortunately such a result has often been witnessed in the world. The prudent man foreseeth the evil and avoideth it but the simple pass on and are punished.

In the next place inconstancy in religion prevents the formation of religious habits. To get in the habit of leading a godly life is not the work of a day nor of a month nor of a year. There are always a multitude of old feelings and doings that must be eradicated and broken off and then it requires a long time to accustom ourselves to walk in a new path and to turn our affections into a new channel. But the double minded man is unstable in all his ways. Before he has travelled far in on path he becomes tired of it and seeks a new one and this also is ere long abandoned for some other course and thus at last death finds him having tried many ways of going to heaven but being after all scarcely advanced towards it (in any part of them).

But my hearers without religious habits we merely have a name to live while we are dead. If a man has not certain stated times for instance in which to pray in his family and in his closet and to read the scriptures and to examine himself and to attend public and social worship he cannot grow in grace. It will not answer to attend these things one week and neglect them the next. Uniformity regularly in religious duties is much more important than ardent zeal and intense feeling today and cold stupidity and neglect tomorrow. For example during a revival of religion you will see some persons always present at every prayer meeting conference and lecture during the week - but when the revival is gone they do not attend even one meeting of this sort during the week - and surely such persons cannot be said to have a habit of attending religious meetings. They attend them only when they are roused up to greater faithfulness in religious duty - that is when they stand least in need of them and neglect them when they begin to neglect other religious duties that is when they stand most in need of them. And the truth is brethren every Christian stands in special need of having his attention called once at least during the week to things of religion - otherwise depend upon it he will find the world to absorb so completely his religious feelings that he will derive little benefit from the worship of God on the Sabbath. Every Christian therefore ought to be in the regular habit of attending a prayer meeting or conference or lecture at least once in the week besides the Sabbath. This will be doing only one sixth as much in this way as did the first Christians: for they continued daily in the temple. And surely we are not so much better than the primitive Christians but that we need one sixth as much instruction and exhortation.

But to return another evil consequence of inconstancy in religion is that it exposes a man to become the dupe of imposture. If we have nothing fixed and settled in our religious opinions and if our practice is as irregular as our sentiments we lay ourselves open to the attacks of every ambitious person who wishes to become the leader of a party and to introduce something new. Such a man will be more zealous in making proselytes than most believers are in making Christians. And besides he will not hesitate to practice deceit and intrigue and address himself to the worst human passions - all of which the humble Christian despises. Such a man is more religious than he appears to be - but the man who is compassing sea and land to make new proselytes will put on the cloak of zeal and piety that the shame of his nakedness do not appear. And the unstable Christian will easily be duped by this fair outsider and without waiting to judge of the tree by its fruits he will become the tool of a designing unprincipled sectarian. And so easily are we all inclined to follow anything that is new that unless our minds be established in the truth if we are halting between two opinions or if we have a fickle disposition we shall be entangled in the snare. But decision of character in religion although it does not close our hearts against conviction yet it prevents us from being led astray by any thing superficial.

Another very bad consequence of inconstancy in religion is that it gives the enemies of religion occasion to triumph and confirms them in their opposition. They do not believe that there is anything real and settled in religion - and when they see a professed believer this month maintaining such and such opinions and the next month different sentiments - when they see him now practicing this or that ceremony and soon after rejecting it as untrue - when they see him today at the communal table of one denomination and next year at that of another and the second year at a third they at once conclude that there can be nothing certain in the doctrines of religion and no firm rule of practice else these persons would not thus be as unstable as the wind. And although such a man might retain all the essentials of religion and only be vacillating in regard to nonessentials yet men will not trouble themselves to make such a distinction - but confound the whole together - and condemn the whole in one sweeping sentence.

Another instance of inconstancy in religion at which impenitent men stumble (and I had almost said Christians too) is when a man after having been brought under the convicting influences of the Spirit of God so that it is publicly known that he is earnestly seeking religion and he perhaps is led for a time to suppose that he really possesses it when such an one after a few months are over reverts to their former course of sin and joins his former companions then do the enemies of religion exalt and feel strengthened in their opinion that the notion of a change of heart and of revivals of religion is all a cunningly devised fable. Yes my hearers one such instance of shameful apostasy (let those who are guilty of it listen to the awful truth) one such instance does more to prejudice men against the truth - to harden the heart and to stupify the conscience than a whole years preaching of the apostle Paul would do to the persuade men to believe the Gospel. Those guilty of such apostasy are the men against whom the ungodly point the finger of scorn and sneeringly ask are these the blessed fruits of your religion? These in fine are the persons that tie the hands of the faithful minister of Christ - that hang like a dead weight upon his efforts - that make him weak in his closet and despair of many ever being useful.

An effect little less unhappy does it produce to have persons of hopeful piety so irregular in their religious duties and their attendance upon the worship of God in the sanctuary and on the social prayer meeting and conference as to be a thing of general notoriety. What must be the conclusion when as sometimes happens those who profess to have no religion are yet more uniform in their external religious duties and in the attendance upon the social conference and the prayer meeting than those who profess to be the children of God! What I say must be the effect of this upon an ungodly world.

Another consequence of instability in religion is that it takes away scriptural and rational ground of a man's hope that he is a Christian. The progress of the believer in holiness is described in the bible by the figure of the shining light shining more and more unto the perfect day - and by a reference to the growth of plants and animals. But the light of the day does not come on by a succession of flashes succeeded by darkness: but it gradually increases upon the darkness by an almost imperceptible addition. And neither do plants or animals attain their size by alternately increasing and then remaining stationary but by a gradual enlargement of all of their parts. If then a person finds his religion to be that inconstant unstable thing we have described he has surely reason to fear that it is something different from the religion of the bible.

And finally instability and inconstancy religion puts the salvation of the soul in danger. How irregular a man may be in his feelings and vacillating in his sentiments and yet be a Christian I shall not attempt to decide. But every degree of this instability is dangerous because if we are unsettled in regard to lesser things we may soon become so in regard to fundamentals. In religion when we begin to depart from the standard of doctrine or practice given in the bible there is no telling when we shall stop. A fathomless gulph yawns before us and before we are aware we may be at the bottom. He that wavereth, says the apostle, is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed. For let not that man think he shall receive any thing of the Lord.

These are some of the prominent consequences resulting from instability and inconstancy in religion. And let them my brethren induce us to enquire of ourselves in the language of the text, ye did run well; who did hinder you that ye should not obey the truth. Is not much of the constancy above pointed out to be found in our experience? Are not we the very persons Paul meant when he said ye did run well? When the Spirit of God was specially among us comparatively we did run well. But look at the awful change a few months have made in us. And what is it that has hindered us? Is it the departure of the Spirit of God we charge it upon? The Spirit of God! We drove him from our hearts and resisted his influences. It is the worldly mindlessness of our hearts. It is the selfishness of our souls that is ruining us. But is it not high time to awake out of sleep? Is it not high time to be more consistent and uniform? Is it not high time for us all my hearers to choose whom we will serve and no longer halt between two opinions. Death and the judgment are near us and what we do must be done quickly since there is no work nor sense nor wisdom in the grave whither we are hastening. Therefore my beloved brethren be ye stedfast immovable always abounding in the work of the Lord for as much as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord.

Sermon 143 Advent of Christ

[Sermon No. 143, "Advent of Christ," Luke 2:10-11, 1823 Jan,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 9]

Luke 2:10-11

And the angel said unto them fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour which is Christ the Lord.

[Interesting discussion about celebrating Christmas, paragraphs 1-3; the rest is about the world before Christ's birth.]

There is some probability that this is about the season of the year when the Saviour was born. A considerable part of the Protestant Christian world regard the 25th December as the time of his nativity; and devote that day to a celebration of the interesting event. The precise day however in which the angel uttered the joyful words of the text is probably unknown and will always remain so to the inhabitants of this world. For in former times we are told by one of the ancient fathers of the church that Christmas was celebrated on the sixth day of January. Others also suppose that his birth must have happened in September or October for he said that there was at that time shepherds abiding in the field keeping watch over their flocks by night. And although the climate of Judea is less severe than with us yet is it so severe that the idea of shepherds abiding in the fields at night agrees better with September or October than December or January.

If Christians however agree in fixing upon a certain day to be observed as the time of our Saviour's birth it is of little consequence whether it be the real time or not. And as to the propriety of commemorating this event there can be but one opinion if it be commemorated in a proper manner. That it is a matter of great importance to set apart a certain day however and make it a holiday does not appear. For had it been so the scriptures surely would have informed us of the precise day on which the Saviour was born. Perhaps this was omitted that men might not carry the observance of such a season to excess as they are prone to do in such instances. Thus the Church of Rome observes so many feasts and fasts that men lose sight altogether of the essence of religion and rest satisfied with its shadow and besides the poorer classes have not time to attend to their ordinary and necessary concerns.

Still however to commemorate the birth of the Saviour in a religious manner is consonant with scripture and reason. It called forth the song of angels, glory to God in the highest - peace on earth and good will to men, and surely it ought to draw forth a responsive song from the hearts of man. From the text I have chosen you will readily perceive my intention of directing your attention to the subject at this time. I propose to consider the grounds the angel had for saying to the shepherds that the Saviour's birth was good tidings of great joy to all people. And in following out this enquiry I shall first set before you the general state of the world at the time of his birth and secondly consider the changes which that event produced.

1 Examine the state of the world before the birth of the Saviour.

And my hearers there is a description of the state of mankind at this period drawn by the pen of inspiration. Paul has delineated with a strong and faithful hand the character of the heathen. And at the time of the Saviours advent all men were heathen except the small nation of the Jews. When they knew God, says he, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things. Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness through the lusts of their own hearts, to dishonour their own bodies between themselves: and changed the truth of God into a lie and worshiped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed forever. Amen. For this cause God gave them up unto vile afflictions: for even their women did change the natural use into that which is against nature: And likewise also the men leaving the natural use of the woman burned in their lust one toward another; men with men working that which is unseemly, and receiving in themselves the recompense of their error which was meet. And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind to do those things which are not convenient: Being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness, full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful.

What an awful description my hearers is this of the great mass of mankind! And in it are comprehended polished Greece and Rome. Yes those nations whose literature and arts have been the theme of admiration in every succeeding age - and whose poets and orators and historians are more studied and better known in our higher schools of learning than the bible - these nations does the apostle speaking by the inspiration of God charge with all these abominations. Indeed the polish and refinement of literature and the arts although it may give a new direction to vice and cover up depravity with a few external decencies still has no power by itself to counteract and destroy that corruption. Nay it lends new charms to sin and introduces a spacious refinement in iniquity of which the barbarian is ignorant. Let the ardent admirers of Greece and Rome remember that with their poetry and eloquence and patriotism and philosophy there was positively no fear of God before their eyes. And the poison of asps was under their lips. And to the correctness of the horrid description of Paul the Roman historian Tacitus has borne ample testimony. And of such was the morality of Greece and Rome we cannot expect to find it more pure among the uncivilized part of men.

When we look at the religious systems of the Greeks and Romans and other heathens we find the source whence this awful corruption sprang. For corruption in practice always follows error in belief. And when we read of 30,000 deities who were worshiped among these nations when we read of the characters they gave to these gods representing them as governed by the vilest of human passions and entering into petty quarrels with one another in the gratification of these passions when we read the thousand wild and extravagant and licentious stories the history of these deities furnish we no longer are surprised that all flesh had corrupted the way of God and human depravity and exhibited itself in its most odious forms. For the fruits of such systems might be expected to be a state of morals dreadful beyond all conception.

But were there not certain individuals among these heathen certain orators and philosophers who were free from these pollutions? Were we to judge from the eulogies they have given of virtue in their writings we might suppose them exempt in a good degree from the general corruption. But we are assured on good authority even the authority of one of these philosophers himself that they did not pretend to follow the maxims they so beautifully inculcated. And it is well known that the most upright among them gave a license to some of the vilest of crimes in others and practiced them themselves.

But did not these philosophers attain to more purity in their opinions? Some of them agreed in favor of the existence of one God but still a thousand doubts beset them on this article. Some also argued in favour of the immortality of the soul but the wisest of them declared in the end that they rather wished this to be true than believe it. And if such was the sentiment of philosophers what must have been the darkness that enveloped the mind of the common people in regard to future existence! Indeed those who did profess a belief in this doctrine found no other notion of another world than as a place of refined sensual enjoyment. And even if some did hope to live beyond the grave they were altogether in doubt concerning the terms on which they should be accepted of God. Short futurity to the wisest of the heathens was but an inextricable maze - of dark unexplored gulf across which no path had ever been marked and beyond which they could see nothing but fleeting shadows and uncertain twilight. All of them could join the poet in saying:

*The wide the unbounded prospect lies before me
But shadows clouds and darkness rest upon it. [From a poem by Joseph Addison]*

And surely such crude and uncertain views of another world can have but a feeble effect upon man in restraining them from the commission of sin or initiating them to the practice of virtue. It needs a special voice from the Almighty to tell man that he is immortal or he will never firmly believe it and nothing but the punishment of sin in eternal woe on the one hand and the reward of righteousness on the other in the everlasting joys of heaven can operate upon the skeptical and unfeeling heart of man or restrain the torrent of iniquity within him from bursting forth in a frightful inundation. All the reasonings of philosophy all the native sensibilities of the heart apart from the awful sanctions of Jehovah fall on the ear of man like an idle tale and utterly fail of working any permanent reformation. The discerning eye of Socrates the wisest of all the philosophers saw the correctness of this assertion and he declared to his disciples that they might grieve over all hopes of amending mens manners for the future unless God be please to send some other person to instruct them.

Such was the dismal condition of the world at the birth of the Saviour. Nor was that of the Jews much preferable. They had corrupted and neglected that religion which God had entrusted to their care. And when Paul drew the frightful picture of the heathen above recited he addresses the Jews and says, What then? Are we better than they? No, in no wise: for we have before proved both Jews and Gentiles that they are all under sin. The forms of godliness existed among them but the power was gone. One sect among them even denied the resurrection of the dead – a degree of hardened scepticism scarcely known even among the heathens – and to sum up the whole in one sentence Christ calls the generation then living a generation of vipers.

The whole world then at the birth of the Saviour was covered with an Egyptian darkness and gross darkness spread over the people. The whole face of it exhibited almost one unalleviated spectacle of all that is corrupt in principle and all that is degrading and abominable in practice. Selfishness reigned supreme in the heart of man while living and an impenetrable cloud rested upon the future when he died. But the star arose over Bethlehem and ushered in the rising Sun of righteousness with healing in his wings.

I proceed secondly to consider the change that took place in the condition of the human race upon the Saviour's birth.

And first that Saviour disclosed the true character of God.

In all human discoveries however splendid there is always in the first efforts a degree of imperfection - some remains of former errors mixed with the truth which time only can separate. But in the midst of the darkness of paganism and the corruptions of the Jewish system of religion Christ exhibited the character of God in a manner not to be amended or altered. He makes no ideas of matter in his descriptions but represented God as a perfectly pure spirit - a supreme eternal almighty omniscient omnipresent independant unchangeable perfectly wise perfectly holy perfectly just perfectly benevolent being - a pure undenied essence - in his nature incorruptible in his counsels unchangeable between whom and sin there is an everlasting and unconquerable repulsion and who will reward with everlasting felicity holiness in his creatures. Christ did not endeavour in his words to soften down one attribute of the deity nor associate a single material conception to accommodate the character of God to the gross notions of the Heathen - but his language is God is a Spirit and they that worship him must worship him in Spirit and in truth.

By his own sufferings unto the death of the cross that he might magnify the law and make it honourable he also unfolded the holiness and justice and mercy of God in a manner so striking and impressive and fill the soul with reverence and godly fears. Even the Jews who acknowledged the existence of one God were prone to regard him as altogether such an one as themselves - but Christ taught them that all mankind were the objects of his care and not merely the Jews and that in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted of him. While they supposed themselves the peculiar favorites of heaven on account of their supreme sanctity he told them that God had mercy on whom he will have mercy and whom he will he hardeneth. And that the purpose of God loved Jacob and hated Esau their forefathers that his purpose according to election might stand not on works but of him that colleth. He taught them also that he and his father were one and that he that had seen him had seen the Father.

Such a God as this was a very different being from the God whom most of the Jews worshiped and infinitely different from the abominations of the heathens.

In the second place the coming of Christ introduced into the world a pure system of morality.

The moral maxims of our Saviour may perhaps all be picked up in the writings of heathen philosophers. But they were so mixed up with absurdity and so destitute of authority that the most of them were wholly ineffectual in restraining man from sin. But Christ separated the wheat from the chaff embodied morality into a system and gave it a new and interesting dress and enforced it by the most awful of all sanctions viz. the commands of God and the pains of hell and the joys of heaven. And in the system which he inculcated he made no compromise with the lusts and sinful propensities of man, but declared to all his followers, he that will come after me let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow after me. Strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth into life. This was a system alike hateful to the hypocritical Pharisees and the corrupt heathen. It demanded purity of heart and intentions as well as of conduct. In short whenever it was introduced it created a new race of men - who loved their neighbours as themselves and did unto others as they would others should do unto them. Had Christ never been born we should now be sunk in all the immortality of heathenism. To him we owe all that is decent and kind and honorable and trusting and benevolent in society.

Thirdly by the coming of Christ life and immortality were brought to light.

Man was no longer compelled to grope his way through life and enter the dark dominions of the grave with nothing but the dim wax taper of philosophy. A messenger appears from heaven to tell man that he is immortal. He declared that the hour is coming in which all that are in their graves shall hear the voice of the Son of man and come forth, and he that was dead obeyed the penetrating call and shook off the hitherto unbroken slumbers of death. O what a glorious testimony was that to the power of the Redeemer to bring forth in like manner all who slept in their graves! How in a moment did the grim messenger lose half his terrors and what a new aspect was put upon the dignity and the destiny of man. Before that period he had lived as if this world were his only home. But the world now shrinks into a point before an opening and a boundless eternity! Man is immortal: glorious truth! Then how different should be his actions his motives and his desires from what they would be were he only mortal! He is immortal - he should therefore live for immortality. And when that Saviour himself burst the bars of death and returned again to his disciples not merely a living spirit but a living body what a glorious corroboration was thus afforded to man's future existence and how certainly was his resurrection from the grave established. All the remaining darkness that rested on the grave was now rolled away and a clear and a certain path was made across the dark gulf into which so many millions had entered without one ray of light or of hope to guide their steps or support their souls.

In the fourth place by the coming of Christ a way was opened in which man might become reconciled to God.

It was of vast importance that Christ should communicate a knowledge of the character of God and arrange a system of morality and show to man clearly that he is immortal. It was important too that he should illustrate what religion is by his own perfect example. By doing all this he rolled away a dark cloud of ignorance from man and opened celestial joys to his view and elevated him higher in the ranks of beings. But had he done no more than this all this increase of knowledge would only have added a keener sting to the miseries of man. For there stood between God and man a wall of separation which neither man nor angels could remove. Men had all sinned and come short of the glory of God and there could be granted no pardon until someone should stand in the place of man and endure the curse of a broken law. While this remained undone God could appear to man in no other aspect than as a consuming fire. This then was the mighty work which lay before the Saviour – a work too mighty for man or angel to perform. For they owed all the services of which they were capable to their Creator and therefore could make no atonement for the offenses of others. But the Saviour being in the form of God and thinking it not robbery to be equal with God was competent to the vast effort and he invited the wine press of God's wrath and trod it alone. In Gethsemane and on the cross he bore the curse of a broken law being made a curse for us. It was the language of the law that without shedding of blood there is no remission. But Christ hath redeemed us to God by his blood. By his obedience he evinced to the universe the excellence of God's law - by his sufferings he showed its strictness and now God can be just while he justifies the believer in Jesus. When that Jesus cried on the cross it is finished in a moment the wall of separation between God and man crumbled down and now God is in Christ reconciling himself the world unto himself not imputing their trespasses unto them. He has been made a propitiation for the sins of the whole world and his disciples may now carry the offers of salvation without misery and without price to every human being. Glory honor and immortality are now held out to every son and daughter of Adam and it is nothing but our own voluntary obstinacy and willfulness that can prevent the whole human race from embracing them. And many very many will embrace them.

But in the fifth place not until their hearts are made willing by the Spirit of God and the provenance of the heavenly messenger to convince the world of sin of righteousness and of judgment to come was another of the blessed effects resulting from the advent of the Saviour. The mind of man may be ever so much enlightened by a knowledge of life and immortality - and conscience may be loud in her demands upon him to act agreeable to this knowledge. Nay an atonement may be made for him and Almighty God may urge him by all the terrors of hell and all the joys of heaven to believe on his Son and be saved - still the heart of man would remain as unsubdued and alienated as ever standing out in stubborn and unyielding defiance of the authority and mercy of God unless some other agent almighty also be brought to operate on his opposition and turn his eyes on the cross. Then and not till then will the human heart yield to the influence of religion and devote itself to the service and the love of God. And this object too was effected by the wisdom of the Saviour. The Holy Spirit grieves as the sword of his agonies and obedience does enter with an almighty power the heart of many a rebel and implants there a holy principle and cause it to flourish and increase till it expands in eternal loveliness in the garden of God in heaven.

And now my hearers what a contrast have I presented before you in the condition of the world before and after the Saviour. If men have not realized all the blessings which his advent brings along with it the fault is altogether their own and we ought not to be the less grateful on this account for the birth of a Saviour. To him we owe it that we are not more sunk in the disregarding corruption and superstitions of heathenism. To his advent we are all that is really valuable in life and all that supports us in death. The hope of heaven rests on his merits alone. O what a joyful event is the birth of such a Saviour! Good tidings of great joy it is indeed to all people who have received it. Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem: for the Lord hath comforted his people, he hath redeemed Jerusalem: for the Lord hath made bare his holy arm in the eyes of all the nations. Glory to God in the highest peace on Earth good will to men.

But what if after all we obtain no interest in that Saviour. Then will his coming aggravate our final condemnation. It will be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for him. He that despised Moses law died without mercy under two or three witnesses - of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God.

Sermon 145 Hungering After Righteousness

[Sermon No. 145, "Hungering After Righteousness," Matthew 5:6, 1822 Nov,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 9]

Matthew 5:6

Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled.

The constitution of man is such that he must feel ardent desires prompting him to diligent exertion after some object. The objects that excite this longing in men are very various. With the avaricious it is money - with the hero it is glory - with the ambitious it is dominion - with the learned it is fame - with the gay it is splendor - with the debaucher it is animal gratifications and with the religious man it is righteousness. Yet though thus diversified are the pursuits of men corresponding to their ruling desires yet the objects they are seeking may all be comprehended in the general classes viz. a desire after the things of the world and a desire after righteousness or holiness or generally speaking the things of religion. For desires after worldly objects are all essentially the same only modified by peculiar circumstances. Thus the avaricious man although apparently so far from being a spendthrift can in fact very easily become so - nay strange as it may seem the love of money - the ardent, the miser-like love of money is sometimes connected with the love of spending it in the same man so that today he is a keen parsimonious miser and tomorrow the loose spendthrift. The same man who becomes a hero might had circumstances favoured as readily have been a soft voluptuary. The particular worldly object of our supreme desire becomes such by mere accident. For our hearts by nature have little choice in the particular worldly object on which to fasten.

But when we come to compare a desire after any worldly object with a desire after holiness or righteousness we find the case very different. A supreme love for anything worldly and a love to religion can by no means inhabit the same bosom. There is a wide and impassible gulph between the two things. There is an eternal repulsion between them and they cannot be made to coalesce. The debaucher can have no real desires after holiness until he ceases to desire the gratification of his lusts. The miser will not earnestly long after a likeness to God until he ceases to worship his gold. For no man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one and love the other; or else he will hold to the one and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and Mammon. The man ambitious of worldly applause must cease to regard this as his supreme good ere he can feel sincerely desirous of the applause of his God. For how can ye believe that receive honor one of another and seek not the honor that cometh from God only.

The ground then on which all human desires are referable to two grand classes is obvious. And we perceive also that there is an alternative before us in the case. It must be with us either a supreme desire after the world or a supreme desire after righteousness. There is no such thing as mixing the two together. And it is left to our free and uncontrollable choice to select between them. The question then occurs which is the best? If we wish to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season and then die in despair and to sink into eternal misery let us choose this world and make it the object of our supreme regard and desire. But if we think it better to suffer affliction with the people of God for the short term of our lives and then to die in peace and enter into eternal glory - let us seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness.

In the text the Lord Jesus tells us that those who hunger and thirst after righteousness are blessed and shall be filled. But on the other hand when is there any such promise made to a hungering and thirsting after the world? Yes there is a promise to such - they shall eat of the fruit of their own way and be filled with their own devices.

By the term righteousness doubtless chiefly intended holiness or as resemblance to God. For to desire to be holy is to desire to be like God. And whoever desires this will desire as a consequence every moral and Christian virtue and grace. He will long to fulfill all his duty to God to mankind and to himself. To hunger and thirst after righteousness then is to have an ardent desire to resemble God. To such desire a blessing is promised. Permit me in pressing the subject.

First to illustrate what it is to hunger and thirst after righteousness. Then secondly to show in what the blessedness consists.

1. I am to show what is implied in hungering and thirsting after righteousness.

And among other things it implies a deep sense of our unrighteousness or unholiness. No man is hungry but he who is destitute of food. If a man is already filled with food or drink he cannot be hungry or thirsty. So a man who is possessed or imagines himself possessed of a competent share of righteousness can not have any ardent desires for more. He who can say or think in his heart, I thank God I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican. I fast twice a week I give tithes of all I possess. Or he who can say I do not think myself any worse than my neighbor and do not fear but I shall be happy in another world if I do as well as I can in this and am sincere in searching for the truth. Such men can never have any intense desire after a likeness to God - for the plain reason that they already suppose themselves enough like him to go to heaven. But it is the man whose sense of unworthiness compels him to exclaim, Lord I am vile - God be merciful to me a sinner - I am less than the least of all Saints - I am wretched and miserable and poor and blind and naked. This is the man who really hungers and thirst after righteousness. He feels sin and corruption within him to be a dreadful burden. His ungodly dispositions - his unsubdued heart - his obstinate will - his neglect of his closet of the scriptures of the warnings and exhortations he hears - and of his duty to his fellow man - his cold and formal performance of those duties he attempts - the frequent triumphs of his pride over humility - of his anger over his reason - of his murmurs over his contentment of his tongue and his thoughts over the restraint of religion and of his worldly over his heavenly affections all these teach him a most forcible lesson showing him in language not to be mistaken that there is a mighty and an overwhelming power of depravity within bearing along his whole soul in its resistless current - and enveloping in him all holy desires and right motives. And under the pressures of such things as these the man is found to exclaim, Who shall deliver me from the body of this death: and most ardently will he long after an almighty power to subdue his depravity and to make him holy as God is holy. With the Psalmist he exclaims, As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God.

And is there not many a soul before me now uttering the responsive amen to these sentiments. Is there not many a heart borne down with a sense of inward corruption of misspent time of wasted opportunities and of poorly performed duties that longs earnestly longs for deliverance. Has not many a sigh of sorrow been sent up to heaven this day by many of you my brethren because you feel yourselves so unholy and are not your desires going up even now earnestly and diligently after holiness and God - panting after him in the expressive language of inspiration as the hart panteth after the water brooks?

Do you not feel as if the possession of this whole world - of this whole material universe would be of far less value than one iota of holiness. When you look into your yourselves and see how unholy you are and then contemplate the blessedness of those who are like God do you not feel as if you could not be denied as if you must be delivered from the bondage of corruption - as if your mind must be made like Christ and have him formed in you the hope of glory? Is not every other desire feeble in comparison with this intense hungering after righteousness and do you not feel as if you could be denied everything else but could not be denied that holiness of heart without which no man can see the Lord? If such are your real feelings brethren there is reason to hope that you are the persons meant in the text to whom the promise of blessedness is made.

Another thing implied in hungering and thirsting after righteousness is a deep sense that righteousness can come only from God.

It is not impossible indeed for a soul that feels its need of holiness to long for it - whatever be the source from which it proceeds. But if we mean to have the blessedness promised in the text we must hunger and thirst after righteousness in the manner there pointed out. And the text tells us that such a man shall be filled - not that he can feel himself - not that he can cultivate any native propensity to holiness and thus satisfy his appetite but we shall be filled from that fountain whence cometh down every good and perfect gift. That man only who feels his entire dependance on the sovereign grace of God to supply his spiritual wants will be led to seek for their supply in a proper manner. The child does not go to its parent for food when food is within its reach. A man who has abundance of provisions set before him cannot be made to feel that he is a beggar and that he shall starve without foreign assistance and so long as food is within his reach he will not come knocking unto earnest importunity at your door as a famishing outcast. Nor will a man go with strong crying and tears to God for spiritual food - nor will he feel that he is starving for want of the bread of life so long as he can obtain righteousness anywhere else. If therefore a man is puffed up and believes that he is something when he is nothing and to suppose that he can be righteous or increase his righteousness without the special influences of the Spirit he is not in the proper frame of mind - he is not in a standing perishing frame - for seeking to God for the manna of heaven and God says to all such as he once said to the Laodiceans, Because thou sayest I am rich and increased with goods and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched and miserable and blind and naked. I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment that thou mayest be clothed and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear, and anoint thine eyes with eye salve that thou mayest see.

Again to hunger and thirst after righteousness implies diligent and earnest efforts to obtain it.

It is no uncommon thing to find professed Christians who will acknowledge their great depravity and holiness of heart and life and who will declare themselves earnestly to desire a closer conformity to God - but who never proceed any farther than this and sit down in contented stupidity. When pressed for the reason of their continuing so far from what they ought to be they will perhaps say that they are dependant on the grace of God for righteousness and they must wait therefore till God please to bestow it. Thus making the doctrine of divine agency on the heart an excuse for continuance in sin. But such persons will have the vengeance and the wrath of God poured out upon them much sooner than his grace. For God gives his spirit to those and those only who feel their constant obligations to love him supremely. If such a course be not what Paul meant by continuing in sin that grace might abound I know not not what that is. But will a man who is really hungry make no effort to obtain food? Will a thirsty man sit down contented without seeking for water? No the person in a state of starvation will not content himself with reasoning on the improbability of his findings any food if he attempts it. But his appetite will urge him irresistibly to search for it even if there be scarcely a possibility of his obtaining it. To the man who is hungering and even to starvation for Spiritual food will resort to God who alone can supply him. He will most earnestly pray for grace to keep him from sin and his lamentations of his corruption will be louder when alone before God than before men. The eye of God will often witness the holy desires of such an one in his closet. And such a man will actually take up his cross and endeavor to follow Christ. He will not wait till God actually bestows a blessing upon him - but will resolve to serve the Son and live to his glory whether his prayers are answered or not. He will set himself to the diligent performance of duty knowing that although God will not give him his grace as a debt due to his exertions yet it is while performing their duty that men receive it and not while he continues in sin. Let a man pray even so earnestly for holiness yet if he do not break off his evil habits - if he do not avoid temptations and sinful companions - if he do not mortify the deeds of the body - if he do not war against his lusts and the sin that most easily besets him and endeavour to resist his propensity to love the world supremely - his prayers are mere vain words - they will never be answered. The man has no real desires after holiness. His pretended wishes to be like God are merely selfish and not the fruit of the Spirit. He has some idol which he hankers after more than after righteousness.

Having attempted to show what is implied in the hungering and thirsting mentioned in the text I proceed secondly to consider in what the blessedness promised consists.

And first this promise does not imply that those on whom it is bestowed shall be perfectly happy in this life. If this were implied then no man has ever yet possessed it since no Christian has ever attained to this state of perfect enjoyment. Nay the most devoted believer has often to struggle under a load of trials and infirmities so that he sighs for a discharge from the warfare. And it may frequently be said of those who sleep in Jesus that through much tribulation they have entered into the kingdom of God. The most severe afflictions - the keenest sorrows do not therefore show a man to be no sharer in the blessedness mentioned in that text.

Nor in the second place is it implied in this blessedness that a man shall show assuredly that he is a recipient of it. To be blessed indeed means to be in a truly happy state. But a man may be in such a state before he knows it. What if the criminal lay in his dungeon waiting the approaching day when his life would pay the forfeiture of his crimes! But suppose a reprieve awaited him to be communicated not until the moment of his execution. As you saw him led forth to the scaffold you would regard him as a really happy man although he regard himself as of all men most miserable. So a man may have been a rebel against God and be brought under condemnation of eternal death and he suppose that the time is at hand when the sentence will be executed without alleviation. But in the meantime the sentence against him may have been removed by the governor of the universe although no messenger has been dispatched to inform him. Surely that man is blessed for he is adopted into the family of God and an inheritance incorruptible undefiled and that fadeth not away awaits him. And we have reason to believe that there are many who seek the Lord all their lives sorrowing and conclude themselves given over to everlasting ruin without remedy will find when the executioner of death comes to perform his office that a reprieve is ready for them from their fears and their condemnation and they are going to be blessed forever.

But notwithstanding all this a part of the blessedness of the text is usually experienced even in this life. Some who hunger and thirst after righteousness amid all outward troubles find a peace which the world can never give nor take away and which passeth understanding. Nay we read of a joy unspeakable and full of glory among those who were regarded as the fifth and offscouring of all things and who were persecuted and like their Father had scarcely a place to lay their heads. And even where little of comfort is experienced by the Christian yet he finds a calmness which he formerly knew not and a fortitude under trials and a comparative unconcern in regard to worldly changes. Nay ask the most responding desponding Christian - the man who looks upon himself as given over to a reprobate mind but who earnestly longs to be converted - ask such an one whether he is willing to exchange his present condition of gloom and distress for his former condition of unconcern and worldly enjoyment and he will answer no. This shows that even he poor and miserable as he regards himself receives more comfort even from longing for holiness than does the man of the world from his most enticing pleasures.

But in the third place the chief of the blessedness of hungering and thirsting after righteousness is future. (It is said such an one shall be filled not he is filled). Another world will develop the glories that await him and then no tongue of men or angels will refuse to call him blessed. His desires then shall be gratified. The thing he hungers and thirsts after will be given him. Sin will no more possess and torment him - but righteousness pure and universal will possess his soul. All will be peace and harmony within his own bosom no jarring elements - no opposing nations - no flesh and Spirit - but it will be all holiness and all happiness. He will there also be blessed in his society. In God he will have an exhaustless foundation of righteousness without any alloy. His Redeemer too will exhibit that glory and that immaculate purity which becomes him who knew no sin and he will see the robe of that righteousness by which he was saved. The Holy Spirit too the Comforter the Sanctifier and the Purifier of the soul will be there his eternal friends. And all the noble company of angels and redeemed from among men will be his companions in not one of whom will be found anything but unmingled holiness. There then the hungry soul will be fully satisfied and the thirsty soul be thirsty no more. He shall be filled - is the glorious promise. The fullness indeed will go beyond his largest desires. An exhaustless fountain of holiness will be before him forever from which he can forever drink. Never will God cease to be holy or himself cease to be happy. For the stream of God's benevolence will flow and overflow through all eternity.

Now I say my hearers that the subject shows us how important and how glorious it is that our desires should be heavenly and that we should earnestly wish to become like God. If there are any whose hearts do really hunger after holiness and thirst day after day and month after month it gives me pleasure to pronounce them blessed. For I have received a commandment to bless and God hath blessed and I cannot reverse it. It may be that your ardent desires after righteousness are mingled with tears of distressing anxiety lest you are the cursed of God - and shall be compelled finally to take up your bed and hell. But though your weeping may continue for a night yet be assured joy will come in the morning. The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me says the prophet because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek: he hath sent me to bind up the broken hearted to proclaim liberty to the captives and the opening of the prison to them that are bound. To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord and the day of vengeance of our God; to comfort all that mourn. To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the Spirit of heaviness; that they might be called Trees of Righteousness - the planting of the Lord that he might be glorified.

And next I say as a second inference from our subject that it teaches us what a state of degradation and corruption it manifests not to hunger and thirst after righteousness. Such a man does not relish anything that is really good. Unless he desire holiness he desires not a resemblance to God - nor to the Saviour nor for the influence of the Spirit nor the society of any holy being. What then does he desire? and relish. His desires are earthly - sensual - devilish. And he relishes only those things that will ultimately make him miserable.

But many a man whose character is of this stamp will fancy that he does desire to be holy. But he hungers and thirsts after heaven not after righteousness. He desires to be happy - but not to be like God. All men have this kind of thinking - after heaven but few hunger and thirst after true holiness.

And are there not some of us my hearers who have none of this earnest desire for righteousness but who are indifferent and unconcerned on the subject? Shall I call such blessed? How can I bless whom God has not blessed? Not hunger and thirst after righteousness! What then do they desire? They are full of the desires after the world. But will this satisfy them. Let those who have drunk deepest of it answer - and they will tell you that it is even as when a hungry man dreameth and behold he eateth, but he awaketh and his soul is empty - or as when a thirsty man dreameth and behold he drinketh; but he awaketh and behold he is faint and his soul hath appetite. While the man whose desires are heavenly will find them filled to the overflowing the man whose desires have been earthly will find that he has sown the wind and must reap the whirlwind - it hath no stalk. The bud shall yield no meal. Thus saith the Lord, behold, my servants shall eat but ye shall be hungry - behold my servant shall drink but ye shall be thirsty; behold my servant shall rejoice, but ye shall be ashamed; behold my servants shall sing for joy of heart, but ye shall cry for sorrow of heart and shall howl for vexation of spirit.

Sermon 148 Power of Musick

[Sermon No. 148, "Power of Musick," I Samuel 16:23, 1823 Feb,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 9]

I Samuel 16:23

And it came to pass when the evil Spirit from God was upon Saul that David took an harp and played with his hand: so Saul was refreshed and was well and the evil spirit departed from him.

I present myself before this choir of singers and this audience as one who makes no pretensions to an accurate acquaintance either with the science or the practice of musick. It will not therefore be expected that I should attempt any critical remarks upon melody or harmony. But there are some other bearings of this subject that may not be uninteresting on this occasion. You will therefore permit me to request your attention to this discourse founded on 1 Samuel 16:23.

Saul had abandoned God and God abandoned him to the influence of an evil spirit. The Spirit of the Lord, says the historian, departed from Saul and an evil Spirit from the Lord troubled him. As he would not listen to the admonitions of Jehovah he was judiciously left to be impelled by this spirit of darkness to the indulgence of his rage and jealousy and suffered to be oppressed with deep melancholy and great terrors and groundless suspicions. An awful warning to those in this generation who shall resist the Spirit of God!

But my intention at this time is to direct your attention to the remedy adopted to charm away foul spirit. It was no other than the harp of David who afterwards became the sweet psalmist of Israel. And it seems the intended effort was produced at least for a time by his performance. We have then in this case a striking instance of the power of musick over the human heart. And from this history I shall take occasion to direct your attention to the power of musick generally on the passions and affections.

By the term Passion is understood a commotion of the soul attended with pleasure or pain, affecting both the mind and the body and arising from the view of something which is, or appears to be, good, or evil, or uncommon. (Beattie) Some of these are violent and impetuous in their nature - such as anger hatred avarice ambition revenge excessive joy or sorrow and all other moderate passions. These alone in the strict sense of the word are denominated passions: while those that are calm and gentle as benevolence, pity, sympathy, gratitude and all other innocent and virtuous emotions are generally termed affections. Most of the passions and affections belonging to the human constitution when restrained by the rules of reason and revelation are productive of happiness: but there are a few that in their nature produce nothing but misery to the soul and seem to proceed from unalleviated depravity such as pride, envy, and malevolence.

But not to multiply remarks of this character I proceed to observe that the passions which music excites in the human heart are all of the agreeable kind. Thus devotion cheerfulness courage compassion pity, etc., are called into exercise by the power of melody - but there is nothing in that art that tends to cherish or increase impiety anger envy or malice. A man indeed under the powerful influence of such passions is said to be incapable of performing a piece of musick. Thus it would be utterly impossible for one in the paroxysms of rage to exercise his vocal powers. So that musick not only does not encourage malevolent passions but tends to destroy them, and this is no small recommendation of the art apart from other considerations.

It is true indeed that musick is sometimes made to serve base purposes. The ambitious warrior stirs up this up the courage of his soldiers by the drum and the trumpet. But courage is not in itself an unworthy passion. It is only its perversion that can render it so. And the low debaucher may have the vilest of passions excited by the bacchanalian or the libidinous song. But in this case it is not so much the simple melody that fires him with low desires - but chiefly the vulgar and demonizing language with which it is coupled. Musick pure and uncontaminated in herself shrinks from the degrading alliance. And to set to a beautiful piece of musick the immoral and rotten sonnet of a drunkard or an adulterer is like tying the widow of Malabar to her dead husband for the funeral pile.

Musick then when not perverted by an unnatural union with discordant language nor combined with low and unmoral associations tends to excite only the more agreeable and tender passions and thus to soften down those that are more ferocious and productive of misery. The effects of musick therefore on the passions and affections may be comprehended in the following general statements.

1. It tends to soften down and eradicate the more corrupt and savage passions and affections of the human heart.

2. It tends to excite cherish and strengthen those passions and affections that are agreeable useful and holy.

I shall now proceed to an elucidation of these two propositions by an appeal to sacred and profane history.

1. Musick tends to soften down and eradicate the more corrupt and savage passions and affections of the heart.

Among all the nations and tribes that now exist or ever have existed on earth we have no account of any in which musick was not cultivated as a part of their national customs. However rude may have been their melody still it comprehended the groundwork of the art. And as these nations advanced from a state of barbarianism toward civilization they have uniformly advanced in their musick. Nay it is the testimony of almost every nation that musick preceded the other arts and contributed extensively itself to the civilization of kingdoms. The ancient Greek writers give to this art a power superhuman in taming the ferocity of uncivilized man. You have all heard no doubt of the fables concerning their Orpheus and Amphion the first of whom is said to have opened the gates of the infernal regions by lulling to sleep the grim keeper of it and to have almost brought back to the upper world his departed wife - and the very trees of the forest are said to have been drawn after him by the power of his lyre - and to the other the very stones listened and rose miraculously into the wall of Thebes. Passing by these fables we find that such men as Orpheus and Amphion did exist and that they were distinguished not only as poets and musicians but as legislators. The truth is all barbarous nations who begin to emerge from such a state have all their laws human and divine written in poetry and set to musick and in Greece these were sung publicly in chorus to the sounds of instruments. And these two men being eminent musicians were able to impress their laws upon the minds of the people by the charms of musick and thus did they gain a powerful influence over them and contribute extensively to their civilization. Thus testifies the Roman poet:

*The wood born race of men when Orpheus tamed
From acorns and from mutual blood reclaim'd
The priest divine was fabled to assuage
The tiger's fierceness and the lion's rage
Thus rose the Theban wall; Amphion's lyre
And soothing voice the listening stones inspire
Poetic wisdom marked with happy mean
Public and private, sacred and profane. [Source: Horace, The Art of Poetry]*

That musick by assuaging the angry and tumultuous passions of the inhabitants exerted a powerful influence in the civilization of Greece cannot reasonably be doubted. One of the most eminent and able historians declares that the Arcadians were distinguished for their humanity and that it proceeded from the knowledge of musick. And he ascribes the barbarity of their neighbours the Cynethians to their neglect of it. And it is well known that a knowledge of this art constituted an essential part of the education of the Spartans being regulated by law. Their musick however as Plutarch testifies was of a manly simple and majestic kind - and was not calculated to produce that effeminate licentiousness which has been exhibited on the theaters of ancient and modern times.

There can be no doubt that musick has had a powerful influence in the civilization of the barbarous nations of Europe. Who has not heard of the Bards of the Celtic nations that formerly spread over the west of Europe? These were a distinct class of men who were supported by the public and whose business it was to celebrate the history of the tribe and the exploits of their hearers in poetry set to musick. And in all their military expeditions the chiefs were accompanied by one or more of these bands. Who does not perceive the influence of musick in the amiable and gentle manners of the untutored Caledonians as exhibited in the poems of Ossian? The song comes, says that poet, with its musick to melt and to please the ear. It is like soft mist that rising from the lake pours on the silent vale. The green flowers are filled with dew. That is such mournful songs have a happy effect to soften the heart and to improve it by tender emotions as the moisture of the mist refreshes and nourishes the flowers.

To illustrate still further this idea of the assuaging importance of musick on the passions of man we may appeal to the holy scriptures. And a case more in point cannot be found than that mentioned in the text. The darkest and most violent of passions were rankling in the heart of the king of Israel and an unseen malignant spirit was fanning those passions with the breath of hell. Yet the heart of David allayed for a time the tumultuous storm. In this effect there appears to have been nothing miraculous. The sweet tones of the harp of a simple shepherd soften the raving feelings of the king so far that the infernal spirit knew it to be vain to resist so powerful a spell and he departed. A strong testimony surely to the power of melody and one that almost leads us to regard the fables of Orpheus and Amphion as true!

Any one who reads the Old Testament must see how musick was interwoven with all the customs of the Hebrews and what an influence it exerted upon that nation. The greater part of the old testament it is well known was written in poetry and set to musick. And theirs was altogether sacred musick - tending not merely to soften the unruly passions but to turn all the nobler feelings to the solemn realities of religion. Even the miracles God wrought among that people were frequently attended by musick as the destruction of Jericho by the trumpets and ram's horns sounding: and it was no uncommon thing for their prophets to deliver their inspired messages with musick as an accompaniment. Saul when he became a prophet met a company of prophets coming down from the high place with a psaltery and a tabret and a pipe and a harp before them and he prophesized. And Eliza could not predict the success of Jehoshaphat against the Moabite until he had sent for a minstrel who played before him.

Were it necessary to illustrate any farther the effect of musick in calming the passions I might appeal to your experience my hearers. How often have you found the tumultuous feelings of your bosoms quelled in this house of God by one of the songs of Zion and a sober serenity come over your souls preparing you for the worship of God without distraction. And who is there that has not heard on some still evening when the moon shone in soft lustre over the world and the gentlest breeze did not move the serene air who at such a time has not heard the soothing and solemn tones of sacred musick coming from a distance while the whip poor will echoed her responsive note! And who did not find that musick to soothe and settle down his whole soul into a calm as great as that of the surrounding scene and who at such a time has not joined the pact in singing

Methinks it sounds much sweeter then by day

Silence bestows that virtue on it. [Source: The Merchant of Venice, Shakespeare]

Is there before me a mourner who has been called to part with a friend whose life was dear as his own? He then can bear testimony to the soothing influence of the sacred and plaintive hymn that formed a part of his obsequies. Although that musick caused the tears to flow - yet it was a tear

That gives the mourners swelling bosom vent

Quenches the anguish that would else consume

And flowing through the channels nature formed

Softens the heart that else would stiffen into stone.

When our Saviour entered the ruler's house where his daughter lay dead he found the minstrels playing the solemn requiem and indeed the practice of performing musick over the dead exists in every nation savage or civilized - an evidence that all have found its power to be soothing to the violence of grief.

But I proceed to the second statement that musick tends to excite, cherish and strengthen those passions and affections that are agreeable useful and holy.

Its influence on the field of battle in rousing the courage and nerving up the sole to the moral conflict has long been known and celebrated. Sometimes indeed (alas very often!) the ambitious conqueror turns that courage so roused up sum up into a wrong channel uses it as the instrument of the misery and subjugation of the innocent and peaceful. And the philanthropist will regret that it is ever necessary to stiffen up the sinews for the slaughter of man. Still there are but few who do not feel that the oppressed in the present state of the world must in extreme cases resort to the sword. And in such a case musick exerts a most powerful influence upon them in subduing the fear of death and in strengthening them to resist oppression.

Musick is also an eminent promoter of love of country. In almost every kingdom there are what are called national songs to which the people become ardently attached and by which they are through the assistance of a thousand fond associations an ardent affection for the land of their fathers. The Swiss national song is well known beginning

O when shall I visit the land of my birth

Tis the loveliest land on the face of the earth.

And when the Swiss soldiers were employed in foreign service it was found necessary to forbid the playing of this to them under pain of death - as it immediately drew tears from their eyes - caused many to desert - others to commit suicide and left others to pine away and die with broken hearts. It ought here however to be remarked that all this must not be imputed exclusively to the power of musick. The thousand tender associations and recollections the musick brought along with it had a large share and an astonishing effect.

[Insert] When Edward the first conquered Wales he put to death all the Welch bards. This policy plainly shows how great an influence imagine the songs of the bards to have over the minds of the people and of what nature he judged that influence to be.

Another most touching instance of like character related in the xxxxxxx. The Jews whose national songs were musick of the temple were carried away captives to Babylon. And then says the historian we hanged our harps upon the willow thereof. For there they that carried us away captive required of us a song; and they that wasteth us require of us mirth, saying sing us one of the songs of Zion. How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land? The moment they struck the notes of one of the Zion's songs the temple of God with all its grandeur and solemn and delightful services - Jerusalem itself with their friends and thousand fond recollections rushed upon their souls with a redouble force and the love of country rose to such a pitch that they felt every vocal power dying within them.

The effect of musick in rousing men from a state of torpor to a state of activity is well - known. The history of the cure of the bite of the tarantula - a large spider found in Italy - exhibits this effect in a striking light. The poison of this insect produces a torpid sadness and failure of the senses. And the physician's art can give no relief. But musick comes forward to save the dying man. A brisk tune excites a lively joy and gladness and rouses the patient to active exertions and the poison is thus counteracted and thrown off. It ought however here to be mentioned that this statement although coming from the highest authority is of late opposed by equally high authority.

Although the spirit of chivalry that appeared in Europe when the nations were emerging from the dark ages was productive of many extravagances yet it no doubt contributed to the civilization of the world and to the cultivation of the softer and more refined feelings. Yet chivalry to its rise from poetry and musick. Indeed in every age the effects of the finer social feelings has been particularly manifest - so that it is scarcely an exaggeration to say

*These polished arts have humanized mankind
Softened the rough and tamed the savage mind.*

From the power of melody and harmony in quelling deep and fierce and consoling passions and affections and in exciting cheerful and lively lives ones they have had a very great influence over the health. A physician who was also an eminent poet thus closes his rules for preserving health -

*There is a charm, a power, that sways the breast
Bids every passion revel or be still;
Inspires with rage, or all your cares dissolves;
Can sooth distraction, and almost despair.
That power is musick:*

*Musick exalts each joy - allays each grief,
Expels diseases, softens every pain,
Subdues the rage of poison and of plague,
And hence the wise of ancient days adored
One power of physic melody, and song. [Source: Art of Preserving Health, Armstrong]*

The awakening and strengthening influence musick has on the religious feelings would require a volume to describe. But I trust the delightful experience of very many of my hearers can testify to its power. Therefore such descriptions is less necessary. How must the song of Moses at the passage of the Red Sea have caused the bosoms of the Israelites to swell with an overflowing gratitude to God for his deliverance! And how animating the song of Deborah and Barak? How must every tender and holy feeling have been brought into the liveliest exercise by the hymn him the Saviour sang unto his disciples at the close of the eucharist but before he was betrayed:

*How sad the Saviour's song! How sweet! How holy!
The last he sung on earth - how melancholy!*

When Paul and Silas lay bound in prison at Philippi how interesting how solemn how animating that prayer and that song of praise which they offered up at midnight when suddenly there was a great earthquake so that the foundations of the prison were shaken and immediately all the doors were opened and everyone's bands were loosed! With what overwhelming power with what awakening interest must the full swell of voices and instruments in the Jewish temple have burst on the soul and lifted it towards heaven. And how often in these times does the Christian find his devotional feelings carrying him above the world when the sacred songs of Zion with a thrilling interest enters his heart!

Sermon 149 Terms of Communion with One Another at the Lord's Table

[Sermon No. 149, "Terms of Communion with One Another at the Lord's Table," Galatians 5:6, 1823 Feb, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 10]

Galatians 5:6

For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing nor uncircumcision; but faith, which worketh by love.

[A discussion of the question of who can partake of communion.]

The many bitter controversies that have been carried on among Christians about unessential points of doctrine or practice and the consequent alienations and jealousies between brethren and their separation from one another to form distinct churches refusing communion with each other has long been a subject of deep regret among the sincere followers of Christ.

They have mourned in secret places that the church which is called in scripture the body of Christ and which he so earnestly prayed might be one as he and his Father are one should be split up into so many denominations distinguished from one another in most instances by unimportant peculiarities. And ardently do they pray for that time to come when there shall be but one fold and one Shepherd - one Lord - one faith - one baptism.

It is not merely the fact that there is a diversity of opinions among real Christians upon unessential points of their faith this fact is not what distresses most deeply the real lover of the cause of Christ. For from the nature of the human mind and of the bible he might expect this diversity. But on account of these differences merely men have established numerous and separate communions excluding those of other denominations from a seat of the Lord's table at the same time that they acknowledge them to be Christians and this appears so contrary to the Spirit of the Gospel and so detrimental to its progress that every real lover of Zion is distressed at the picture and feels desirous of doing all of this power to rectify the abuse. But an important question occurs him in setting about the business and that is what are the real grounds of Christian communion that is what are the terms on which a professing Christian church is to admit to her sacramental communion those who apply for admission. Until a man has some distinct ideas on this subject he will prove but a miserable reformer. He will be apt to adopt the sweeping sentiment that such a church is bound to admit to communion all who make application and thus annihilate at once the distinction between the church and the world and make the world the church and the church the world. To exhibit the true scriptural grounds of Christian communion is my intention in considering the text I have just recited to you. And I shall endeavour to prove from scripture the following proposition that no church has any right to require as an indispensable condition of communion any thing more than a professed believe in the essential doctrines of the Gospel and a correspondent practice.

This proposition is thus expressed by Robert Hall an able Baptist writer in his late work on Christian communion. No man, says he, or set of men are entitled to prescribe as an indispensable condition of communion what the N. Testament has not enjoined as a condition of salvation. Another able writer on this subject thus expresses the same thing: no qualification for sacramental communion may by the law of Christ be exacted from any individual other than visible Christianity - that is a profession and practice becoming the Gospel without regard to those sectarian differences which consist with the substance of evangelical truth. [Source: Anderson, 1820]

Before entering on the direct proof of this proposition it may be proper in order to avoid all misapprehension to make a few remarks concerning the term essential doctrines - as applied to the Gospel. When I speak of an essential doctrine I mean one that cannot in ordinary cases be disbelieved or rejected without destroying the soul. How far it is possible in certain cases for a man's head to be wrong while his heart is right I shall not attempt to decide. Yet it would seem no reasonable man can deny that there are some truths of religion which a man who has a capacity and opportunity to understand them cannot deliberately tonight without forfeiting his salvation. Thus the man in a Gospel land who in the unclouded use of his reason denies the existence of God or the inspiration of the bible or the immortality of the soul such a man infallibly cuts himself off from the possibility of salvation unless he renounce those errors. On the other hand there are some parts of the Gospel system the disbelief of which does not infallibly destroy the soul. Such was the distinction between meats and days as mentioned by Paul and whether Christians ought or ought not to be circumcised. Men might maintain different views of these subjects and yet be real believers and members of the invisible church of Christ.

It ought here however to be remarked that the very smallest errors voluntarily embraced may ruin the soul - because it may indicate a state of heart prepared to resist the obligation to receive and obey the truth. The amputation of a man's finger may be the means of the death of the body but not infallibly - the cutting off a larger member is still more liable to destroy the life. And just so the denial of even the least truth of revelation may prove the eternal death of the soul. The denial of a still more important truth is still more dangerous: but the willful voluntary deliberate denial of the essentials of the gospel as certainly produces the ruin of the soul as to cut off a man's head or run a dagger through his heart terminate his mortal existence.

But it may be asked how we shall distinguish between an essential doctrine of the bible and one that is unessential? To draw a line between these is in some cases a delicate and a difficult task. And it is not my intention at this time to attempt such a classification of the Gospel doctrines. That such a distinction exists - that it cannot be destroyed without destroying religion is all that is necessary for me to maintain at this time. I remark however that it is often easier to determine what are not essentials of religion than to determine what are so. So that in determining whether the man who offers himself to our communion believes in all that is essential is often a task not so difficult as we are apt to imagine. I would remark too on this subject that in most cases essential error in belief is not confined to one point but extends usually to so many point that little doubt can remain in the minds of real Christians - and he who receives one essential doctrine of pure revelation is not apt long to delay seeing all others that are important. And I cannot but add that in determining what are the essentials and what are nonessentials of religion we are to be guided by the scriptures themselves and are bound to make no more fundamental than they have made.

I now proceed to the proof of the proposition that no church has any right to require as an indispensable condition of communion any thing more than a professed belief in the essential doctrines of the Gospel and a correspondent practice.

And first I infer the truth of this proposition from the character of the church as given in the bible.

The term church as used in the New Testament when not designating a place to worship denotes either the whole body of Christians on earth or some one assembly of them in a particular place. And the latter sense differs from the former only as a part differs from the whole. The scriptures nowhere speak of two churches on earth - but when they mention more than one they mean merely the parts of the church universal. The idea that there could be two distinct churches maintaining separate communion tables is entirely unknown to the scriptures. In the last prayer the Saviour offered up for his disciples including all his followers to the end of time he besought that they all might be one as he and the Father are one. And the object of this union he declares to be that the world might know that he was sent from heaven. As if nothing could more effectually convince men of the reality and excellence of vital religion than a union of the church - as if nothing could operate to confirm their prejudices and strengthen native opposition so much as a division in the church. To make nonessentials therefore a ground of debarring a Christian from the sacrament table is directly opposed to the Spirit of the Saviour's prayer.

This unity or oneness of the church is evident from every other definition we have of it in the bible. In the old Testament it is represented as the spouse of Christ. Witness the whole of Solomon's Song: and Isaiah says in addressing the church, Thy maker is thy husband: the Lord of Hosts is his name: and thy Redeemer the Holy One of Israel. The same figure is frequently used by the New Testament writers and surely nothing can more certainly evince that the real church of Christ is one than such a figure.

Another figure by which the church is described by the apostle is the household of faith. That is all the real members of Christ's church sustain towards one another the intimate and endearing relation of those who belong to the same family. How inconsistent does it appear for such to refuse to each other a participation in one of the most tender and interesting ordinances by which the children of God are distinguished from the world - viz. the sacramental supper!

Another very favorite representation of the church by Paul is to give to it the appellation of the body of Christ. To the Romans he says, as we have many members in one body and all the members have not the same office: so we being being many are one body in Christ and every one members one of another. To the Corinthians he says, as the body is one and hath many members and all the members of that one body being many are one body so also is Christ. For by one Spirit - are we all be baptized into one body whether we be Jews or Gentiles whether we be bound or free and have been all made to drink into one Spirit. The apostle then proceeds to show how the natural body although composed of different members still does not lose its unity. God hath tempered the body together says he having given more abundant honour to that part which lacked: that there should be no schism in the body but that the members should have the same care one for another. Now ye are the body of Christ and members in particular. How irresistible the conclusion from hence that there should be no schism between those who constitute Christ's body! Although in minor things they might differ from one another as the several members of the body differ among themselves yet they all agree in being a part of Christ - in having new hearts and in possessing faith that worketh by love. And therefore they ought no more to separate from one another's communion than the members of the human body ought to be at variance and warfare. A similar view of this subject is given by Paul in the fourth chapter of Ephesians which it is unnecessary to repeat.

Having thus endeavored to establish the propriety of catholic communion among all those who hold the heart that is the essentials of the Gospel from the bible description of the church I proceed to prove the same thing from the history of the church as given in the N. Testament.

I shall hear only advert to certain facts in the bible that relate to this subject.

In the primitive church in the days of the apostles and for many years subsequently its unity was preserved in almost uncorrupted purity. All who embraced the essentials of the Gospel however they might differ in nonessentials presumed not to separate themselves from their brethren and spread another communion board. Some indeed denied the essentials of the faith and went out from the church thus showing that they were not really of it. And others made some attempts to excite schisms among brethren and draw them them off to an exclusive communion. But in the effort they met with the most pointed reproof of the Apostles and from this fact I argue that real Christians ought not at this day to refuse communion to one another.

A striking instance of this effort to produce a division in the church is recorded in the 15th Chapter of Acts - Certain men which came down from Judea taught the brethren and said except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved. Paul and Barnabas therefore were departed to go to Jerusalem to consult the apostles and elders concerning this matter. During the consultation Peter said, Why tempt ye God to put a yoke up on the necks of the disciples which neither our fathers nor we are able to bear. But we believe that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved even as they. And finally this august council came to the result that, it seemed good to the Holy Ghost into us to lay upon you no greater burthen than these necessary things that ye abstain from meats offered to idols and from things strangled and from fornication: from which if ye keep yourselves ye shall do well. Had these schismatics succeeded in obtaining the opinion of this council that circumcision was one of the essentials of religion the consequence would have been a separate communion. But the elders and apostles were satisfied that the Gentiles would be saved as well as they and that and that too without circumcision and hence this could not be one of the fundamentals of religion. This instance clearly shows the ground on which the apostles admitted anyone to fellowship viz. a belief in the essentials of the Gospel and a correspondent practice.

This same subject of circumcision was repeatedly a source of difficulty in the apostolic age and it required repeated and earnest efforts from Paul and the other apostles to fervent a schism on this account. The text was written in reference to this subject. I testify, says Paul, to every man that is circumcised that he is a debtor to the whole law. Christ is become of more effect to you whosoever of you are justified by the law: ye are fallen from grace. For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything nor uncircumcision: but faith which worketh by love. The grand enquiry in regard to a man was whether he possessed saving faith in the Lord Jesus Christ - if he did it was of no consequence as respected communion with him or his salvation whether he were circumcised or not. And if such was the chief question in apostolic times it is the chief one that ought to be made in these later times.

Among the Corinthians a spirit of division had arisen and unhappily and unhappy contentions sprang up between brethren about unessential points. And although these Corinthians had not gone so far as to separate into different communions yet listen my hearers to the decided reprobation of their conduct with which Paul addresses them - Now I beseech you brethren by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ that ye all speak the same thing and that there be no divisions among you: but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment. For it hath been declared unto me of you my brethren and by them which are of the house of Chloe that there are contentions among you. Now this I say that every one of you saith I am of Paul and I of Apollos and I of Cepheus and I of Christ. Is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for you? Or were ye baptized in the image of Paul? I thank God that I baptize none of you but Crispus and Gaius - for Christ sent me not to baptize but preach the Gospel. It was his commission to enforce the grand fundamentals of religion and not to dwell upon those things that were not essential to the system of revealed truth nor to a man's salvation. And it was because the Corinthians were contending about these things and ranging themselves into parties that Paul reproofs them thus severely.

Among the Christians at Rome there was a diversity of opinion in regard to certain Jewish legal rights and ordinances. And Paul most faithfully warned them against separation on this account. Him that is weak in the faith receive you but not to doubtful disputations. For one believeth that he may eat all things: another who is weak eateth herbs. Let not him that eateth not judge him that eateth: for God hath received him. Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth. Yea we shall be holden up: for God is able to make him stand. Let us not therefore judge one another anymore: but judge this rather that no man put a stumbling block or an occasion to fall in this brother's way. I know and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus that there is nothing unclean of itself: but to him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean to him it is unclean. But if thy brother be grieved with thy meat now walkest thou not charitably. Destroy not him with thy meat for whom Christ died. For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink: but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. And on this same subject Paul says to the Corinthians, when ye so sin against the brethren and wound their weak conscience ye sin against Christ. In all these reasonings the apostle evidently proceeds on the supposition that the matters in dispute were not fundamentals of the Gospel. For he says of those who differ from him that eateth that God had received him - and that God would hold him up - and that the kingdom of God is not meat and drink but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. Thereby plainly intimating that their errors if they were errors were not of such a character as to prevent them being accepted of Christ. And on this principle he deprecated the idea of their being separated into different communions. The principle he would support is plainly this that those who have communion with Christ ought to have communion with one another. And during the apostolic age and for a considerable time afterwards the church acted on this principle and was united and happy. But alas! how different it is in these times! How very common is it for those of our denomination who acknowledge those of another to be real Christians believing in all the essentials of the Gospel and practicing accordingly nevertheless deny them a seat at the Lord's table.

But let us my Christian brethren free ourselves from the guilt of this unscriptural bigoted counsel. Let the grand enquiry with us be whether a man has that faith which worketh by love - and if he has let us not dare refuse him a place at the Lord's table; for we should remember that it is indeed the Lord's table and not ours and that therefore every real Christian has a right to a seat at it. And let us not by any means or covenant require of any man a belief in any thing more than the essentials of religion. It is a delightful consideration that more correct views on this subject are spreading among Christians and that the true church of God is rapidly uniting and that the petty divisions among brethren are yearly looked upon as of less and less importance. In promoting this spirit missionary exertions have had a most happy effect. May God hasten on the time when pious watchmen shall see eye to eye and there shall be but one Lord one faith and one baptism.

Sermon 150 Only One True Gospel

[Sermon No. 150, "Only One True Gospel," Galatians 1:6-9, 1823 Feb,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 10]

Galatians 1:6,7,8 and 9

I marvel that you are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another gospel: Which is not another, but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ. But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed.

[This manuscript includes some 22 pages, many of which are crossed out in part or in full. I have transcribed only those parts that are not crossed out. There appear to be several endings on gray paper.]

[This is an important discussion about telling the true gospel from false gospels and also about what are the essential Christian doctrines; it reveals a lot about Hitchcock's attitudes toward Unitarians, Baptists, etc., though he never mentions them. Also at the end (around page 18) he seems to be suggesting people have a right to pursue any faith, although this may be a rhetorical device, i.e. Devil's advocate.]

And first we learn from the text that there is a true gospel and a false gospel.

Paul declares himself and his fellow laborers to have preached to the Galatians the true gospel and that false teachers had preached to them a false gospel. So wide was the difference between the two systems that the one would prove the everlasting salvation of their souls if embraced and the other their everlasting destruction.

Paul says let the man be accursed who preaches a gospel different from the one preached by him or let him be an anathema or something devoted or separate to destruction - let this come upon the man yea if he be an apostle - if he be one of us - if he be an angel from heaven and if there were no such thing as a true gospel - if the fundamental doctrines that gospel could not easily be determined this would be a most unrighteous sentence.

There is a general disposition among men to believe that the essential truths of the bible are not very clearly defined and that in fact it will make but little difference in regard to our final condition whether we embrace one system of doctrines or another provided we be sincere. But a very different view does the text present. It plainly intimates that there is one and only one system of doctrines in scripture by which a man can be saved. All other systems however plausible and by however great talents they may be supported are in the view of the apostle radically wrong and destructive to the soul.

And with this view of the subject coincides other parts of scripture. Peter tells the Christians to whom he wrote that there would be false teachers among them who privately should bring in destructive heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction; and that many would follow their pernicious ways. And Paul speaks of some who had made shipwrecks of the faith whom he had delivered over to Satan to learn them not to blaspheme, and he expressly declares that there is but one Lord one faith one baptism. Now all these passages plainly imply that there is one and only one gospel by which man can be saved - and that any system which leaves out or denies one or more of the essential truths of religion is a false gospel and he who preaches it a false teacher.

2. I infer from the text that men are able to determine what is the true and what is the false Gospel.

What I mean is that men who have the bible in their hands can easily determine the grand outlines of gospel truth and hence also determine when their teacher deviates from it. If this were not the case if those doctrines which they must believe in order to be saved are not most clearly marked on the pages of inspiration of what use would the scriptures be? If the way of salvation is not described in scripture so plainly that the wayfaring man need not err therein the bible serves only to perplex and distress men and the religion of nature would be preferable. And if there be any obscurity in regard to what the essential doctrines of the Gospel are how could Paul blame the Galatians for embracing another Gospel? He is even astonished that they had done this: but it would surely have been a matter of no surprise if there had been any obscurity in those grand fundamental truths of which he had preached to them.

But it may be asked how an ignorant man when he sees men of equally good talents and apparently equally honest differing concerning almost every point of revelation how shall this ignorant man decide which of them believes in the true Gospel and which in the false? Surely if men of extensive knowledge and apparent candor differ so much in their opinions God will not punish the ignorant man if he should hence up to embrace the erroneous system.

If the ignorant man resorts to the writings or conversation of the learned in order to determine what is the true Gospel he will indeed be as liable to embrace error as truth. But human controversies however able and learned are not the source from which he should derive his system of religion. He has a more sure word of prophecy to which he will do well to take heed as unto a light shining in a dark place. The bible is the fountain where he can learn what God has revealed: and it does not demand great talents or extensive knowledge to determine from this what are the great truths of religion. It requires only two things to enable any man of common sense to ascertain all the doctrines of the bible that are essential to his salvation viz. a right state of heart and humble earnest prayer. The man who reads the scriptures with these qualifications is better prepared to determine what is the true gospel of the grace of God than he who can bring the whole circle of literature and science to his aid but is wanting in these. It is not learning it is not an ability to criticize the scriptures that is necessary for understanding their fundamental truths but it is an honest mind - it is a praying Spirit. Possessed of such a heart we are assured by God himself that the wayfaring men though fools shall not err therein. But no such promise is made to learning. On the contrary we are told to beware of philosophy and that knowledge puffeth up: but charity edifieth. If therefore men do not and fancy they cannot distinguish between a true and a false gospel the reason is that their hearts are not right in the sight of God. How can ye believe that seek, etc.

3. From the text we learn that men are bound to determine what is the true and what is the false gospel upon the peril of their salvation.

The sentence Paul passes upon the false teachers who preached the gospel to the Galatians implied nothing less than the loss of their souls. He declares them to be anathema that is an accursed thing devoted to distraction - for that is the meaning of the phrase. And unquestionably the ground on which he pronounced their doom in this solemn manner was that they were fundamentally erroneous - that is they inculcated opinions that would ruin the soul. And if the Galatians neglected to determine concerning those opinions it was at the peril of their salvation. For those errors that will destroy the souls of the minister will if embraced destroy the souls of the hearers.

There are some indeed who suppose that men will not be judged of God for their religious opinions but only for their feelings and affections actions. But the truth is every religious feeling and action is formed on a religious opinion and the character of the action will wear precisely the character of the opinion. Did not Paul in the text regard religious sentiments as of unspeakable importance when he says, Though we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you than that we have preached into you let him be accursed? Does not Christ represent religious opinions as of some consequence when he says he that believeth shall be saved - he that believeth not shall be damned. Why were Hymenaeus and Alexander delivered unto Satan? Because they made shipwrecks of the faith. Did not John consider religious sentiments of importance when he said he that abideth in the doctrine of Christ he hath both the Father and the Son. If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed.

4. The text teaches us that there are doctrines of revelation the belief of which is essential to salvation.

By an essential doctrine I understand to mean the rejection of which in ordinary cases infallibly destroys the soul. I do not include the case of the heathens or idiots nor of insane persons (no attempt to decide how far in such cases the head may be grieving while the heart is right) – not wishing...

[Several lines are crossed out in pencil]

But I mean that those who have their reason in exercise and have the bible in their hands are bound to embrace certain fundamental truths or they can have no well grounded expectations of heaven. When Paul so forcibly represents the consequences of rejecting the true Gospel he certainly implies this. For it was the disbelief of the true Gospel that would bring an eternal curse upon the false teachers and there must have been something in that Gospel that was essential to salvation. The particular doctrine from which the Galatians had departed was justification by faith in Christ. This will be evident to anyone who will read attentively the whole epistle most of which is occupied in establishing this very point. This doctrine does indeed lie at the heart of the Christian system and whoever rejects it rejects the gospel method of saving sinners.

[Several lines are crossed out in pencil]

Here then is one grand fundamental of the gospel. But an important enquiry arises how we shall distinguish a fundamental doctrine from one that is not so? For every age men have been inclined to multiply essentials and to teach for doctrines the commandments of men. Far be it from me if I know any thing of my heart to wish any thing to be made an essential of salvation which is not made so in the bible. Indeed all men who believe in revelation will acknowledge that there are no fundamentals of religion except those contained in the Scriptures. We may then lay down the following rule for determining what doctrines are central to salvation what are not so, viz., no doctrine is to be regarded as essential that is not expressly declared to be so or plainly implied to be so in the bible. From such a rule as this it would seem no one can dissent.

That some doctrines are expressly declared to be essential to salvation by the sacred writers cannot admit of a question. Take for instance the doctrine of justification by faith, the departure from which was the other gospel of which Paul speaks in the text. By asserting that those who denied this doctrine were accursed he plainly represents a belief of it as essential to salvation. But in the next chapter he expressly declares that by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified. And in the third chapter he says as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse. But that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God is evident. And this same unqualified declaration he repeatedly makes in his epistle to the Romans. If his words are true then the doctrine of justification by faith without works through the redemption there is in Christ Jesus is essential to salvation.

In a like and decided manner Christ declares with a repeated emphasis that except a man be born of water and the Spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven. No man therefore who is not born again ever will enter heaven. It is certain therefore that the doctrine of regeneration by the special agency of the eternal Spirit is another of the essential doctrines of salvation.

Christ also has said he that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him. A belief then in the true character and offices and works of Christ is essential to salvation.

[Most of the next four pages are crossed out in pencil.]

...are certain what his opinions are upon the fundamentals of the Gospel. And a fair teacher at first employs such ambiguous expressions that one man will understand him one way and another man a different way. Were he first to declare his sentiments openly Christians would immediately take the alarm and abandoned him. But he held up the cross before him for a time in order to conceal the dagger which he is about to plunge into the vitals of Christianity.

6. From the text I infer the necessity of an assent to a creed as a condition of communion.

If it be true that there is a true and a false gospel - if it be true that men are able to determine what is the true and what is the false gospel - if we are bound at the peril of our salvation to determine this - if there are some doctrines of revelation that are essential to be believed if the true gospel may easily be prevented and men led astray into fatal errors then surely it would seem important that the essentials of this true gospel be collected together and that a man be enquired whether he assent to them before the church receives him into her bosom as a new creature in Christ Jesus as one who will contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the Saints.

But some one will ask since the bible contains all the essentials of salvation and all have agreed in making this the standard by which every doctrine is to be tried why is it necessary to have any other creed than merely to enquire whether the person believe the bible? I reply that a man may assent in general terms to the truth I sent in general terms the truth of the bible we yet denies most of the fundamental doctrines it contains. Those passages that teach them he may say are obscure or wrongly translated or he may explain them away - nay he may say that the bible as a whole is true and yet believe that only a small part of it is inspired. Take the case mentioned in the text. The false teachers among the Galatians did not deny the bible they only perverted it: yet Paul declares them accursed. And surely they were not proper persons to belong to the Church of Christ. So the false teachers mentioned by Peter as bringing in damnable heresies unawares acknowledged no doubt the truth of scripture and professed to take it as their guide. Men often have a form of godliness but deny the power thereof. And the object of creed is to detect such and prevent them from leading others to ruin. Creeds indeed have often been productive of mischief because men here have added nonessentials to them - in there is it is well known a strong prejudice against them. But their object is to assist in determining whether in the view of charity a man is a Christian and although some have the effrontery to declare before God and man that they believe such and such things when they do not yet a man will be more unwilling and unlikely to make such an acknowledgment than he will to make a general confession of this belief in the bible and therefore they tend when they contain no more than the plain fundamentals of the gospel to keep the church pure and do not debase the reception of those whom Christ has received - and who wishes others to belong to the church.

7. I infer from the text that believers are bound to refuse (cannot in conscience admit to) Christian fellowship to those who deny the essential doctrines of the gospel.

By not admitting to Christian Fellowship I mean that the members of the church cannot conscientiously receive such an one to their communion and that the ministers of Christ cannot in faithfulness to their Master invite to a participation and exchange of public services one who denies the essentials of the gospel. And this refusal of fellowship is founded on the plain principle that if it be granted the Christian acknowledges at once that the man maintains no fundamental errors. The moment a man is admitted to the communion of a church - that church acknowledges at once that he is a Christian and consequently that he maintains no error that will destroy the soul. For if one man maintaining opinions fundamentally erroneous be admitted to communion every other man must be and thus the distinction between the church and the world as at once annihilated - that is to say the church is annihilated. And if a minister of Christ exchange pulpit services with anyone that moment he acknowledges that man to maintain all the essentials of religious faith. For by the act of exchange he recommends this man as a teacher to whom they may listen without endangering the salvation of their souls. Thus suppose a minister of Christ exchange pulpit services with one who denies the necessity of a change of heart by the Spirit of God in order to salvation. After this act it would be practically useless for this minister to come before his people and urge the doctrine of regeneration as absolutely essential to salvation: for by the exchange he had acknowledged that one who denied that doctrine maintained no essential errors. And his people therefore would believe or not believe the doctrine just as they pleased or rather they would follow the bent of their inclinations and disbelieve it since their minister had acknowledged that men might deny it and yet go to heaven. And the same reasoning will apply to the doctrine of atonement or any other that is fundamental.

From this brief and imperfect discussion I deduce two or three conclusions.

1. We learn to discriminate between true and specious charity.

True charity requires us to be exclusive when the Bible is - that is to require in a man who seeks admission to church fellowship a belief of all we deem essential in the Gospel while we exercise the largest charity in respect to everything nonessential.

Specious charity makes no distinction between things essential and nonessential and opens its arms to men of every variety of opinion from the bold infidelity of Theodore Parker to the fine points of John Calvin.

2. We see how unreasonable is the wide spread prejudice against creeds.

They are the chief means the church has a defending herself against the inroads of fatal errors...Have been abused...But if they had not been a barrier to error they would not be so hated.

3. We see from the subject that it is an unfavourable symptom to be troubled with doubts about the fundamental principles of the Gospel.

Doubts and difficulties maybe exposed at the beginning of the Christian course but with the mature believer ought to be immoveably established as to all essential truths.

4. How gratifying to know how firm a foundation we have to rest upon when we come into near view of death.

We need then something more than a cunningly devised fable or conjecture which may be true or not.

The foundation of God standeth sure.

Paul knew in whom he had believed.

[This appears to be the end of this sermon. Eight pages follow this, all of which have been crossed out in pencil and may represent previous versions of the sermon; they are not transcribed and have not been read.]

=====

[Six pages follow, all on gray paper, the pages slightly smaller than the rest; these may represent a separate sermon or an alternative ending for this sermon.]

In conclusion of this subject I would call upon all who are battling between the opinions no longer to delay making up their minds what are the essential principles of the Gospel and then to maintain them with the firmness and independance manifested by Paul and the other apostles. It is customary I know to regard such decision of character in this matter as a mark of bigotry and uncharitableness and the great effort at this day among the enemies of religion is to turn popular opinion against those who have definite religious opinions and are determined to maintain them by calling them illiberal narrow minded and the like. But I will not therefore shrink from spreading the truth before you. For until you do settle it in your mind what are the essential doctrines of the Bible I have no hope of your conversion or salvation. For it is only by the truth of God that you can be made a new creature and should you be converted and have no settled creed you can do little for the promotion of religion but will be made a mere tool in the hands of the crafty enemies of the truth for condemning the Gospel. It is indeed delightful to repose on the silken couch of unbelief and to listen to the silver trumpet of error praising your liberality and freedom from bigotry and narrow minded intolerance. But forget not I beseech you that solemn declaration which the meek Son of God uttered once in thunder tones. He that believeth shall be saved, he that believeth not shall be damned. Depend upon it that this is no idle declaration for the same being who uttered it will be your final judge and it will avail you nothing to plead before him that you could not make up your mind as to the doctrines of the bible that you were sustained in your scepticism by many men of great talents and excellent character who would have denounced your bigotry and liberality as well as ignorance had you adopted and defended the narrow and repulsive doctrines advocated by Paul. In spite of such a plea your judge will reiterate the solemn declaration, he that believeth not the Son shall not see life but the wrath of God abideth on him. The fearful and unbelieving shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death.

[Four final pages follow, also on the smaller, gray paper]

In the secular literature of our day and in some of our religious literature it is common to represent the religion of the bible as an unsettled and uncertain system which differ men of equally good talents and equally sincere will understand differently. The particular religious theories which a man adopts will depend upon his prejudices his education his social position and other circumstances and not at all upon the fact that the Gospel contains one and only one system of doctrine clearly revealed. This uncertainty is not confined to the less important doctrines but characterizes them all. Hence religion cannot depend upon the belief of any particular set of dogmas but lies in the feelings of the heart and may exist with every variety of creed. Indeed there is no reason to suppose that God would confine all true religion to that narrow channel of the Jewish nation and doubtless the true religion of the heart may insist with every sort of belief whether pagan Mohammedan or Christian. It is also great narrowness of views and want of knowledge of the world to suppose that Christianity is the only form of religion that is acceptable and good and still greater bigotry not to acknowledge all in a Christian land who receive the bible as true Christians entitled to our fellowship. To make out a particular set of doctrines as a creed and require others to subscribe to it as a condition of our church membership is the height of narrow mindedness. In this assault upon creeds many Christian men unite and would gladly sweep them from the church and let every man judge for himself whether is entitled to a place at the communion. Indeed no men are regarded with more aversion than those who contend that there is in the bible only one definite set of doctrines that men should be required to believe these before the church should admit his claims to the Christian character.

Such views as these meet us almost every where at the present day and are peculiarly fascinating to the young who naturally hate everything narrow and exclusive and who have not learned that while Christianity exercises the largest charity on all unessential points...

[Opposite cover]...is yet more exclusive in demanding a belief of all essential doctrines and a correspondent practice. My object in reading this text this evening is to show how Paul regarded this matter. The passage is too plain to require any exegesis and we may therefore make it the basis of some inferences.

Sermon 151 Idolatry Part 1

[Sermon No. 151, "Idolatry, Part I" Exodus 20:3, 1823 Feb,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 10]

Exodus 20:3

Thou shalt have no other gods before me.

This verse is sometimes read by making me an emphatical word - thus, Thou shalt have no other gods before me - that is in preference to me. This meaning is undoubtedly comprehended in the verse: but whoever will look into the original Hebrew will perceive that it is not the exact nor the only sense. The words translated before me are in other places of scripture rendered in my sight in my presence that is thou shalt have no other gods in my presence. Not only shall you not prefer other gods to me, but you shall have no other gods.

In considering this important injunction which you recollect is the first commandment and I shall present before you a history of idolatry - or the worship of idols. And I shall begin with idolatry as it has existed and still exist among the heathen.

A careful examination of the several systems of idol worship that are known to us has led learned men to the conclusion that they all had a common origin. Although they afterwards grew out into various peculiar distortions and much superincumbent matter has been added to each system so as to render it distinct yet the foundation of each system has so much of resemblance that we are forced to refer them all to one original source. The ablest writers riders on this subject suppose Noah and his family and his history to have furnished the groundwork of idolatry. And they suppose that the descendants of Cush who under Nimrod the son of Cush founded the Chaldean empire a few years after the building of the tower of Babel and more than one hundred years after the deluge – these Cushites are supposed to have first introduced idolatry and it is probable that the system they established was the original root out of which have grown all the distorted and abominable idolatries the world has ever witnessed. Whether any of the antediluvians were idolaters in the sense we are now considering the scripture history does not inform us. It is not improbable however that this was among their other sins although such desperate wickedness as then prevailed one would suppose could have its origin in nothing but an atheistical apathy – a total disregard to all religions. But if idolatry did exist previous to the deluge it was rooted out of the earth by that event as those saved in the ark were all righteous. How soon after the flood idolatry was introduced the bible does not exactly inform us. It appears however from the book of Joshua that the ancestors of Abraham were idolaters. Thus saith the Lord son of God of Israel, said Joshua to the Jews, your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood in old time: even Terah the father of Abraham and the father of Nahor; and they served other gods. According to the commonly received chronology Abraham was born 352 years after the flood and as his forefathers were idolaters this will carry us back nearly to the deluge agreeing with the opinion already expressed that the Cushites were the first people who became idolaters.

There is a passage in the fifth chapter of the apocryphal book of Judith referring to the expulsion of Terah and his children out of Chaldea. This people (the Jews), says Achior, are descended of the Chaldeans. And they sojourned heretofore in Mesopotamia because they would not follow the gods of their fathers which were in the land of Chaldea. For they left the way of their ancestors and worshipped the God of heaven and the God whom they knew. So they cast them out from the face of their Gods and they fled into Mesopotamia and sojourned there many days. From this account it appears that Terah and his children among whom was Abraham were driven from Chaldea because they would not worship idols. This shows that the great body of the people were idolatrous before that period which was about 400 years after the flood.

As already observed the groundworks of idolatry maybe found in the history of Noah and his family. That tremendous catastrophe by which the earth was covered by a deluge of waters must have left a deep impression on the minds of the survivors and have been handed down by tradition to every succeeding generation. And in after times men would be led to regard the character of their forefather Noah with the greatest reverence as being alone of all the millions of mankind found worthy to be saved from the universal ruin. As the distance in time from the event increased the history of the human mind proves their respect and veneration would increase and the history of the deluge be magnified and it is nothing strange if in the process of years his descendants should be led to regard Noah as more than human and finally to exalt him to the character of God. He would then be regarded as a proper object of worship and when Noah had a divine character thus bestowed upon him it would be natural in a similar manner to deify his sons and all his family. And when once man had admitted the idea of a plurality of gods there would be no limits to their multiplication of these imaginary divinities. The sun moon and stars being conspicuous objects would strongly excite their attention and an active imagination would invest them with intelligence and divinity - and at length these would become objects of worship. Nor would the fancy stop here but every distinguished man would not long after his death be encircled with the attributes of a God and so far was the deification of eminent warriors statesmen and philanthropists carried that in the early periods of Grecian history no less than thirty thousand accounted as divinities.

But imagination would not rest satisfied with exalting to the state and office of gods distinguished men and striking objects of nature. It fancied a presiding divinity over every village every habitation every stream every lake every forest every tree and every individual whether man and animal or plant. For a time perhaps men really thought of the spirit which they fancied to reside in their various objects but soon an effort will be made to represent the god they worshipped to represent to the senses by the construction of images and at length they would imagine the objects themselves or the images to be real gods rather and to all the absurdity of idolatry they added the grossness of materialism. They changed the glory of the incompatible God into an image made like to corruptible man and to birds and beasts and creeping things. Indeed every material object in the heavens above and the earth beneath - even the most common tools and instruments of labour the axe the hose the wheel the loom the last the awl, etc., have been in some nations regarded as divinities and worship is even at this day in some parts of the world paid to such senseless deities. Nay more than this the vilest of human passions have been exalted into gods and worship in all heathen lands has been paid to devils! In one nation now existing on earth there are reckoned up no less than 333 millions of divinities who are worshiped! So prolific is idolatry!

That all these monstrous systems of heathenism began with the deification of Noah and his family cannot be doubted by any one who will thoroughly examine the subject will find a multitude of allusions in the symbols and ceremonies and objects of commemoration among them all plainly pointing out Noah and his three sons and the number of his whole family - as also their singular preservation - and the deluge - the ark the dove and the branch of the olive. And although the modern systems of idolatry have superadded to these ten thousand extravagancies yet these original allusions are not entirely hidden but appear amid the rubbish.

It appears then that polytheism is a monster that multiplies itself ten thousand fold and gathers deformity and odiousness with age. In its youth it is hateful in the view of heavens and in its more advanced stages it is intolerable and abominable.

As to the extent of idolatry in the world it has been awfully great. From the plains of Shinar it spread rapidly to the east and the west the north and the south until Canaan alone remained with the knowledge of the true God. Polished Greece and Rome as well as barbarous Parthia and Africa were full of the gross and polluted worship of imaginary divinities. Satan reigned uncontrolled over these regions of darkness taking to himself that service and worship which was due to God. For wherever idols are worshipped - there in fact Satan is worshipped (under another name). And even in Judea there seems to have been an almost unconquerable disposition to fall away from the worship of one God and adopt the absurdities of the surrounding heathen. And against no other sins are the Jews in the law of God guarded so scrupulously as against idol worship and against no other does God hold forth so aggravated and certain a punishment. Yet still we find from the Jewish history that notwithstanding all these prohibitions that people were almost constantly reverting to idolatry. Witness the construction of the molten calf at the very moment when the glory of the true God sat on the mount before them like a consuming fire. And witness the groves and high places that were so often and so long made the seat of the worship of the gods of the heathen. Even Solomon himself was drawn away by women to the worship of Ashtoreth the goddess of the Sidonians and of Milcom the abomination of the Ammonites.

Not many centuries after Christ idolatry insinuated itself into the Christian church. Images were multiplied in all services and came at length to be worshiped as gods and the whole world wondered after the beast. Gentilism and Christianity were mixed together in a most disgusting manner and a degree of consumption followed which rivaled the polluted records of heathenism, and even to this day alas! That same worship binds millions of souls in a Netherdom more horrid than that of the grossest heathenism.

Those parts of the world that are not only in reality but nominally heathen idolaters comprehend a large proportion of it. Out of 800 millions of our race not less than 500 million are pagans sunk in all the depths of idolatry - while not more than 100 millions are even nominally Christians with the exception of the idolatrous Catholics. How powerful is the current that leads men astray from the true God! How is the understanding darkened by the blindness of the heart!

But after all the manner in which heathen worship has been generally performed is the most terrific part of its history. To them almost numberless gods temples were erected and priests were ordained to offer sacrifices upon the altars and shining sacrifices and nations were demanded for each deity and prayers and praises were offered to each. But among all those prayers not one was ever put up for moral good. All were confined to temporal enjoyments while the soul that most needy part of the man was forgotten.

The offerings that were made to these deities gradually became more and more impressive. Originally the victims were not much unlike those under the Jewish dispensation: but they were soon increased in numbers an hundredfold and the costlier the offering the more certain were have the votaries of the blessings they crave. Soon however they proceeded a step farther and nothing would appease these sanguinary divinities but human sacrifices. I could open to your view that temples of the ancient Mexicans and show you the altars streaming every year with the blood of 20,000 human beings. I could point you to the bloody shrines of the Peruvians and you would see 12,000 infants devoted in a single sacrifice. I could turn your eyes to a Hindustan and you would see the fires of 2000 funeral tires blowing around the dying widow every year – or bid you look on the carcasses of self immolated victims that float down the Ganges - or uncover before you the plains of Juggernaut whitened with the bones of thousands there devoted to appease the fury of an imaginary malignant demon. Or I might point you to the African mothers casting forth their infants to the tigers and the vultures or open before you the stalls of India when youth are fattening for the altar. And we all remember the valley of Hinnom where the Canaanites cast their tender infants into the fire as a sacrifice to Moloch!

No my heroes these are not pictures of the imagination. They are facts as well attested as any fact whatever. They are the genuine fruits of idolatry - the legitimate consequence the just punishment of neglecting the true God and not liking to retain him in their knowledge.

But the loss of a few thousand lives yearly among the heathens is not the worst consequence of their religion even in this life. It debases and pollutes the soul. It gives a license to all manner of iniquity. It opens the floodgates of sin and the deluge of lust, fraud, rapine oppression, deception, cruelty and murder rush over the world in a frightful and resistless inundation. It lets loose superstition and bigotry cruel as the grave to have an iron scepter over the prostrate world and the mind is chained down to all the grossness of matter and becomes incapable of receiving any enlarged enobling abstract ideas. It is made the slave of a wretched priestcraft and submits to the most distressing pilgrimages and panaceas and the foolish hope of thereby seeing the favour of heaven.

Such is idolatry among the heathen. I might swell the picture until your hearts would melt at their condition: but I have already contributed enough for my present purpose. Indeed this part of the subject has occupied so much time that the remainder must be deferred till the afternoon. But before I close permit me to deduce a few inferences from what has been said.

And first infer from the history of heathen idolatry that all knowledge of the true God that ever existed in the world was communicated by revelation.

Philosophers may talk much of discovering the existence and attributes of God in his works. But the truth is none of them ever made any such discovery. Evidences indeed exist overwhelming evidences of the existence and perfection of God in creation so that men are without excuse if they see them not. But history shows us that the religion of man by nature is idolatry. Kings philosophers and sages when a voice is not spoken to them from heaven have all joined in this senseless this debasing worship. The Grecian and Roman philosophers who have delivered some correct sentiments concerning the Deity probably derived the clew to their notions from original revelations through the Jews are the traditions of Egypt.

The world by wisdom knew not God! This inspired sentence is engraven on the whole history of man. I read it in every kingdom under heaven where the light of revelation has not shone. I read it in the history of the apostasies of the Israelites themselves - I read it in the sickening history of the Catholic Church. There is a voice from the east – a voice from the west - a voice from the north - and a voice from the south exclaiming the world by wisdom knew not God.

2. I infer from the history of heathen idolatry the necessity of divine revelation.

This is the only charm that can break the bands of idolatry asunder - this the only source from which light can arise upon a benighted world. This the only power that can redeem the soul from the most degrading of all services - the most beastly and abominable of all vices. After a residence of a more than twenty years in Hindustan Mr. Ward declares that he had never seen a single individual who appeared to fear God and work righteousness. Until the bible comes with its purifying and refreshing light man will remain sunk lower much lower than the brutes. This only can unclothe the firm grasp Satan has on the minds of men and let the oppressed free. Civilization, science, literature, philosophy without the bible serves only to varnish over those moral sepulchres which are still full of dead men's bones and all manner of consumption corruption.

Blessed be God then that life and immortality are brought to light by the Gospel. Praised be the God of all mercies that this blessed book has eradicated the sanguinary rites of heathenism from our shores and taught us the existence and worship of the one only living and true God in spirit and in truth.

3. We derive from the history of heathen idolatry overwhelming evidence of the awful depravity of man.

On this subject permit me to quote the eloquent language of a late distinguished writer -

This subject, says he, perhaps more than any other, holds out to our view a wonderful exhibition of the depravity of the human heart. What sight can be more strange, more humiliating, more debasing, to an intelligent nature, than that of rational and immortal minds, originally virtuous as they came from the hand of God, destined to the possession of endless life, and formed for such noble and sublime purposes, prostrating themselves not only before the sun, and moon, and the host of heaven, but before men, evil spirits, visionary beings, animals, vegetables, blocks of wood, and figures of stone! All these beings, such minds have converted into Deities; and falling down before them, have said unto them, Deliver us: for ye are our gods. Is not beyond measure amazing, to see a human being, a rational, immortal being, go into a forest; cut down a tree; transport it home on a wagon; burn one part of it on his hearth; hew, and carve another part of it into an idol; and call it a God! Is it not amazing, to see such a man confessing himself inferior to a stock, fashioned by his own hands, acknowledging his dependence on it for life, his blessings, and his hopes; placing his trust in it; building to it temples; erecting altars; and offering up to it prayers and praises! Is it not more amazing to behold the same man sacrificing living victims to a mass of wood; rational victims; nay, more, youths of the noblest families, the brightest talents, and the fairest hopes; nay, more still, his own beloved offspring; the children of his own bowels!

To complete this dreadful picture of human depravity, the whole Christian world, with few, very few exceptions, was, for many centuries, buried and lost in this stupid, shameful, monstrous worship. The progeny of Noah, who began this unnatural defection from their Creator, became Idolaters, while the waves of the Deluge had hardly ceased to roar around this wasted world. The Jews became Idolaters at the foot of Sinai, beneath the thunders of the Almighty. The Christian world became Idolaters, when the Redeemer was in a sense bleeding on the cross before their eyes. How debased, then, how sinful, how miserable, a being is man! (Dwight)

Sermon 152 Idolatry Part 2

[Sermon No. 152, "Idolatry, Part II" Exodus 20:3, 1823 Feb,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 10]

Exodus 20:3

Thou shall have no other gods before me.

[In the last few paragraphs Hitchcock talks about a deceased parishioner and warns all of the approach of death.]

In the morning I presented from this text a history of heathen idolatry. And who of us was there that did not feel an abhorrence of the disgraceful and beastly and bloody worship of false gods? Who did not feel as if the existence of idolatry indicted a state of society the most depraved and corrupt and hateful? Who did not shrink from the thought of being an idolater and thank God that he was not of the number?

But is it true my hearers that we are altogether free from this sin and that the text has no application to us? What is idolatry? I made no attempt to explain the term in the morning because everyone knows what it means when applicable to the heathen. But the worship of the pagan divinities is but one variety of idolatry and by no means comprehends the whole of it. Every object upon which men bestow supreme regard or affections is in the strict scriptural sense an idol. Stubbornness is called idolatry by Samuel as is covetousness by Paul and indeed the term is really applicable to all sin. For idolatry consists in preferring anything to God: and sin consists in a preference of ones self to all other beings.

The text then has a most important bearing upon us in a Christian land: nay it applies to the most advanced Christian. For to love desire or expect good from any forbidden indulgence even in the smallest degree is a violation of it. Nay more whatever does not consist with the most perfect love submission and obedience to God is evidently to have some other god in the sight of Jehovah. It is choosing something else in preference to him.

I feel prepared then to assert in the first place that idolatry in Christian lands is exceedingly prevalent.

The ambitious man he idolizes his fame or station or power. He sets up one on the other of these or all of them as the objects before which he bows with reverence and delight. It is not because no other man ever acquired so fame or power or reached so exalted a station: but it is because they are his own. God is infinitely greater and more powerful: yet he does not take as much interest in his greatness as in his own: that is he prefers himself to God. To the promotion of his famed talents to those of every other being. He spends month after month and year after year in the ardent and persevering acquisition of human knowledge sacrificing to this his health the vigour of his days and all the enjoyments of life: while perhaps the glorious attributes of Jehovah awaken within him but little interest and the eternal joys of heaven hold out no charms for him. What heathen devotee is more faithful to his god than such a man is to the divinity he adores!

The accomplished man idolizes his manners. He is more anxious to appear well in the sight of man than in the sight of God. It would mortify him beyond measure to be guilty of a clownish act before the world but it would bring no blush upon his cheek to be guilty of neglecting that attention to God and his ordinances which God demands. He would notice with more disgust and aversion the breach of a punctilio of politeness than he would a violation of the law of God. He therefore is in idolater.

The person who fancies herself to be beautiful idolizes her form or her face. Suppose for illustration such a person to come into the house of God professedly to engage in his worship. She will be reflecting more upon her appearance in the sight of man than in the sight of God. She will be more anxious in that sacred place to please the eye of man than the eye of God: and be more mortified to fail in attracting the favourable attention of the former than the latter. Is not this setting up an idol even in the sanctuary of Jehovah?

Another person idolizes his dress. His thoughts run more upon it than upon religious objects. He spends more time in preparing and adjusting his dress than he does in preparing his soul for appearing before God and he takes more notice in others of a deficiency in the garments they wear than a deficiency of love to God. What is he but an idolater? And how does he differ in the view of God from the senseless heathen who falls down and worships a block of wood?

The ostentatious man idolizes his equipage. Describe to him the uncreated opinions of the Godhead - tell him of the glories of heaven and of its golden streets and of the golden throne of God and the Lamb and he manifests the most sottistic indifference. But speak to him of his elegant carriage - of his noble houses - of his splendid habitation - describe to him the brilliancy of a ballroom - the saloon and the assembly - and you will strike a string to which every feeling of his soul vibrates. The South Sea Islander (Ostrychean) worships the plume of an ostrich in the head of his chief god - and wherein do these two persons differ in the sight of heaven?

This sensualist idolizes his pleasures. The glutton as the apostle says makes a god of his belly and consecrates more to its service than he does to the living God. The intemperate drunkard makes a god of the intoxicating cup and sacrifices to this without scruple his health his reputation, the comfort of his friends and finally his life. The debaucher pays his adorations and sacrifices heart health and life to the vilest of idols. What is all this my hearers but worshiping devils!

Again very many idolize their friends. The child places more confidence in its parents than in God that he may please them. The wife relies more upon the kindness and protection of her husband than upon the providence of God: and the doting husband worships and serves his wife more faithfully than he does the God in whom he lives and moves. The parent becomes so strongly attached to his child as to forget that God has a better right to it than himself. He wishes to monopolize it to himself. He fancies great comfort will be derived from it in future years and looks forward perhaps to the period of old age when it will be the staff on which he can lean. In a word he loves the child better than he loves God and places his dependance there more than upon God. But says Christ, he that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; and that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me. He has chosen his object of worship and God will not have a rival. He demands the supreme affections of the heart or he will have none. And therefore when we thus transfer the affections due to God to a mere gift of God it is a gross idolatry and no wonder God often takes from us the idol in which we trusted that we may be led to fix our affections on him. And woe be to us if such be not the effect.

Finally the Christian sometimes idolizes his attainments in religion. He fancies that he possesses certain gifts about his fellow Christians and he feels proud of them as if by the strength of his arm he had done it or by his wisdom. To this fancied superiority he transfers his worship imagining all the while that he is serving God and striving to promote his glory when in fact he is only feeding spiritual pride. This is one of the deepest and most successful delusions of Satan.

And now my hearers who of us is free from all these various idolatrous practices? Who is there in Christian lands that is free? The real believer indeed does not habitually and knowingly indulge does not knowingly indulge himself in preferring the creature to the Creator. But still he feels an occasional inordinate attachments to forbidden objects and thus constitutes idolatry - this is having other gods in the presence of Jehovah. And the impenitent man is uniformly and habitually and voluntarily an idolater.

In the second place I remark that idolatry in Christian lands incurs peculiarly aggravated guilt.

The heathen have their ignorance - their early education and universal example to plead in behalf of their worship of false gods. And there certainly are in the view of man mitigating circumstances but you and I my hearers have nothing to plead in extenuation of our idolatry. We have line upon line and precept here a little there a little so clear that we cannot mistake the meaning and so reasonable that we cannot gainsay it, urging us by a thousand motives to give our supreme affections to God. We have the holy Scriptures opened before us in which the most tremendous repeated threatenings and punishments against every species of worldly mindedness (worldliness) stare us full in the face. We are early instructed to love God supremely and to subordinate every desire and every affection to his will and although we see multitudes serving Mammon still here and there are examples before us of steady faithful devotedness to God - sufficiently numerous indeed to take away every shadow of excuse for our idolatry on the score of example. In short if we do prefer the creature to the Creator after all the light that shines upon us the doom that awaits us will be unspeakably awful. For the punishment of sinners in another world will be in direct proportion to the degree of light they have resisted here. Jesus said unto them, if ye were blind ye should have no sin: but now ye say, we see: therefore your sin remaineth. To whom much is given of much will be required. Woe unto thee Chorazin! Woe unto thee Bethsaida! For is the mighty works, which were done in you, had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes.

[Several lines are crossed out here in pen.]

In the third place I assert that many in Christian lands sacrifice more to the false gods they worship than the heathen do to their divinities.

Do the heathen endure long penances as an act of devotion - practicing the most patient self - denial? What penance what self - denial can be greater than those exercised by the avaricious man to acquire property? Do the heathen submit to the most degrading services to please their divinities? Where among them can be found any that are more beastly and polluting than the deeds of the glutton the drunkard or the adulterer? Do the heathen sacrifice their comfort their prosperity their health and even life to appease the vengeance of their gods? So does the ambitious man - so does the sensualist.

In all sacrifices of a worldly nature then heathen idolaters and Christian idolaters are on a level. Wherein then do they differ? I mean not here to discuss the future condition of the heathen: but it is certain that the heathen have no idea that their worship of idols will ruin their souls forever and involve them in eternal woe. And therefore they cannot be said to have voluntarily sacrificed their immortal interest to the idols. But the man who in a Gospel land is an idolater - the man who loves this world in any of its forms more than he loves God, does knowingly and deliberately and voluntarily sacrifice his never dying soul to the God he worships. He is told every Sabbath he is told every day – the bible tells him - the ministers of Christ tell him - conscience tells him - the spirit of God tells him that if he love the world supremely he loses forever loses his soul. He knows certainly that ruin awaits him that he is risking on the thick bosses of the buckles of Almighty God, that God is angry with him every day and will ere long cast him into a wine press to be trodden down by His fierceness and wrath. Yet he does offer all this immense sacrifice upon the altar of his Moloch! Tell us no more of the cruelties of the heathen - tell us no more all the fires of the funeral pile – of the car of Juggernaut – of the bloody Ganges - of the cruel mothers casting forth their infants to appease the fury of their imaginary deities. Here is a cruelty before which theirs softens into mercy. Here is a sacrifice cleaner than all the wealth of India – of more value than this whole world - of more value than this whole universe - the sacrifice of an immortal soul. Disappear all other instances of infatuation: here is a madness which makes every thing else sober reason.

And where are those to be found who are thus sacrificing to idols all that is precious in another world? They meet us in every street - they come with us to the house of God - they dwell in our own neighborhood - they are members of our families – they are our fathers or our mothers our wives or our husbands our children our companions and neighbors. They are those who are to us the dearest objects on earth bound to us by all the ties of material and acquired affection. Yet they are living without God and without hope. They are worshiping idols and therefore sacrificing their souls. And it might be too that we are ourselves among the infatuated number. Perhaps we too are idolaters in such a sense that we are the enemies of God.

And is there no argument that is powerful enough to break the fatal chain. Cannot the voice of God be heard amid our fatal delusions? Will we close our ears to the warnings of that Being whose thunders will ere long make the earth reel and stagger and hell herself shake her lowest foundations. That Being has said that no man can serve two masters - that we cannot serve God and Mammon – that the friendship of the world is enmity with God - that if any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him. But how often has every Christian - how often has every sinner read these most solemn and alarming declarations and yet gone forth unawakened to the service of idols? How often have we all with these words and the words of the text sounding in our ears turned immediately to the pursuit of the riches honors or pleasures of the world crying out to them by our practice (the loudest of all language), these be our gods! And if these declarations of Almighty God have been so often disregarded by us they will probably be disregarded by us to day.

But my hearers the providence of God has put into my hands today a new and unexpected argument to persuade you to abandon the worship of idols. Death has come among us to assist to day in pleading the cause of God. From yonder coffin there comes a voice to tell us the vanity of the world: to show us that there is nothing on earth worthy our supreme regard - I hear that voice and he that hath an ear let him hear what the dead says to the living crying out - cursed is the man that trusteth in man and maketh flesh his arm and whose heart departeth from the Lord. Vanity of vanities all is vanity. He whose mortal remains are before us had lived long enough to try the world in its earliest and its latest periods - in childhood and old age. He knew it is prosperity and adversity. And when at last he came to the closing scene what testimony did he bear to the worth of the world? Did he find its riches honors or pleasures to be the solace and support of a dying hour? No: it was Jesus after whom he panted. It was Jesus who was then precious to his soul. It was Jesus on whom we trust he learned. None but Jesus - none but Jesus was his language and his feelings in his dying moments. Every idol which we are now pursuing so fondly and eagerly appeared to him then to be vanity and the lie.

And to this same state in which we see our friend - to the coffin - to the grave we are all rapidly advancing. Approach then his coffin ye who are gray-headed and are worshipping some worldly idol. Approach and tremble at the end which awaits you if have no Jesus on whom to lean in a dying hour. Approach ye afflicted mourners! And as you gaze at your lifeless friend solemnly ask yourselves whether you love any thing better than you love Christ. And should you find yourselves clinging to some idol let this day see you bursting away from its worship and forsaking everything for Christ. Let Christ reign supreme in your affections that you may reign with him in glory. Approach ye whose souls are bound up in pursuit of wealth - and as you there see the end of all flesh remember that, as you brought nothing into the world so it is certain you can carry nothing out of it. Approach ye who are seeking the praise of men more than the praise of God and say when you come to lie like this our friend cold in the coffin of what avail to you though your names be sounded all over the earth? Of what avail if Jesus be not your friend. Approach ye who are pursuing forbidden pleasures thou glutton - thou drunkard - thou adulterer - thou bacchanalian - approach and remember that death stands ready to cut you down also: and that hell is waiting to receive you except you abandon your polluted and debasing idols.

Oh my hearers what strange what inconsistent beings we are! We acknowledge that the world is a delusive phantom – an idle dream - and yet we hug it to our bosoms as if it were our supreme God. We confess that riches are unsatisfying and incapable of yielding any permanent enjoyment, and yet we are as eager after them as if nothing were preferable. We confess the praise of men to be a mere puff of air and yet we strive for it more earnestly than we strive for heaven - and cast away our souls rather than fail of possessing it. We agree that worldly pleasures in the end bit like a serpent and sting like an adder yet we pursue after them with unceasing greediness. We acknowledge that God is worthy to be loved and served supremely: and yet we worship idols. We love the creature more than the Creator. We are certain that death is not far distant from any one of us: and we know that every thing earthly will then be no better to lean upon than a spiders web: yet we live as if the world were every thing and religion nothing. When O when will these inconsistencies cease? When shall we resolve to have no other gods but the living and true God? May the Spirit of God by his constraining and irresistible influences tear away our affections from every false god from this false world. For if we strive any longer to serve God and Mammon God will forever abandon us and we shall call on Mammon in vain to save us from the wrath that is to come.

Sermon 153 Consideration

[Sermon No. 153, "Consideration," Psalm 4:2, 1823 Mar,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 11]

Psalms 4:2

To deduce a sermon from a passage of scripture which to most readers does not seem to contain any important truth is not generally a commendable practice. Such passages however make a deeper impression on the memory than others and as we are greatly helped in our recollection by association if the text of a discourse be suggested to our memory we shall be apt to remember something of the discourse. On this account such texts if they really contain any important doctrine or precept are valuable although to use them continually would make them cease to be uncommon or striking.

The word which I have chosen at this time for a text is one about the meaning of which several opinions have been expressed. It is found 77 times in the bible - 74 of which occur in the Psalms and then in Habakkuk. One of the most probable of these opinions is that the word signified a pause or rest in singing - or a pause in the sense. We find it however most commonly put at the conclusion of an important or striking sentence and hence some have inferred that it was intended to quicken the attention of the singer or hearer to what had just been said. There is at least a probability that this might have been one of the uses of the word. And in this sense I shall regard it at this time. I shall suppose the word to be a mark by which the reader is called upon to praise and look back upon what he has read and attentively consider its truth and importance. And I shall not apply it to any particular passage but consider it as written at the close of the whole bible - at the close of every chapter at the close of every verse. For in fact reason conscience and God's spirit have written Selah in this sense on every sentence of this sacred book. And it is the neglect of this word - it is a want of consideration that prevents so many in a gospel land from believing and embracing it. We all read the holy scriptures: but worldly care worldly temptations - violent or corrupt passions and strong prejudices prevent our pausing at the conclusion and solemnly enquiring what we have read and how it applies to us. My object in this discourse is to urge all my hearers notwithstanding And others and as we are greatly helped in our recollections by association notwithstanding these obstructions to pause at the conclusion of every chapter and verse of the bible they read them seriously and candidly reflect upon it.

In the first place I urge every reader of the bible to pause and consider that this book carries with it a divine authority.

All scripture is given by inspiration of God. Holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. What they spoke therefore and committed to writing is to be regarded in a very different light from the language of uninspired men. When we read a human composition we may believe or disbelieve adopt or reject the sentiments it contains with impunity so far as authority is concerned. But the bible carries with it a divine authority. The seal of God who cannot lie is set to it. Thus saith the Lord is prefixed to every doctrine and every precept it contains and this warrant gives them a claim to our acceptance that can be possessed by no other writing. It is not our option to receive or reject believe or disbelieve as we shall please. We are bound implicitly to believe every truth that sacred book contains and to practice every duty it enjoins. When for instance God says, My Son give me thy heart, to refuse compliance is to resist the express will of God - it is to erect a standard of rebellion against omnipotence - it is to stand forth in the view of the universe an obstinate enemy of God. Christ has commanded all men in a Christian land to confess him before the world and to sit down at his table. To neglect a compliance with this command is to oppose our wills to his - it is to declare by our conduct before angels and men that in our particular case this command is unjust or improper it is voluntarily to expose ourselves to the execution of the sentence pronounced upon such that they shall be denied in the presence of God and angels in a future world. God has required of us whether we eat or drink or whatever we do to do all to his glory. And if we do not comply - if we seek our own glory instead of his we cut ourselves off from all hope of acceptance with him. We incur and that voluntarily all the threatenings the bible contains.

And the bible comes to us with a claim to our belief not only in the grand essentials of the religion it contains but in everything it contains. It is all the word of God and therefore one part of it is as true as another. There is no one doctrine. There is no one precept in that book which may be knowingly and deliberately disbelieved or set aside. We may not all understand every minor point alike: but in the sense we do understand them we must believe them. Christians for instance are commanded not to jest with one another - and whoever regards this as an unnecessary precept and willfully neglect it sets at nought the authority and calls in question the wisdom and offers insult to the majesty of the eternal and Almighty God. After we have once acknowledged that the bible is revelation it is no excuse for us to say that such or such a thing in it appears unreasonable inconsistent unnecessary or unimportant. For we ought to remember that the foolishness of God is wiser than men and that when we call in question the truth of anything contained in the bible we call into question in fact the veracity and wisdom of God.

It is greatly to be feared that this irreverence for the bible is too common even with many who profess to believe it. It is too often looked upon with that same kind of jealousy and curious criticism with which many human productions are viewed. It is an age in which men are solicitors to learn the reason of every doctrine and precept and whatever does carry with it the evidences of a moral demonstration meets with but a poor reception. This inquisitive spirit is in general commendable: but there is great danger lest it lead men to forget the reverence they owe the scriptures and cause them to view the bible as a work of man and not the work of God. But surely we ought to be extremely cautious that we do not forget this - since if our sense of its authority be lessened proportionally reduced will be our confidence in it and our submission to it. You listen with much more deference to the opinion of a learned man than an ignorant man. You would regard that man censorable who did not pay a still higher deference to the opinion of an angel or an archangel - and when God speaks therefore his words ought to command our most unreserved and hearty and reverential acceptance. To treat with disrespect the writings of a learned and candid man is a proof of great self-sufficiency and folly - to regard with like intemperance with the like irreverence the words of an angel would be the height of folly - but to have no peculiar respect for the word of God is infatuation is downright madness.

In the second place I would urge every reader of the bible to pause and reflect that this book contains the terms and the only terms of his salvation.

The language of that book is There is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we can be saved but the name of Jesus. He that believeth shall be saved he that believeth not shall be damned. The bible proceeds on the idea that men are all rebels against heaven - that all have revolted from the authority of God - that all stand by nature in the attitude of enemies lifting up the standard of defiance against heaven. It concludes us all under sin and declares that we are by nature the children of wrath even as others. We are told that God in Christ (came into the world) is reconciling the world as a Mediator unto himself to reconcile us to God. Now there is no such thing as a reconciliation where there is no enmity. And in the Scriptures are contained the terms definitely stated on which we can make our peace with God. There is no obscurity resting on these terms. Who can mistake for instance the meaning of this article of the terms - except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish - God now commandeth all men everywhere to repent. Or this article, except a man enter be born of water and the spirit he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven. Or this article, he that believeth it hath everlasting life: but he that believeth not shall never see life but the wrath of God abideth on him. Or this article, he that denieth me before man him will I also deny before my Father and before his angels or this article without holiness no man shall see the Lord.

All these articles are so plain that they are not to be misunderstood. And let the man who reads the bible pause and remember that they are the only terms on which he can enter heaven. God is not man that he should be neither the Son of Man that he should repent. Heaven and earth shall pass away but one jot one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law until all be fulfilled. The grass withereth the flower fadeth but the word of our God shall stand forever. Never will the requirements of God be lowered one iota. His terms of salvation are the most reasonable that could in consistency with his perfections be proposed and not all the powers of the earth still can procure the least alteration of them. Man must submit to them unreservedly or he must perish without remedy. The alternative is before every one of us and it will avail us nothing to close our eyes and neglect to enquire and understand what are the terms of salvation. It will avail us nothing to fancy ourselves secure by casting ourselves without complying with these terms upon the mercy of God. The truth is God has put his word into our hands containing the terms of salvation and the moment we read them sincerely and attentively as we are bound to do we cannot fail to understand them - and if we refuse compliance there is no mercy for us. Not a single ray of mercy will ever beam on an individual of our race only through the merits of Jesus Christ. To presume upon God's mercy therefore before we have submitted our hearts to the Saviour is like blindfolding our eyes and rushing down a precipice. The language of all such is no man cometh to the Father but by Christ - whosoever denieth the Son the same hath not the Father. Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid which is Christ Jesus. If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ let him be anathema - maran atha.

3. I urge the man who reads the bible to pause and consider that he has but a short time to determine whether he will accept or reject the terms of reconciliation to God which that book proposes.

Our days on earth are but as a shadow. We spend our years as a tale that is told. Every year appears to us shorter than the last and ere we are aware of it the whole of our pilgrimage will be completed. The passing day the passing hour the passing moment is all we can call our own. Yet in this space so short at longest so precarious at best we must decide whether we will live forever in heaven or in hell. This is the only period given us to accept or reject the terms of salvation God has proposed to us. In the grave whither we are all hastening there is no work nor device nor wisdom. We may fancy that many years are before us and that we may neglect to become Christians now until a future day: but this will not prevent God from swearing in his wrath that we shall never enter into his rest. We may prefer to attend to our worldly concerns a little longer and then when we have finished such or such enterprise we may hope to attend to our souls. But this will not prevent God if it be his will from calling us out of the world before that time comes. We may indulge ourselves in vague doubts about the terms of salvation: and live on year to year feeding upon these doubts: but this will not prevent the time of our probation running out - it will not persuade God to lengthen out a single moment the terms which he has given us to decide whether we will submit to Christ.

If you were in a besieged fortress and were driven to the last extremity and the conqueror were to offer you certain terms on which your lives might be spared - and give a certain number of hours in which to decide whether you would choose life or death - you would not trifle away those hours in attending to other things. You would be reading over again and again the terms sent to you and deliberating whether you could comply. But we are all in a besieged world - a world which has been fighting against God - and we are reduced to the greatest extremity. God has sent us the terms on which we can escape not temporal but eternal death and inherit not merely a temporal but eternal joys - and he demands a speedy decision from us. Death is commissioned to press us to a decision without any delay. Yes my hearers if we do not decide soon death will decide for us. The man who is crying for a little more sleep a little more slumber will soon find it impossible to sleep - for death will awaken his soul to endure eternal agony. The man who pleads a pressure of worldly cares as an excuse for neglecting religion will soon be relieved of that exercise by the hand of death removing him out of the world and then he will have time enough for reflection. Eternity will be before him and he will be reflecting about religion through all its countless ages - but it will be only to deplore that it can never be his. One man is doubting about the reality of vital religion but his doubts will soon long before he expects it be all removed by the realities of eternity. Another man is in doubt whether it is his duty to make a public profession of religion: but let him delay a little longer and death will decide the question for him. Another man doubts what denomination he ought to join and so neglects joining any - but his doubts will all be removed speedily when he lies upon the bed of death. Another man doubts whether he is under any obligation to love God tells till his grace be given to convert him: but he will not have one doubt on the subject when he lies upon a dying bed and sees himself about to enter eternity unconverted.

4. I urge every man who reads the bible to pause and consider that for every chapter for every verse of that blessed book he is soon to give an account at the bar of God.

He will there be called upon to answer whether he has believed what the bible contains and whether he has practiced what it commands. When we read human production we know there is no tribunal earthly or heavenly before which we shall be called upon to render an account of our belief or disbelief improvement or misimprovement if what it contains: and we accordingly have no sense of our accountability. And it is to be feared that too many of us read the bible with as little sense of the account we are to give of it to God. But let every man who reads a verse or chapter of the bible remember that that is not the last of it - that there is a day coming in which that verse and chapter will be reviewed. He may forget the precept or doctrine contained in the passage but God will never forget it. Why sayest thou O Jacob and speaketh O Israel my way is hid from the Lord and my judgment is passed over from my God? Hast thou not known hast thou not heard that the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth fainteth not neither is weary? There is no searching of his understanding. At the day of judgment we shall all find that though we may have forgotten the scriptures God will not have forgotten them. And he will demand of us the cause of our neglect of his word if we have neglected it. Bring forth your strong reasons will be the demand of the Judge in that awful day - the reason why when you were commanded to make you a new heart you did not comply - the reasons why when the bible commanded you to repent he did not do it - the reason why you put off a preparation for death so many years when the bible told you that now is the accepted time - now is the day of salvation - the reason why you neglected prayer when the bible directed you to pray without ceasing - the reason why you set your affections on the world when the bible commanded you to love not the world neither the things that are in the world - in find the reason for every neglect of any of the precepts of the Scriptures. And have we any reasons we shall dare offer before God - any reasons that will not make us blush - any reasons that will exterminate our? O my hearers every month will then be stopped and we shall not dare to raise one murmur against the justice of God although we feel his condemning sentence piercing through us like a two-edged sword.

In viewing the subject that has been presented before you this morning my hearers I cannot but remark that we here discover the reason why so many neglect to comply with the precepts and disbelieve the doctrines of the bible. It is because they are forgetful of the word Selah that is they do not pause to consider the consequences of disregarding and neglecting the bible. The man who is living on in an unconverted state could not rest easy a moment were to look steadily and calmly and seriously at his condition. The prayerless man would be brought upon his knees were he to stop in his worldly concern and enquire what would be the end of it. Could the thief - the liar - the profane swearer - the drunkard - the fornicator - the adulterer - the fraudulent - the slanderer - only look for a moment into hell and then remember that he doomed to that horrid world by the unalterable decree of God except he repent he would flee from his evil ways and escape for his life from the strong punishment that awaits him. But Satan contrives to prevent men from deliberating in the consequences of their conduct. He always has some bait ready to attract their attention away from themselves and thus are they prevented from being brought under conviction and alarm.

But let men only take Selah for their motto and the bible would appear a very different book and they could not go deliberately from reading its laws to a violation of them. Let a man only firmly in his mind the simple yet appalling fact that concerning his improvement of every chapter and every verse he is to pass a sentencing at the bar of God and it would serve as a chance to restrain him from the commission of known sin - and it would be a powerful stimulus to spur him forward to keep the commandments and submit himself to God. Let the scoffer only carry about with him the single word Selah and his tongue would be silent. Let the unregenerate youth who is impetuously borne along by the current of his passions despite of the counsel of friends and the warnings of the bible only treasure up this word in his memory and he would find himself stopped in his career. Let the profane hearer only utter this word and the oath would vanish from his lips. Let the liar listen to the sound of it and his utterance of falsehood would be choked. Let the intemperate man write the word upon the intoxicating bowl and his arm would be palsied and unable to life it to his mouth. Let the Sabbath breaker repeat this word in the morning and he will go to the house of God an anxious hearer. Let the fornicator or adulterer the abandoned hypocritical rotten seducer read only this word in the bible and apply it and his soul would fever with horror and his knees would smite together with fear like those of Belshazzar. Let the worldly minded man carry this word about unto him and it would throw a sickening hue over those pursuits that were so charming before.

My hearers the word Selah in the sense in which I have now exhibited it is written upon the gates of hell. These men will pause and reflect upon their conduct in the afterlife. They may pass through this world without reflecting seriously and solemnly upon the state of their souls: but the moment they are cast into a lake of fire and brimstone busy memory will look back to this world and conscience will reproach them for slighting the offers of salvation for slighting the offers of salvation for praising a phantom and neglecting solid good - a consideration upon the past upon the misspent hours will be the worm that will never die. Remember therefore sinner that if you will not pause in your mad cares in this world and reflect upon the consequences of your present course remember that an eternity of agonizing reflection awaits you. The anger of the Lord shall not return until he have executed and till he have performed the thoughts of his heart: in the latter days ye shall consider it perfectly.

Sermon 155 Divine Teaching Necessary to Induce Men to Receive Christ in His True Character.

[Sermon No. 155, "Divine Teaching Necessary to Induce Men to Receive Christ in His True Character," Matthew 16:17, 1823 Mar, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 11]

Matthew 16:17

*And Jesus answered and said unto him blessed art thou Simon Barjona:
for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven.*

[This sermon deals with the apparent contradiction of Jesus the man and Jesus as God; also how Christians reconcile apparent contradictions in the Bible – they should simply accept it as beyond their understanding.]

The words Christ and Messiah have the same meaning. The former is a Greek and the latter A Hebrew word - and means simply one who is anointed for some special office. Thus all the kings of Judah and Israel were anointed before entering upon their kingly office and they are frequently in the original languages styled Christ or Messiah. And the title is given by way of eminence to that distinguished personage who was anointed of God for the high and holy office of Mediator to a lost and rebellious world.

It is of considerable importance to keep these meanings of the terms in the memory when reading the Scriptures - as the force of several passages rests altogether on this meaning. Thus in Acts Paul said to the Thessalonians This Jesus whom I preach unto you is Christ – that is Jesus was the anointed of God – the Jewish Messiah. But a man who knows not the original meaning of the word Christ can attach no meaning whatever to such passages. It is a very general opinion that Christ was the surname of Jesus the son of Joseph and Mary. But it is not except in a very few instances. It is merely a title of office and has no more to do with the original name than any civil or military or religious title in these days has with a man's name.

At the time of our Saviour's appearance on earth the Jews were anxiously expecting the coming of the Messiah or the Christ. But the condition in which Jesus manifested himself struck blow at once to all their fond hopes of temporal deliverance and aggrandizement from his exertions. And it was a long time before Jesus declared himself openly to be the expected Messiah. He wrought miracles before their eyes of the most unquestionable character - and these were proof enough of his divine origin. But they were repelled by the prejudices of the worldly minded Jews: as many as were ordained to eternal life believed. It was not indeed till after a considerable time that Jesus thought proper to disclose his true character to his disciples. So tainted were they also with Jewish prejudices and expectations that they could not bear the complete development. At a period of his ministry somewhat advanced Christ put the question directly to his disciples - whom do men say that I the Son of Man am? And they said, Some say that thou art John the Baptizer; some Elijah; and others Jeremiah or one of the prophets? He saith unto them but who say ye that I am? And Simon Peter answered and said thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. As none of the disciples dissented from this prompt reply we may conclude they all coincided in this correct opinion of Peter. Nay only a short time before when Jesus stilled the boisterous sea they came and worshiped him saying of a truth thou art the Son of God. By the miracles he had wrought they had been at last convinced what his true character was.

Yet it seems from the reply of Christ to Peter when he made the frank confession thou art the Christ the Son of the living God that it had required something more than his miracles to bring him to such a belief cordially. Flesh and blood hath not revealed unto thee but my Father which is in heaven. Multitudes besides had witnessed the same miracles and yet did not acknowledge their author to be the Messiah the Son of the living God. It needed a divine influence upon the heart in order to subdue their prejudices and their pride before these miracles could have the effect of producing a cordial belief in the true character of the Saviour. And the reason why Peter was brought into that belief was that this influence had been sent into his heart and opened his understanding to understand the Scriptures and led him to a saving reception and acknowledgment of the Saviour. For a saving belief it seems to have been – not merely a speculative confession of Christ's character but with the heart he believed unto righteousness and with the mouth he made confessions unto salvation. Blessed art thou says Christ to Simon and the reason assigned for his blessedness was that his father in heaven had revealed this truth to him. But had it been a mere speculative belief he would not have been uninterested in the merits of the Saviour and therefore not blessed.

There seems to have been nothing in the case of Peter that rendered divine influences peculiarly necessary more than there is in the case of all men in a Gospel land. Nay if the light of evidence be alone sufficient to bring any man to a cordial and saving acknowledgment of the true character of Christ it would seem no man could enjoy a brighter light than Peter. He not only saw the miracles of Christ but was with him constantly as an intimate friend and could ask him directly concerning his true character. If then he needed after all divine influences to enable him cordially to believe in Christ where is the individual to be found especially in these latter days who does not need a like influence? We may then consider the text as implying the following proposition.

Men do not cordially and savingly receive Christ in his true character until they are taught by the special influences of the Spirit.

The truth of this proposition will further appear by considering the difficulties men find.

1. In the metaphysical character of Christ
2. In his Priestly character.

But before mentioning these difficulties permit me to refer to a few passages of Scripture that are parallel with the text.

No man knoweth the Son, says Christ, but the Father: neither knoweth any man the Father save the Son and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him. In order then that any man should have any true knowledge of God it is necessary that Christ should reveal to him the character of God – and Christ represents his own character as equally incomprehensible because alike infinite and therefore needing a like revelation from God in order to be cordially believed in.

No man can come unto me, says Christ, except the Father draw him. To come to Christ certainly implies among other things to believe in him: and this Christ here describes as the effect of influence from God. In the next verse Christ says, It is written in the prophets, and they shall be all taught of God. Therefore that hath heard and hath learned of the Father cometh unto me.

In accordance with these representations of the Saviour Paul says, When it pleased God who separated me from my mother's womb and called me by his grace, to reveal his Son in me that I might preach him among the heathens is evidently referring his own belief in Christ to an influence from God.

Paul also says to the Corinthians no man can say that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost. He does not mean that nobody can speak these words without a divine influence: but no man can express a saving cordial belief in the character of Christ and in his doctrines unless it be through the influence of the Holy Ghost. This do we find that the text is not a solitary instance of a declaration of the doctrine that men do not savingly receive Christ in his true character until they are taught by the special influences of the Spirit. It is a doctrine that seems common to the New Testament writers and to a further elucidation and proof of it I now invite your attention while I consider

First, the difficulties men find in the metaphysical character of Christ.

By his metaphysical character I mean those powers and faculties or attributes which the Scriptures describe him as possessing. And every person who reads the bible finds two classes of text which describe this character. Let us look at some of the plainest of these.

On opening the N. Testament at the beginning of John's Gospel we read, in the beginning was the word and the word was with God and the word was God. Yet in the same chapter the word is said to have been made flesh and to have dwelt among us and in subsequent chapters this word is described as a man going about doing good healing the sick raising the dead - eating drinking conversing weeping rejoicing - in fine exhibiting the faculties and affections the feelings and desires of a man.

In Paul's writings in speaking of the Jews he says of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came who is over all God bless forever. Yet the same Apostle in other parts of his epistle says, there is one God and one Mediator the man Christ Jesus and he says God hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world by that man whom he hath ordained. And if we turn to Matthew Mark and Luke we find that this same Christ was a helpless infant lying in a manger that he increased in stature and wisdom and was subject to his parents and to the Roman government.

Now there can be nothing clearer than these two classes of text. The language is exceedingly plain and intelligible – and it certainly conveys to every candid mind the idea that in one place Christ is called God without any qualification and in another place that he is called man without any qualification. And this very great difference in the description of his character is not confined to a few texts: but it extends through the whole bible wherever his character is made a theme of discussion. The mere names of God and man as applied to him constitute but a small part of the peculiar phraseology. In all the descriptions the sacred writers give of his personal character there is found a similar diversity in their language. In our place it is said that all things were made by him and without him was not anything made that was made. By him were all things created that are in heaven and that are on earth visible and invisible whether they be thrones or dominions principalities or powers all things were made by him and for him and he is before all things and by him all things consist. In another place it is said that he had not where to lay his head - that he was subject to the Roman government and to his parents that he was dependant on the bounty of his disciples and others for support. In one place all the angels of God are commanded to worship him and all the hosts of heaven are represented as ascribing blessing and honor and glory and power not only unto him that sitteth on the throne but also to the Lamb forever and ever. In another place he is said to have been despised and rejected of men to have been hated and persecuted and finally to have been taken and bound by Roman soldiers insulted buffeted and spit upon and finally crucified. In one place he is said to be the same yesterday to day and forever - the Alpha and Omega the first and the last - in another place he is said to have been born in the reign of Herod and after living a little more than thirty years to have died. In one place he is said to be that Being who searches the reins and hearts - in another he is represented as ignorant of the time of the destruction of Jerusalem. In one place he is said to have been tried judged and condemned at Pilate's bar: in another to be the final Judge of quick and dead.

These unspeakably different descriptions of Christ's character must strike every man who reads the bible. And now the question is what judgment men will pass upon them without any other guide than unassisted reason.

The first enquiry that will be apt to arise in the mind of such a person is whether this great diversity in the descriptions of Christ's character does not prove the bible to be false. Here we will say is a flat contradiction presented to us - being is described as God and at the same time man. And since God is a true God he never can have revealed such a contradiction: hence in the bible cannot be inspired.

This would be correct reasoning were it true that the bible description of Christ's character involves a contradiction. But on such a subject we should be very certain of the fact before we pronounce that it does for we are here reasoning about what is plainly a matter of revelation and therefore we are very liable to be led into mistakes. Yet there have been some who felt so certain that such a contradiction does exist in the bible that they have on this ground denied the inspiration of the Scriptures.

Others however adopt a different conclusion. In the scriptural account of Christ's character they think they perceive two classes of texts that are utterly irreconcilable - the one representing Christ to be God and the other describing him as a man. But they shrink from the idea of disavowing the truth of the Scriptures on this account. What then can be done? The conclusion is that since God cannot be the author of contradictions they do not understand one of these classes of text - or that they are wrongly translated or that they have been added to the sacred text since the days of Christ. But which class shall they thus reject. Those that represent Christ as God are those denominating him a man. The former they reject because to suppose that he is God implies the absurdity that God himself has come into the world and suffered and died and it implies also that there are two gods. For if Christ be God and the Father be God they cannot be one being but must be two distinct beings.

Reasoning in this manner many are led to regard all those texts in scripture which expressly or impliedly declare Christ to be God as not being capable of being understood or not in fact a part of the word of God: and accordingly these texts are to such a dead letter. They make no more use of them than if they were not in the bible. But it is declared in the bible that all scripture is given by inspiration of God and is profitable for doctrine for reproof for correction for instruction in righteousness. Hence we perceive the necessity of divine teachings in order to prevent them giving up a part of the bible as of no consequence and in order to induce men to submit to receive God has spoken although they may not understand it all. By these divine teachings I do not mean that God communicates any new revelation: but only enables man to understand and receive that revelation he has already communicated. Neither do I mean that this influence is exerted so that men are sensible of it at the time and can say now we are or are not under the teachings of the Spirit: but it is exerted through the medium of the faculties in such a manner that a man cannot distinguish it from the workings of his own mind. He finds his mind turned in a particular direction and his heart yielding up its stubbornness and opposition but he perceives nothing in all this that is miraculous - nothing that may not be accounted for from the free use of his faculties - although when he compares his present with his former feelings he perceives so wide a difference that he can impute it only to the grace of God.

The man who is thus taught of God comes to the bible with a sincere humble desire to know and embrace everything he finds there clearly revealed. He feels as if it were safer to trust to what God has said than in his own reasonings. He is as willing to be taught out of this book of God as the child is to be taught by its parents. In regard to the metaphysical character of Christ he finds the two classes of text already mentioned and the enquiry arises how he shall understand? He would adopt that class which declare Christ to be God and neglect those which declare him to be man were he not fearful that by thus doing he should be guilty of taking away from the words of the prophecy of that book. Or he would receive that class of texts which represent Christ as man and reject those which call him God could he be satisfied that they are not a part of God's word or have been added by man or are wrongly translated. But upon finding that there is as much reason for supposing any other part of Scripture to be spurious or incorrectly rendered his heart refuses to reject them. What then can he do? He will say - I will believe both classes of these texts - that is I will believe Christ to be both God and man because I find these two characters ascribed to him in the bible and the bible is an infallible guide. And to say that such a belief implies a contradiction is more than I dare say; because I cannot comprehend the mode of the divine existence and I am willing to believe concerning this subject whatever I find plainly revealed in the unerring word of God.

Secondly Let us consider some of the difficulties men find in the pride priestly character of Christ.

By this term I mean his character as Mediator between God and man in which he made an atoning sacrifice for the sins of mankind by offering up himself for us and by his blood making satisfaction to the offended law of God. And in this part of his character men find great difficulties. As it was in the days of Paul so it has been in every age that the preaching of the cross is to them that perish either a stumbling block or foolishness. It is a mode of saving sinners that is directly opposed to all the proud and unsubdued feelings of the human heart. If a man acknowledges that the atonement of Christ was necessary to save him he must acknowledge that he was in a lost state without it and that his salvation is the result of unmerited grace. Thus all the glory is taken out of the hands of the creature and transferred to the Creator. The man who would be saved by the sufferings of Christ must come as a humble penitent and with a broken heart apply to that Saviour or he can never be interested in his merits. His It is only those who labour and are heavy laden whom Christ relieves. He came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. But men by nature are self-righteous and do not feel their need of any atonement for their sins. They imagine that God is so entirely merciful and so little regardless of the honor of his law that he will accept of them without any atonement merely upon their repentance. And they feel as if such a mode of saving sinners by the blood and merits of Christ were altogether absurd - and repugnant to all our ideas of the character and government of God. No position in Divinity to my apprehension, says a late writer, is more opposed to the general language of the New Testament, none which reflects greater dishonor on the character and moral government of the Deity, none which is more apt to mislead men in the highest concerns of religion, than the doctrine, that God requires complete satisfaction to be made to his justice for sin, by the vicarious sufferings of our Saviour to propitiate his regard to the repenting sinner.

This doctrine represents our God as inexorable in his disposition: it deprives him of those moral attributes which are the proper foundation of our love and gratitude: it destroys all goodness and all mercy in the pardon of the repenting sinner; and supposes that God has introduced a principle in his administrations, which would disgrace any government on earth. [Source: A. Bancroft, 1822]

But on the other hand the man who is really convinced that he is lost a lost sinner and that sin is the abominable thing which the Lord hateth can find no relief no resting place but in the atonement the vicarious sacrifice of the Lord Jesus Christ. He can see no other way which God can be just while he justifies the believer in Jesus and he looks upon the plan of salvation as displaying most wonderfully the love of God and giving it a prominence and a glory which no other mode of reconciliation could present. As soon as the Spirit convinces a man of sin he is convinced of the necessity of an atonement: and with him it is not a mere inoperative speculative opinion but it is unwrought into all his experience and is the only ground of all his hopes. We see then most forcibly how important how necessary it is that God should reveal to men the true priestly character of Christ in order to their receiving it - and in this view of the subject we may say most emphatically with Paul, no man can say that Jesus is Lord but by the Holy Ghost.

If then it be true that men do not cordially and savingly receive Christ in his true character till they are taught of God how important is it that we be in unceasing in our prayers for divine influences to guide us and subdue us to a reception of it! We must give up our confidence in the opinions of men around us and rely alone on the teachings of the Spirit of God. Christ only can we hope to be freed from error. And it is not a few feeble wishes a few languid petitions that are sufficient. We must pray fervently and earnestly and constantly over the Scriptures - that we know and embrace Christ in his true character. Other foundations can no man lay, etc. Christ is the sum and substance of the Gospel: and a mistake concerning his character puts our salvation in jeopardy. Let no man therefore who has formed his opinions without prior earnest fervent prayer imagine himself to be on safe ground. Neither let the man who speculatively acknowledges Christ in his true character suppose that he is blessed if his life do not conform to that belief. Peter was blessed because a new heart had been given him and he had cordially embraced a Saviour by a living faith. And let none of us my hearers rest easy a moment until we savingly know him whom to know is life eternal.

Sermon 156 Divine Influence in Free Agency

[Sermon No. 156, "Divine Influence and Free Agency," Philippians 2:12-13, 1823 Mar, EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 11]

Philippians 2:12-13

*Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling;
For it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure.*

This text affords a happy instance of the mode in which the sacred writers treat subjects that may admit of controversy. How to reconcile the special operation of the Spirit upon the heart of man with his free agency and with the necessity of his own exertions has long been a fruitful source of difficulty and contention. And how did the scriptures treat the subject? They simply declare as the text shows that it is God who works in us to will and to do while at the same time they fearlessly urged Christians to work out their own salvation. That is they assert the doctrine of divine influence in its full extent and the necessity of men's exerting themselves to secure their salvation. They assert both these things on the authority of the living God and lead us to believe them or reject them as we think proper.

But some one will say these things are directly contradictory. If the one be true then the other is not true. If God must first operate upon the hearts of men in order to give them a will to perform their duty then surely it is of no use to attempt to work out our salvation any farther than we are impelled to it by this operation upon our wills. Especially if God works in us to will and to do according to his good pleasure and not according to our wishes or desires or prayers then is it altogether useless for us to take one step until it shall be his pleasure to move us. We must wait for him to impel us.

This reasoning appears clear and conclusive to very many and hence some are led to deny the necessity or reality of special divine influences and others to adopt the notion that they are to sit still like the man at the pool of Siloam and wait for the moving of the waters. But in replying to all such I should say - do you believe the bible to be the word of God and every part of it to be received as undeniable truth? If you do believe this then I would further enquire whether it be possible the necessity of special divine influences in order dispose man to the service of God - and the necessity of man's exerting himself at the same time - is it possible to express these two things more clearly than the text does? To say then that these two doctrines are contradictory what is it but to say that God contradicts himself? And to endeavor to prove this contradiction by our own reasonings however clear they may seem what is it but to set up our reason in opposition to the declarations of God? But the truth is whatever such a man may say - he does not believe in the inspiration and infallibility of scripture: and the proper way to address such an one is not to attempt to prove that the bible teaches the doctrine of special divine influence in conjunction with human efforts: because however clear the bible may be on these points this man will not believe them. But the right motive of addressing such an one is to go back to the root of the difficulty and endeavor to prove the authenticity and inspiration of Scripture.

Although speculative minds and unsanctified hearts may find much difficulty in the text yet to the humble sincere prayerful Christian it is one of the plainest and most consoling passages in the bible. All the difficulty to be found it lies in men not being able to make it coincide with their preconceived notions. But the humble Christian has no theories to support. The great anxiety is to know what God has revealed; and he comes to the reading of scripture with his heart teachable and humble as that of a little child earnestly desirous of the sincere milk of the world. And when he reads the text he will be tempted to say - how refreshing is it this percept. I have been often told by man that if the work of my conversion and salvation depend on the special influences of the Spirit and it depend on the sovereign pleasure of God whether that Spirit shall be poured out then all human efforts are idle and we are mere machines. But here I find God who will not who cannot lie not only declaring that he works in me to will and to do but also making this a reason why I should work out my salvation with fear and trembling. If there had been any real contradiction between these two things would not my merciful heavenly father have declared it? And is it not better - is it not safer to trust his word than the reasonings of men when they apparently disagree. Surely I have a more sure word of prophecy to which I shall do well to take heed as to a light that shineth in a dark place.

As already remarked the text is extremely easy to understand if the heart be right. There is no ambiguity in the words nor in their arrangement. Every body sees or might see that the apostle here declares that God excites Christians to will and to do according as he pleases and that he makes this a reason why they should work out their salvation with fear and trembling. My hearers any paraphrase of mine - or any attempt to make the meaning more plain will only obscure it. Still however the text is an important one and gives rise to many interesting and useful principles some of which do not appear at first light. To these I now invite your attention.

First. We learn from the text the necessity of a Christian's using diligently the means of grace.

The opinion has sometimes been maintained that when a man is once converted being sure of heaven and dependant on the grace of God to work in him to will and to do - it is not necessary that he be very solicitous about exerting himself in a preparation for meeting Christ. And very many who could discard such an opinion in so many words do notwithstanding feel such a kind of security in their kind of supposed conversion as prevents them from a vigorous diligent improvement of the means of sanctification. They have a feeling as if it would not be very dangerous for them sometimes to neglect the assemblies of God's people or the regular reading of his word or selfish animation or secret prayer since they have been converted and God will continue the works he has long begun in them until the day of Jesus Christ. In other words they do not feel as if their salvation might depend upon their diligently attending the means of grace. But how does the text flash in the in the face of such opinions and such practices! Work out your salvation with fear and trembling is the imperative command. Why? Because it is God that worketh in you to will and to do. In other words the man who is really converted will find in the fact that the work is of God a motive urging him to the most vigorous exertions to make his calling and election election serve - instead of arguing from thence that it is not necessary for him to do anything - because God must work in him. So that whatever Christian professor finds himself dispensed to excuse himself laborious exertions by the doctrine of divine influences may rest assured that he has no reason to hope that he ever has been converted. Such an abuse of this doctrine is made by impenitent men and whoever follows them may conclude himself also impenitent. God has so constituted things that the moment a man begins to neglect a diligent use of the means of grace it is not possible he should have any evidence of his being a Christian. It is no matter what experience he can relate - it is no matter even if he have had revelations from heaven - this neglect shows him to be now in the gall of bitterness and in the bonds of iniquity. So that it is not going too far to say that a man's salvation may depend upon his improvement or neglect of the means of grace. That is by neglecting to improve them he may show himself to be utterly unfit for heaven.

Secondly I infer from the text that Christians should (not be overconfident of their good estates) usually exercise a trembling solicitude respecting their own salvation.

It is with fear and trembling that they are to work out their salvation - that is with a trembling solicitude lest after all they should be cast about. This solicitude is not inconsistent with a well grounded and comfortable hope of heaven nor with a firm faith in the promises of God. But it implies a distrust in ourselves. It implies a deep sense of the deceitfulness and depravity of the heart. It implies a humble fear lest our fruits do not prove us to have been born of God and it will produce an earnest effort to keep all the commandments of God. It is opposed to that self-confident boldness which rashly presumes upon the mercy of God without any scriptural evidence of a change of heart.

There is indeed such a thing as the faith of assurance. The apostle had it and many martyrs have had it and many Christians who had spent half a century in the faithful hardening services of Christ have had it. But to persons of this character it seems principally confined. It is not to be expected in ordinary cases - in the commencement of the Christian course. It is the reward of long and faithful service - it is the boon put into the hearts of those who are called to pass through fiery trials for Christ's sake. And it is a very different thing from that presumptuous confidence which is sometimes manifested by the young convert and by Christians before they become acquainted with their own hearts.

In the third place the text assigns a peculiar reason why Christians should be unremittingly diligent in working out their own salvation.

Work out your own salvation, says Paul, for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure. In other words the fact that God disposes men to love and serve him is a reason for them to labour as if their salvation depended on themselves.

How very different my hearers is this view of the subject from that which mankind generally take! They say if we are dependant on the grace or Spirit of God for every holy desire and willingness to perform his will then they can do and are bound to do nothing themselves. They shall be saved if God please to save them and they must perish if he do not convert them. That is they assign that as a reason for doing nothing which Paul assigns as a reason for most vigorous exertion. So that either mankind are incorrect in their views of this subject or the Apostle is incorrect.

And let it be known to mankind that they are incorrect and that the words of Paul are words of truth and soberness. The fact that God works in men to will and to do is a reason and a powerful one too why they should strive earnestly to enter heaven. For the truth is if God did not thus produce a disposition in the heart to love and serve him no man would ever have any such disposition. We are by nature wholly alienated from God and our wills are opposite to his. There is none that doeth good no not one. And when God by his Holy Spirit changes these perverse wills shall we then sink down into inaction when we have just acquired the power of serving him acceptably? Before this we took no pleasure in performing his will - and now that we have a relish given us for it is this the time to cease our exertions? And shall our obligations to obey God now that our hearts are changed have no influence upon us? God has granted to us the greatest of all blessings - regenerating grace: and now he demands of us that we take to us the whole armour of God and go forth in his service and strive to enter in at the strait gate. And shall we lying under the weight of such unspeakable obligations owing him such a seamless debt of gratitude shall we shrink from a compliance? Shall we say to God that as he has begun a good work in our hearts we leave it to him to carry it on? The truth is brethren to sink down into stupor and inaction and not to strive to work out our salvation implies that God never has wrought in us to will and to do.

And hence results another ground on which divine influence is a reason for active exertion. The moment a supposed Christian does not labour and strive he shows himself to have no love to God nor to his service. Genuine Christian love constrains a man to work out his own salvation and to strive for the salvation of others. It impels a man forward to the work in spite of remaining corruption and in spite of all his reasonings. He feels a grateful emotion swelling his bosom and leading him to cry out Lord what wilt thou have me to do? He sees a Saviour God's only begotten Son suffering and dying in his stead. He sees the eternal Spirit entering his wretched heart while yet estranges from God and turning its affections towards the divine character and who that is a Christian can resist such motives to obedience? The truth is Christians know by their daily experience that the more deeply they feel the need of divine grace - the more they feel their entire dependance upon this the greater are their efforts to work out their own salvation. No man ever felt more deeply and thoroughly his dependance than Paul and yet no man ever agonized more to enter into heaven. This is a paradox to the men of the world. They suppose that if a man feels himself wholly dependant for a disposition to serve God upon his grace he will sink down into a stupid apathy whereas experience shows that a man's exertions will rise just in proportion to his sense of this dependance. But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit, etc.

In the fourth place I infer from the text the nature of Divine influence on the human heart.

I infer that this influence is wholly of a moral character and not of a physical. That is it operates by suasion and not by compulsion. A man for instance whose will is turned from sinful to holy objects acts just as freely in the one as in the other. He is just as much a free agent and unconstrained in his choice of holiness to day as he was in his preference of sin yesterday.

There is a strong disposition in men to form an idea of something compulsory when any thing is said about the special converting influences of the Holy Spirit. They feel as if it were forcing them to become religious. But if we take the Scriptures for our guide such an idea will be found to be contradictory to them. God is said to work in men to will. Now when a man really wills to do a thing he does it voluntarily. It is his choice to do it - he would be crossed if he were to neglect doing it. Indeed it is not possible for a man to do anything by constraint and yet will to do it. The very idea of compulsion takes away the idea of his willing it and the fact that he wills it destroys the notion of compulsion.

Now the effect of divine influence according to scripture is to turn the will from things that are unholy to things that are holy. And this is done in such a manner that a man is sensible of nothing different from the natural operation of his own faculties. He changes his will as it seems to him in consequence of the new motives that are set before him. He is sensible of no force except what results from the presentations of arguments and he acts according to the desires and feelings of his heart. Nay in many instances men are not sensible till a long time afterward - till they learn it from God's word that their conversion was effected by the Holy Spirit. Let those then who associate the idea of compulsion with divine influence and on that account reject the doctrine of special grace bring no more objections against it until they have faithfully considered the words of the text. And on the other hand let those who pretend that they have a sensible impression of the operations of the Spirit at the time they are made cease any longer maintaining such an enthusiastic dream. And let those who maintain the doctrine of divine influence in scripture purity be encouraged to persevere in its defense.

Fifthly. We learn from the text the extent of divine influence.

It has long been an important enquiry who begins the works of conversion, God or man? Is God moved by his own pleasure to pour out his Spirit upon the sinner or does the sinner really and sincerely desirous of holiness offer up such prayers as are acceptable to God and such as move him to convert the sinner. The text declares that God works in men to will. I ask then whether a man ever sincerely and truly desired any thing which he is not willing to possess? If he does then the sinner is the first mover in the works of regeneration. If he do not God is the first mover since he first makes men willing to love and serve Him. And the text says nothing about doing this in answer to the sinner's prayer: but merely according to his good pleasure.

Again divine influence does not exceed the rational faculties of the soul. No new faculty is thereby imparted to a man: but only a new direction given to those he currently possesses. Neither is any new revelation imparted to him: but he is enabled to understand more clearly that which he already possesses. And this too in so easy and natural a manner that all seemed a mere natural effort of the faculties.

Sixthly. The text teaches us that one of the most fervent supplications of the Christian should be for divine influence to enable him to work out his salvation.

If he ever reaches heaven if he ever advances one step in the divine life it will be through God's workings in him to will and to do of his good pleasure. He ought therefore to improve the influences he has already felt in praying for more and greater effusions.

And how great is his encouragement for such prayers! He is assured that God is more ready to give the Holy Spirit than earthly parents to give good gifts unto their children and that he that hath to him shall be given and he shall have abundantly.

And the apostles are martyrs who have gone before us my brethren have left us their example to encourage us in this union of earnest prayers with earnest exertions. Look at the instance of Paul already alluded to – It forms, says a late writer, a striking part of the example of Paul, that while he did as much toward the extension of the Christian faith as if the whole success of the cause depended upon his doing, he prayed as much and as fervently for this object, as if all his doings were of no consequence. A fine testimony to the supremacy of God, from the man, who, in labours was more abundant than any that ever came after him, that he counted all as nothing, unless God would interfere to put his blessings upon all, and to give his efficacy to all! He who looked so busy, and whose hand was so constantly engaged, in the work that was before him, looked for all his success to that help which cometh from the sanctuary of God. There was his eye directed. Thence alone did he expect a blessing upon his endeavours. He wrought, and that with diligence too, because God bade him; but he also prayed, and that with equal diligence, because God had revealed to him, that plant as he may, and water as he may, God alone giveth the increase. He did homage to the will of God, by the labours of the ever-working minister, and he did homage to the power of God, by the devotions of the ever-praying minister. He did not say, what signifies my working, for God alone can work with effect? This is very true, but God chooses to work by instruments - and Paul, by the question, Lord, what will thou have me to do? expressed his readiness to be an instrument in his hand. Neither did he say, what signifies my praying, for I have got a work here to do, and it is enough that I be diligent in the performance of it. No - for the power of God must be acknowledged, and a sense of his power must mingle with all our performances; and therefore it is that the Apostle kept both working and praying; and with him they formed two distinct emanations of the same principle; and while there are many who make these Christian graces to neutralize each other, the judicious and clear-sighted Paul, who had received the Spirit of a sound mind, could give his unembarrassed vigour to both these exercises, and combine, in his own example, the utmost diligence in doing, with the utmost dependance on him who can alone give to that doing all its fruits and all its efficacy. (Chalmers)

And shall we not be safe my brethren in following the example of Paul? Shall we not be unsafe in neglecting to follow it? Let us go therefore and do likewise. That at last we may say with him I have fought a good fight I have finished my course and I have kept the faith henceforth there is paid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord the righteous Judge will give me at that day.

Sermon 158 Christ Crucified

[Sermon No. 158, "Christ Crucified," I Corinthians 2:2, 1823 Mar,
EOH, Series 3, Sub-series A, Box 7: folder 11]

I Corinthians 2:2

For I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified.

When this declaration is viewed by the cold calculating eye of this world's philosophy there appears in it something of the spirit of enthusiasm. Paul thou art beside thyself is the feeling of very many on reading the passage. And others unable from their own experience to see why he should thus exclude everything but Christ and his cross are disposed to set it down as something beyond their comprehension.

But my hearers these words are professedly not the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teaches. And they purport to be the deliberate opinion of an Apostle. It becomes an important question then whether his was a wise determination? If it was it should be adopted by every minister of the gospel. If it was not it is high time it should be exposed as false and dangerous.

Is it knowledge by all true Christians that Christ crucified is the great central doctrine of revealed religion and that all the other doctrines are but so many lines pointing to this centre. Other doctrines are important nay some are essential but they derive their importance from their relation to the cross of Christ. On this ground it will not be difficult to show the wisdom of the apostle in the determination of the text.

In the first place no other doctrine of the bible can be preached with saving effect when unaccompanied by that of Christ crucified.

I do not mean and Paul did not mean that the doctrine of redemption by the cross of Christ should be made the theme of every discourse. But every discourse should recognize this doctrine and be founded on it and point to it. Paul preached and wrote much on other doctrines of revelation but Christ crucified was the basis on which he rested all his preaching. I deliver unto you, says he to the Corinthians, first of all that which I also received how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures. He does not say he delivered to them that important or that essential truth: but he calls it first of all making at the grand central pillar of the system.

It is not possible perhaps to name any truth of scripture which would not lose its chief efficacy if Christ crucified be kept out of sight. Suppose the preacher urge upon men with all the force of the bible their utter alienation and depravity. And suppose he convince them that they are lost and inimical to the character and government of God. What effect will this belief have upon them except to make them miserable unless they can also be pointed to Christ's blood for the purification and healing of their souls? Without this they might weep and mourn over their desperate condition but they would never have their enmity dissolved nor their hearts renewed until Christ be revealed to them.

Suppose the minister convince his people of the necessity of regeneration by water and the Spirit: yet that Spirit is to be poured out only through the merits of a crucified Saviour. Suppose he were to exhibit the character of God. He must either exhibit God as a con assuming fire or else hold him up as reconciling the world unto himself through the cross. He could not direct his hearers to trust in the mercy of God without the merits of the Saviour. For God has declared that he will not bestow mercy upon any only through Jesus Christ. It is presumptuous it is downright madness to venture upon the clemency of God any other way than by the cross after he has said other foundation can no man lay, etc. In no other way can the preacher describe God as just while he justifies the believer. So that the true character of God cannot be exhibited only as an object of terror to the sinner except it be viewed through the cross. And I might proceed to apply similar remarks to every doctrine of the bible. All lose their efficacy all become sources of distress so long as the cross is kept out of sight. A dark gloom is imparted to religion and a sickly hue spread over another world.

*Death and the grave are doleful themes
For sinful mortal worms to sing,
Except a Saviour's sweeter beams
Dispel the gloom, and touch the string. [Source: Hymn by S. Medley, 1802]*

2. God grants his blessing to accompany no other preaching but that of Christ and him crucified.

Paul may plant and Apollos water but God giveth the increase. Not by might nor by power but by my Spirit saith the Lord. My speech and my preaching, says the Apostle in the context, was not with enticing words of man's wisdom but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power that your faith should not stand in the wisdom of man but in the power of God. No preaching then will produce the salvation of men none will have any radical influence if it be not accompanied by the Spirit of God. But God has declared that there is salvation in none other than for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby they can be saved but that of Jesus Christ. Other foundation on no man lay than that is laid which is Jesus Christ. No man cometh unto the Father but by him. If his cross be not preached therefore no man will come to the Father. God will withhold those influences which are absolutely necessary to make men Christians. Men can indeed be persuaded that they are Christians without Christ and perhaps be induced to engage in some external amendment if they are told they can thereby prove procure heaven. But this is all. Then they will stop – and then the native opposition to God will be retained - all their worldly mindedness will stick fast to them and they will in fact be still farther than ever from anything like real experimental religion. Not one will be regenerated by the Spirit of God without which they cannot enter the kingdom of heaven: for it is only God as view through a Saviour that can slay the enmity of our hearts and work in us that radical reformation essential to salvation. It is no matter if a preacher come before his hearers with the talents of an angel and the eloquence of an archangel - no matter if he have the feelings and understandings of his hearers at his control so as to turn them where he pleases - it is no matter if he make them weep and resolve to reform - if the cross be not held up before them - if a bleeding Saviour be not pressed upon their acceptance - they may weep and they may resolve: but in regard to God they will still remain the same unreconciled hostile beings is ever.

*Tis when the cross is preached, and only then
That from the pulpit a mysterious power
Goes forth to renovated moral man.
The cross imparts vitality divine
And energy omnipotent to truth
In its whole system, ineffectual else,*

Inanimate! [Source: Poem, Carlos Wilcox, 1822]

When Christ crucified is exalted faithfully and constantly before men and they are told that here is their only refuge then does the minister of the Gospel perceive a solemnity resting in the mind of his hearers. A divine influence accompanies his words - they reach the hearts - they reach the conscience - they stir up impenitent men to examine whether they are on safe ground - and he sees many turning from their evil ways and exhibiting a thorough reformation in their lives. And although many remain having their ears made heavy and their hearts gross - and to whom the preaching of the cross is foolishness yet some are converted and are made ready for the everlasting enjoyment of heaven.

And here am I reminded of an instructive incident in the history of the first Moravian missionaries who visited the inhospitable shores of Greenland. They there found the poor degraded ignorant race of man and immediately set about their instruction. And what could be more natural then to endeavour in the first place to convince them of the existence of God as the groundwork of all their future efforts. They pointed them to the sun moon and the stars over their heads and to the various objects on earth and tried to lead the simple minds of the Esquimaux through nature up to nature's God. These untutored Indians listened to their instructors with stupid awe or wondering amazement and remained sunk as low as ever in the mire of corruption and ignorance and although they knew not how to disprove what the missionaries told them yet they did not believe it. But the missionaries at length held up before them the cross of Christ - told him at once how he had suffered and died for men and how ready he was to receive repentant sinners; and they saw with astonishment a magical influence or rather a divine influence accompanying their words and the poor degraded Greenlanders trembled in view of their sins and flew to the cross of the Redeemer and rose from their pollutions and shook off their long fixed habits of sin and for nearly a century a Christian church has been growing among them and thousands have lived the life and died the death of the Christian. A powerful; testimony to the wisdom of Paul's determination when he came to the Corinthian idolaters, not to know anything among them save Jesus Christ and him crucified. It is this only that has power to search the seared conscience and the callous heart of unrenewed man. He will record the power of argument he will shake off the temporary impressions of a moving eloquence he will look with stupid unconcern upon the eternal glories of heaven and remain unalarmed at the worm that never dies and the fire that is never quenched: but the cross of Christ he cannot resist - he is awakened by it he is melted by he it - he is converted by it.

3. To preach Christ crucified is the only effectual way of preaching morality.

It is true indeed that there is an inherent loveliness in virtue which ought to recommend it to the reception of all. And indeed all are willing to acknowledge that virtue is lovely and vice odious. But it is one thing to condemn this and quite another to practice accordingly. It needs something more powerful than a conviction of the understanding that virtue is amiable to turn our hostile hearts to its reception. Something more urgent than an exhibition of the moral beauty of virtue must be brought to bear on the mass of corruption in the human heart or it will never exhibit much of that beauty in itself. Philosophers and others have spent much time in urging men to the practice of all the virtues and they have fancied because men assented to the correctness of their exhortations and reasonings that they were about to witness a moral salvation around them but they have waited only to see men pass on in the same beaten trench of iniquity.

*Men there are Men of illustrious name, that have employed
Years in portraying to admiring crowds*

*In vivid colours, with the magic hand
 A genius guided by refining taste,
 The loveliness of virtue, and of vice
 The hideous features, and in urging all,
 With eloquent tongue, to make the happy choice,
 And, at the end, with grief and self-reproach,
 Have looked around in vain for the reformed.
 On all the moral field within its reach,
 Their beautiful philosophy has fallen
 Powerless, as moonlight cold on the cold snow.
 Convinced at length of this its impotence,
 And taught divinely to proclaim instead
 Messiah crucified, on the same field
 With joy have they beheld an aspect new,
 From fruits abundant of immortal growth. [Source: Poem by Carlos Wilcox, 1827]*

With the names and characters of two of these men who have made such an experiment as this you are acquainted my hearers – viz. Dr. Scott and Dr. Chalmers. Permit me here to quote the testimony of the latter to this point.

And here, says he in his address to his former parishioners, I cannot but record the effect of an actual undesigned experiment, which I prosecuted for upwards of twelve years among you. For the greater part of that time I could expatiate on the meanness and dishonesty on the villainy of falsehood on the despicable arts of calumny – in a word upon all those deformities of character which awaken the natural indignation of the human heart against the pests and disturbers of human society. Now could I upon the strength of these warm expostulations have got the thief to give up his stealing and the evil speaker his censoriousness and the liar his deviations from truth I should have felt all the repose of one who had gotten his ultimate object. It never occurred to me that all this might have been done and yet every soul of every hearer have remained in full alienation from God; and that even could I have established in the bosom of one who stole such a principle of abhorrence at the meanness of dishonesty that he was prevailed upon to steal no more, he might still have retained a heart as completely unturned to God and as totally unpossessed by a principle of love to him as before. In a word though I might have made him a more upright and honorable man, I might have left him as destitute of religious principles as ever. But the interesting fact is, that during the whole of that period in which I made no attempt against the natural enmity of the mind to God, while I was intentive to the way in which this enmity is dissolved even by the free offer on that one hand and the believing acceptance on the other, of the Gospel salvation, while Christ through whose blood the sinner, who by nature stand afar off, is brought near to the heavenly Lawgiver whom he has offended was scarcely ever spoken of or spoken of in such a way as stripped him of all the impotency of his character and offices, even at this time did press the reformation of honour and truth and integrity among my people, but I never once heard of any such reformation having been effected amongst them. If there was any thing at all brought about in this way it was more than I ever got any account of. I am not sensible that all the vehemence with which I urged the virtues and proprieties of social life had the weight of a feather on the moral habits of my parishioners. And it was not till I got impressed by the utter alienation of the heart in all its desires and affections from God; it was not till reconciliation to him become the distinct and the prominent object of my ministerial exertions it was not till I took the scriptural way of laying the method of reconciliation before them: it was not till the free offer of forgiveness through the blood of Christ was urged upon their acceptance, and the Holy Spirit given through the channel of Christ's mediatorship to all who ask him was set before
